The Judiciary of the District of Columbia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, in these days, when criticism is heard concerning the functioning of the legislative and executive branches of the Government, it is most satisfying to note the unstinted praise which deservedly has been given to the judiciary of the District of Columbia.

I can imagine nothing more gratifying than the public announcement just made as to the exemplary condition of the district court here in Washington. Upon such high authority as Chief Justice Vinson of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the able Attorney General Tom C. Clark, it is stated that the courts here in the Nation's Capital have been elevated to the highest standards and are functioning in a manner which reflects great credit upon all who have any part in the administration of justice.

This commendable state of affairs is aptly described in an editorial appearing in yesterday's edition of the Washington Evening Star entitled "High Standard of Justice." In order that this matter may be given the widespread attention it deserves, I ask unanimous consent to have this editorial printed at this point in my remarks in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HIGH STANDARD OF JUSTICE

There are reasons for the remarkable change which has come over the District court in recent years. So remarkable, indeed, has been the change that Chief Justice Vinson of the Supreme Court and Attorney General Tom Clark were moved to comment on it in glowing terms at the Judicial Circuit Conference here Thursday. A decade or more ago the court was so far behind in its work that justice suffered shamefully. Today the court is looked upon nationally as a shining example of judicial efficiency. Its docket is current.

The transformation was not achieved without a struggle. The court caught up with its work not because the load declined. On the contrary, the work of the court has greatly increased. But the court has been able to wipe out a backlog of cases and to keep abreast of current ones because its judges and its administrative staff, under the leadership of Chief Justice Laws, have reorganized the machinery of justice along approved business lines.

Before Chief Justice Laws began to institute a series of reforms, cases in both civil and criminal branches were so stagnated that by the time they finally were called for trial key witnesses often had died or disappeared or suffered memory lapses. Some criminals who should have been sent to jail escaped prosecution or, if brought to trial, benefited from absence of witnesses or vague and confusing testimony. The district attorney's office on one occasion was forced to drop several hundred old criminal cases which, if tried promptly, might have resulted in convictions.

After a series of conferences with the other judges, with prosecutors, with bar groups and with representative citizens, Chief Justice Laws began a reorganization which has had amazing results. Pretrial procedures in the civil branch relieved the judges of much time-consuming routine work through advance stipulations. An orderly system of assigning cases was installed, eliminating conflict and insuring an equitable distribution of the work load. The court cracked down on continuances by adopting a policy of granting delays only for very good reasons. Each judge was given supervisory responsibility for certain administrative functions of the court or for liaison with outside agencies.

Gradually the reforms began to tell. The log jam of cases was broken, trials were speeded up and a new and better brand of justice evolved. The court today has reason to be proud of its record of bringing 63.3 percent of its criminal cases to trial within 4 weeks of indictment—51.3 percent within 2 weeks of indictment. It has achieved this record despite the fact that it is called upon to try some of the most important and difficult cases in the country—like those of Gen. Bennett Meyers, the Garssons and the Hollywood contempt-of-Congress defendants.

Chief Justice Laws and his colleagues well deserve the fine tributes which have come to them from Chief Justice Vinson, Mr. Clark, Members of Congress and other advocates of prompt, effective justice. A still greater compliment is the fact that many other district courts are striving to match the gains of the local tribunal. It is no exaggeration to say that law enforcement nationally is profiting from the high standards being maintained by the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

St. Lawrence Seaway Subcommittee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement on the subject of the subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee which will study further the St. Lawrence seaway.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APPOINTMENT OF THE ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY SUBCOMMITTEE

The appointment by Chairman VANDENBERG of a new St. Lawrence seaway subcommittee on the Foreign Relations Committee constitutes an important step in the forward progress of the great effort to accomplish the long-deferred seaway. Through this subcommittee, a report will be ready for the Eighty-first Congress next January.

During the last month, I have canvassed my brother Senators and Representatives regarding the possibility of appointment of a Presidential commission for the St. Lawrence seaway. This commission—with appropriate financial resources for investigation—would have been composed of the foremost private and governmental authorities of the land and could have studied exhaustively all of the outstanding problems which opponents had raised about the seaway. Unfortunately, many of my colleagues—although eager to serve as cosponsors—reported that sufficient time was not available for the passage of the seaway commission bill and for the passage of money authorization.

Therefore, as the next best alternative, I suggested to Senator VANDENBERG the reconstituting of a Foreign Relations Seaway Subcommittee, and this he gladly and promptly did.

It will be the aim of this subcommittee—of which I am honored to serve again as chairman—to find out as many of the answers to pending seaway questions as are mentioned in the enclosed draft of the seaway commission bill—which, as is indicated, was not introduced.

I am inviting opponents of the St. Lawrence seaway, in particular, to make recommendations to the subcommittee on problems which they believe should be studied by it. I feel that if the opponents will give us the benefit of their suggestions, then the subcommittee can constitute an important fact-finding mechanism.

The subcommittee will maintain the closest liaison with the Library of Congress, with the Corps of Engineers, and with all other Government agencies, including the State Department, Department of Commerce, and others which have been deeply interested in the seaway. Moreover, the subcommittee will be in contact with the New York State Power Authority and the Canadian Government regarding any developments in New York's proposal for a separate power project divorced from the navigation phase.

I have no false illusions to the effect that just because we are going to do new research in this subcommittee, that the conclusions we arrive at will be any more convincing and acceptable to some of the opposition than all of the documented conclusions in the past have been. There has been a mountain of expert research performed on the seaway during all of these decades, but some of the seaway opposition remains obstinately opposed to it, ignoring all facts and arguments.

I am, however, satisfied that a sizable proportion of the opposition to the seaway consists of reasonable, open-minded men who sincerely seek light on the subject, and it will be the purpose of this subcommittee to furnish such light.

If all the members of the seaway opposition are sincere in their doubts about the wisdom of various seaway points, let them come forward, raise legitimate questions, and give us the opportunity to answer them, if it is at all possible. We will, of course, be handicapped in the subcommittee by the lack of special investigative funds, but we hope to put the subcommittee to the best possible use in finding facts.

John Thomas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. C. WAYLAND BROOKS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a tribute to the late Senator JOHN THOMAS, of Idaho, by Hon. Addison T. Smith, formerly Representative from the Second District of Idaho.

There being no objection, the tribute was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The passing of Senator JOHN THOMAS is a great loss to the people of Idaho whose interests he so ably represented in the United States Senate for many years. They recognized in him a leader whose judgment and wide knowledge of State and national affairs could always be safely followed.

My first meeting with Mr. THOMAS was in the summer of 1907 when he called on me in Boise, Idaho, and presented a letter of introduction from my long time friend of Topeka, Kans., Ralph Faxon, secretary to the late Senator Long of that State. Ralph's commendation of Mr. THOMAS impressed me most favorably, and it was my pleasure to introduce him to some of my friends, who welcomed him as a possible new settler amongst us. Mr. THOMAS returned to Idaho in 1909 and located at Gooding, a new town in Lincoln County, on the Oregon Short Line, and organized a bank, of which he became president. A warm friendship developed between us, which continued uninterrupted during his lifetime.

During the first few years of his residence in Gooding he devoted himself to his banking and stock raising interests, and did not become actively interested in politics until 1912, when his advice was being sought by local and State leaders in the Republican Party along political lines. Mr. THOMAS had been recognized as an astute and successful businessman and banker, and a careful observer of political trends in his home State of Kansas, and was finally persuaded to become chairman of the Republican State central committee, a position he held for 4 years. He later served for two terms as a member of the Republican National Committee.

On becoming a Member of the United States Senate his qualities of leadership were soon recognized by his colleagues and he became a member of the Committee on Finance, and other important committees, where he served with distinction.

Senator THOMAS' political ideals were along conservative lines, from which he could not be easily swerved. His knowledge of financial and banking precepts impelled him to study most carefully proposed legislation, and to minutely examine the advisability of entering upon new and unproven theories of governmental changes with the hope of solving problems presented by various groups and organizations. He specialized in legislation to aid in the development of the resources of his adopted State, and especially to encourage and aid those engaged in agricultural pursuits. He was a strong and persistent advocate of the development of arid lands by damming the streams and bringing water to such lands for irrigation purposes, by private capital and Government funds. He was a consistent advocate of the benefits afforded by a protective tariff to stimulate the growth of the products of the farms, the raising of livestock, and the development of the mining and timber resources.

Senator THOMAS' delightful personality, his eagerness to cooperate with those needing financial assistance to carry on their plans, and his willingness to join in movements to contribute to the upbuilding of the community, county, and State endeared him to a legion of friends and admirers who mourn his departure from among us. He was my personal and political friend, and was one of the first of the leaders in the State to advocate my election to Congress in 1912. During the years we were together in Congress he could always be depended upon to cooperate in bringing to the attention of the Senate bills originating in the House, and I reciprocated by looking after the Senate bills in which he was interested. I feel a deep personal loss in his death.

Speech by Hon. William B. Umstead, of North Carolina

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM B. UMSTEAD
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech which I made in North Carolina on Tuesday, May 4, 1948, and which was broadcast over a Statewide hook-up.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, I take this means of bringing to you a personal message. Although I have utilized every day that I could be away from Washington in trying to see my friends in North Carolina, matters of pressing importance in the Senate, dealing with both domestic and foreign problems, have prevented me from spending as much time in the State as I should have liked to have spent. I wish again to thank everyone who is supporting my candidacy to succeed myself in the United States Senate. Everything you may do in my behalf will always be remembered with grateful appreciation. I have at various places in the State discussed some of the pressing problems before the Senate, including measures which have been passed and some that are now pending

Tonight, I wish to discuss an important subject which impels me to come directly to you. I wish to lay before the people of my State a matter and a situation which I do not think has heretofore confronted them.

Let us get the issue clear. Labor leaders within and without the State have determined that I must by all means be defeated for the United States Senate in the primary on May 29. It is well known that instructions to this effect are now being circulated throughout North Carolina. These instructions come largely from nonresident labor leaders whose chief interest is to preserve their own dictatorial power. I am their chief target. Let there be no mistake about that. If I should be defeated, these labor leaders would consider it a great victory. The question is, Will the people of North Carolina be dominated and controlled by instructions from out-of-State labor leaders?

The background of this situation is as follows:

On the 13th of August, last year, Mr. George L. Googe, of Atlanta, Ga., came into our State and delivered an address at Wilmington to the North Carolina Federation of Labor. He was quoted by the press as follows: "A flat prediction of the political downfall of five southern Senators was on the record of the North Carolina Federation of Labor Convention here Wednesday after George L. Googe, A. F. of L. southern director, blasted the Taft-Hartley labor law and its congressional supporters. The union leader named North Carolina's Senators CLYDE R. HOEY and WILLIAM B. UMSTEAD; Senator MAYBANK, of South Carolina; Senator STEWART, of Tennessee; and Senator RUSSELL, of Georgia, as labor's targets in reelection campaigns.

"Googe told cheering A. F. of L. delegates that a Negro vote of 2,500,000 would be polled in the South, and would naturally drift into the same brackets as the labor vote. Googe declared that increased labor activity would spell defeat for the North Carolina Senators in their reelection efforts. Senator UMSTEAD was singled out by Googe for an especially bitter attack because the Senator supported the Taft-Hartley bill."

Upon first reading this amazing statement by this man from Atlanta, I thought it was only another convention speaker, carried away by his own eloquence. It appeared wise to discount his vicious attack upon Senator HOEY and myself, and his attempt to inject the race issue into the politics of our commonwealth. However, there has now been set up in our State an organization known as the United Labor Political Committee for North Carolina. I understand that on Monday, February 23, in the Yadkin Hotel, in Salisbury, N. C., the political committee referred to, composed of the leaders of the CIO and other labor organizations, met to confer and decide on what candidates they should support in the coming primary. I understand that the labor leaders at this meeting determined that organized labor in North Carolina should not support my candidacy. I also understand that Mr. Googe and northern CIO leaders were present, and that since that time the word has been passed down the line that I must be defeated. I accept this challenge.

The question here is more important and fundamental to our concepts of representative government, and to political harmony in our State, than any question which has arisen since the turn of the century. It transcends in importance the outcome of my political fortune, or that of any other candidate at this time.

Is it possible today that Mr. Googe and CIO leaders from out of our State can bring orders which must be obeyed by the voters of North Carolina? I cannot believe that the honest men and women in organized labor in our commonwealth, many of whom are my life-long friends, will submit to such whip-cracking without protest. I am unwilling to believe that the thousands of unorganized workers in North Carolina, some of whom I served with during World War I in France, will be influenced by orders which come from outside the State. I am yet to believe that organized workers are so forgetful that they do not remember with appreciation my votes in support of the Wagner Labor Act, the wage and hour law, the Social Security Act, the Walsh-Healey Act, and other legislation beneficial to labor which passed during the first 6 years of the Roosevelt administration, when I was a Member of Congress.

But I am under attack because I voted for the Taft-Hartley Act. This act has perhaps been more abused, and less understood, than any act of national importance passed by Congress in many years. Already labor leaders are seeking to repeal it, and working people are being asked to contribute millions of dollars for this purpose. This effort will succeed or fail in accordance with the judgment of the general public, and such judgment must depend upon an understanding of the facts.

The Taft-Hartley Act is only an amendment of the Wagner Act. As a Member of Congress, I voted for passage of the Wagner Act in 1935. It recognized labor unions by law; the right of labor to organize; the right of collective bargaining and the legality of labor contracts worked out by such process; it defined as unfair labor practices certain acts of employers; and established the National Labor Relations Board, and procedure for its administration, including methods of enforcement of its orders. All this was done in the hope that it would protect the rights of labor, reduce strikes, promote the general welfare of all the people, and be productive of industrial peace.

Between July 1935, and January 1947, some labor leaders abused the rights granted under the Wagner Act, and began to exercise their powers in ways which disregarded the public welfare, and in some instances challenged the power of the Government itself. Labor disputes increased. During the war years, the patriotic restraints of wartime, and the efforts of the War Labor Board maintained some degree of industrial peace. But even during those years, there were some labor leaders who defied the general welfare of the people. Mr. John L. Lewis called a coal strike in the midst of World War II. After the war, strikes were called in industries which affected the public health, security, and general welfare of all the people. This was illustrated by another coal strike called by Mr. John L. Lewis in cold weather, when his power had grown so great that he defied an order of a Federal Court of the United States, and was tried and convicted of contempt. Furthermore, certain labor leaders assumed a tremendous power over the rank and file of union members.

By the time the Eightieth Congress convened in January 1947, it was clear that public opinion in the Nation demanded action upon this question. After weeks and months of hearings, thorough debate, and detailed consideration the House on April 17, 1947, passed the labor bill by a vote of 308 to 107. On the 13th of May, the Senate passed a different bill by a vote of 68 to 24. These bills went to conference. The conference committee made its report, and it was adopted by the House by a vote of 320 to 79, and by the Senate by a vote of 54 to 17. The overwhelming vote by which this bill was passed, clearly indicated a demand from the people of the Nation for the enactment of this legislation for the protection of the general welfare. It did not repeal the Wagner Labor Act. It only amended it. It did not destroy the legal recognition of unions. It did not eliminate unfair labor practices on the part of employers contained in the original act. It was not a perfect bill. However, it did offer some measure of protection to the American people, and a large amount of protection to members of unions and to workers in general.

The following are some of its main provisions:

1. It outlaws the closed shop in which no one is permitted to work unless he belongs to the union. It does authorize a union shop in which the worker does not have to belong to the union to get a job, but has to join the union to keep the job, provided a majority of all workers in the affected unit vote in favor of a union shop. The authority for a union shop does not apply in States which have passed laws to prohibit it.

2. It allows the dues of a union member to be deducted from his wages by the employers only if the worker himself agrees in writing.

3. It requires the officials of labor unions to make reports on dues collected and for what they are spent.

4. It permits employers to talk to workers about labor unions.

5. It provides protection to the individual employee against intimidations or threats by either employers or unions.

6. It prohibits strikes and lockouts over the termination, modification, or renewal of a contract for a period of 60 days after notice.

7. It permits a company to sue a union if the union breaks its contract just as the company may be sued by the union if it breaks its contract.

8. It requires union officials to file affidavits that they are not Communists.

9. It permits the Labor Board under certain conditions to obtain injunctions and, in industries considered vital to the general welfare, it allows the Government to get a court order preventing a strike for a limited period while attempts are made to settle the dispute.

10. It undertakes to prevent secondary boycotts and jurisdictional strikes, which have been so bitterly condemned by the public generally and which have never been substantially defended by anyone.

11. It requires the Labor Board to conduct its hearings and trials in keeping with the established principles of fair play and justice.

12. It forbids discrimination by unions in the assessment of dues and initiation fees.

13. It requires both unions and employers to bargain in good faith.

Time does not permit me to discuss in further detail the provisions of this act. It has now been in operation for a number of months. Whom has it enslaved? Whose rights has it taken away?

Is there a workingman in North Carolina, who does not believe that it is fair to the public and to everyone concerned that a strike notice of 60 days be given, in connection with disputes regarding a labor contract? Is it not fair that both unions and employers should be required to keep their contracts and be liable for suit for failure to do so? Does not every union member believe that the union officials should be required to furnish financial statements of the moneys collected in dues and assessments and for what they are spent? Do you not believe, as a union member, that you should have the right to say over your signature if you are willing that your dues be deducted from your pay? Since communism now threatens the United States and democracy everywhere, could there be anyone who objects to the requirement that union officials be compelled to sign an affidavit that they are not Communists?

I now wish to emphasize another fundamental phase of this question, which further affects the national welfare and general security of our people.

Seldom has there been a time in the minds of our people when there was a graver concern about the present and future security of our Nation. There are reasons both strong and distressing why this is true. Almost 3 years after winning a world war, we have not even approached attainment of anything like stable conditions, and permanent world peace. It has been necessary to strive against great odds for such little progress as has been achieved. Some say this, that, or the other should or should not have been done. There are in good faith wide differences of opinion. We seek and hope and pray for attainment of that day when in deed and in fact, nations may live at peace with each other. Men and women the world over are working daily for such an achievement, but progress is slow. The world is disturbed and threatened. Our international relations are strained. I am among those who believe that another war can, and I hope will, be averted. Yet frankness compels recognition of the cold and unwelcomed reality, that in the present condition of world affairs no one is wise enough today to predict what may come tomorrow. Should that uncertainty happen from which we all pray to be delivered, the full force and industrial power of America would have to be thrown into the breach as never before. This should be clear in the minds of everyone.

The European recovery program is the most comprehensive investment in peace ever undertaken by any nation in the history of time. It aims to assist the nations of western Europe in getting back once again upon a self-sustaining basis. The lamps of freedom must not suffer a black-out in the remaining friendly capitals of Europe. During the initial period of this program it will be necessary for us to furnish large quantities of the necessities of life, as well as supplies, machinery, tools, and other equipment essential to their recovery. This will continue or even increase the demand for production in our country. Its failure might well mean the collapse of world stability. Its successful achievement will put America to the test. The die is cast. Our course has been determined. We must now succeed or fail. Success requires continued and increased production on the farms and the factory, and anything which interferes with or decreases production now endangers the freedom of the world.

At home conditions likewise reveal the necessity for higher production. The cost of living has seriously increased. We are in the midst of a dangerous inflation. Whether it should be so or not, the production of more goods has come to be the chief reliance for avoiding disaster.

Recently we have witnessed another coal strike, and its effect upon the production of steel and other industries. Many people were thrown out of employment. Its continuance would have left millions without jobs, and would have strangled the industrial life of the Nation. Under the terms of the Taft-Hartley Act, the Government has the right to restrain and delay strikes for a short period of time in industries essential to the general welfare and safety of the Nation. This is exactly what was done in the recent coal strike. This is what John L. Lewis and certain other labor leaders do not like. They want the right to exercise unbridled power, regardless of its effect upon the Nation. The question really is, whether the Government shall have the power in these perilous times to safeguard the public interest and protect our national security, or whether this power shall continue to be arbitrarily exercised by certain labor leaders responsible only to themselves.

I repeat that there is nothing in this act which injures or enslaves the worker. There are many provisions which free the worker. The act does not destroy the basic rights of labor such as the right to organize, to bargain collectively, to strike, to collect union dues, to engage in free speech and peaceful assembly. It is true that the act curtails the power of certain national labor leaders who at times have used that power blindly and without proper regard for either the workers themselves, the public in general, or the welfare of the Nation.

I was in Congress when the Wagner labor law was passed. It did not please me in its entirety, but I voted for it because I felt that some such legislation was then needed. By the same token, I voted for the Taft-Hartley bill in 1947 because I felt that some proper amendments to the Wagner Act were as necessary then, as the original law in 1935. I shall maintain an open mind on the question of amendments of this act, just as I shall with respect to any other act of Congress, so long as I am in the Senate. If in due time under the operation of the present law, it develops that injustices prevail, or that the best interest of the public requires that changes should be made, I shall be among those interested in the perfection of the law for the best interest of all the people, and peaceful relations throughout our great industrial structure.

I was born and reared on a farm where I worked, with the exception of 1 year, until I was 21. I know what it means to make a living with one's hands. Physical work, whether it be on the farm or in the factory, is honorable and does honor and credit to every man who with his hands makes his living. My whole life, and an accurate statement of my attitude toward laboring people, sustain me in saying that I have always viewed their rightful aspirations and their difficulties with a sympathetic understanding. In some instances, practices have been carried on which have invaded the efforts and rights of farmers of North Carolina, such as coal strikes, strikes in the oil and farm implement industry, interference with the delivery of farm produce to northern markets, and strikes in redrying plants in the tobacco sections of North Carolina, and may well at time seriously endanger the handling of seasonable crops. Farming is the pride of our State, and must be advanced and protected. Farmers worked long and late without complaint during the World War in producing food and fiber for our men fighting freedom's battle around the world. They have no calendar save the seasons; no limited working period save the rising and setting of the sun; no guaranteed wage save what they can earn in battling the elements and uncertain growing seasons. They, too, need and must have the protection of our Government.

Obviously, the growth of our Nation, the development of our industry, and the increase of millions of men and women who work with their hands, have made it necessary that machinery be set up by the Government to protect the people from unwarranted abuses and excesses by either labor or industry. The objective of all such protective legislation should be that it be fair; that it recognize the rights of labor and industry; and the rights of the public also. Labor unions have grown as they had the right to grow. Labor has contributed to the development of this Nation in times of peace and to its defense in times of war. Its rights along with the rights of industry and the best interest of the people must be preserved. But, the time has come in America when it should be understood by all that if we are to maintain our democratic form of government, then no group however strong it may be, should be permitted in its own interest to endanger the public welfare, or undertake by its strength and numbers to control our Government. The patriotic worker in North Carolina, I think, has no desire for this. He does desire fair and adequate protection under the law along with every other group, so that he may pursue his trade in peace with steady work, with a maximum benefit to himself and his family, and make a continuing contribution to the welfare of the Nation. The labor law of 1947 has not yet and will not, in my judgment, place a single shackle upon a single worker in our State. On the other hand, it brings to each union member a new power in the control and operation of his union, the protection of his rights, the rights of industry, the rights of the public and the security of our Government.

Thus, I have briefly recited the facts about the Taft-Hartley Act. If I had been unwilling to support this bill, if I had ignored the rights of the average citizen; if I had been willing to permit John L. Lewis and certain other labor leaders in this country to proceed with unbridled power; if I had been willing for Communists to fill the ranks of labor unions; if I had been blind to the great demand from our people to curb the power of certain labor leaders in the interest of the public welfare, or finally, if I had been unmindful of the dictates of my conscience, I would have voted against the Taft-Hartley bill. I then, no doubt, would have received the praise of Mr. Googe and the out-of-State CIO leaders, and, most likely, I would have been endorsed by them at their meeting in Salisbury.

If I had not voted to curb the power of certain labor dictators, I would have been unfaithful to the union members of this country, to the unorganized workers, to the farmers, the school teachers, the clerks, the housewives, the merchants, and the millions who risked their lives in combat on foreign soil to preserve freedom and destroy dictators, and to the general public. I would also have been unfaithful to our national heritage, to the fundamental principles upon which our Government is based, and to all those since the foundation of this Republic who have worked and struggled in the belief that there should be equal rights to all, and special privileges to none.

As your Senator in the United States Senate, I feel that my position should be stated frankly and without evasion or equivocation. This I have done. I have met the challenge, and I seek the support of the citizens of North Carolina.

Hiram W. Johnson

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 21 (legislative day of Monday, March 29), 1948

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. HIRAM W. JOHNSON, late a Senator from the State of California

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, on August 6, 1945, Senator HIRAM W. JOHNSON passed away at the United States Naval Hospital at Bethesda, Md. He first came to the Senate in 1917 in time to hear President Woodrow Wilson ask Congress for a declaration against imperial Germany. He served through the period of World War I, the postwar years, and all but the concluding phase of World War II. His death might be said to have brought to a close one epoch of American life.

For more than 35 years HIRAM JOHNSON played a vital role in the political life of California and the Nation. For nearly 6½ years he was Governor of his State, and for 30 years he was a United States Senator.

HIRAM JOHNSON strode upon the national stage in 1910 when he won the election as California's Governor. Subsequently, he was elected a Member of the United States Senate for five terms. Twice he was a candidate for the Republican Presidential nomination. Once he declined the Vice Presidential nomination. Acceptance then—and a heartbeat—would have made him Chief Executive on the death of President Warren G. Harding.

JOHNSON was born in Sacramento, California's capital, on September 2, 1866. He was the son of Grover L. and Annie Johnson, who had gone to California from Syracuse, N. Y., 3 years before the birth of the future Senator and political leader.

He attended public schools in Sacramento where, as a boy, he was especially interested in outdoor sports. He captained both the baseball and football teams at high school. He never lost interest in sports for, throughout his years in the Senate, he was a regular attendant at baseball games when the Washington American League team played at home.

HIRAM JOHNSON entered the University of California as a member of the class of 1888. He left college in his junior year to study law with his father, who, in later years, was to become receiver of the United States Land Office at Sacramento.

While still a university student, JOHNSON married Minnie L. McNeil of Sacramento. There were two sons, Hiram W. Johnson, Jr., and the late Archibald M. Johnson.

After he left college, JOHNSON became a shorthand reporter and studied law in his father's office. He was admitted to legal practice in 1888, established his own law office in Sacramento, and moved to San Francisco in 1902.

When the famous graft prosecutions began in San Francisco following the 1906 fire and earthquake, JOHNSON was named assistant to Special Prosecutor Francis J. Heney. Heney had been appointed to help District Attorney William H. Langdon in the case, and when Heney was shot in the courtroom, JOHNSON took his place.

In 1910, following the formation of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League in California, JOHNSON was urged to become a candidate for governor. He accepted, carried on a strenuous automobile speaking tour throughout the State, and he won the Republican nomination in a four-way race. He won the election in November of that year and on his inauguration he won fame as a progressive.

JOHNSON won credit for such progressive legislation as the initiative, referendum and recall, strengthening of the direct primary, woman's suffrage, nonpartisan elections for city and county positions, workmen's compensation, child-labor laws, public employment offices, 8-hour law for women and underground miners, prison reforms, free public-school textbooks, regulation of weights and measures, pure-food laws, a "blue sky" law to protect investors, immigrant and migratory worker protection, collection of wage claims, the Red Light Abatement Act, antialien land statutes, and many other accomplishments.

JOHNSON took his stand at Armageddon with Theodore Roosevelt in 1912, running as the Progressive Party's nominee for Vice President.

Following his bolt in 1912, he continued in the Progressive Party and won reelection with that label in 1914. He thus became the first 4-year-term Governor of California to be reelected.

Returning to Republican ranks in 1916, JOHNSON was a candidate for United States Senator. He won at the primaries by about 15,000 votes and easily defeated his Democratic opponent at the general election. He resigned the governorship in 1917 to take the oath as Senator, handing over the governorship to William D. Stephens, whom he had appointed as lieutenant governor.

JOHNSON won by 300,000 at the November election, while Charles Evans Hughes, Republican nominee for President, lost the State at the same election by around 3,500.

In 1919 JOHNSON allied with Henry Cabot Lodge, William Borah, James Reed, and other irreconcilables to oppose America's entrance in the League of Nations. He was a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and then, as he did in the United Nations hearings, opposed what he termed "entangling alliances" with European nations.

When President Wilson took the stump to "sell" the League to the American people, JOHNSON trailed the President through the Western States, speaking in vigorous oposition to the Wilson program, and he fought the League on the Senate floor.

Then, in 1920, JOHNSON was a candidate for the Republican nomination for President.

Old feuds were forgotten and a California delegation made up of all elements of his party was sent to Chicago to back JOHNSON'S candidacy. At the Chicago convention, JOHNSON received 133½ votes on the first ballot but his strength had shrunk to 80⅘ votes by the tenth ballot, when Harding was nominated. JOHNSON refused the suggestion of Harding managers that he take second place on the ticket as the running mate for the Ohio Senator. It went to Calvin Coolidge instead, and Coolidge became President.

When the 1922 senatorial election rolled around, JOHNSON was a candidate for relection to the Senate. His opponent was Charles C. Moore, who had been president of the Panama Pacific International Exposition in 1915, but who never had been in politics.

In a State-wide campaign, JOHNSON won by 74,000 votes.

In the intervals between his campaigns, JOHNSON'S greatest legislative accomplishment was his successful coauthorship of the Swing-Johnson bill which made possible the huge Boulder Dam project to harness the waters of the Colorado and provide power and water for many communities in southern California.

In 1928, JOHNSON was reelected with only nominal opposition.

He broke with the Hoover administration soon after the only resident of California to become President had entered the White House.

In 1932, JOHNSON bolted the Republican ticket and urged election of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

When the Democratic administration was being organized, JOHNSON was asked to become Secretary of Interior. He refused, and his old friend from the Bull Moose Party days of Theodore Roosevelt, Harold L. Ickes, was named.

JOHNSON broke with the Roosevelt administration over New Deal legislation, the abortive Supreme Court packing attempt, and the administration's foreign policy.

To the end of his career, the fighting Californian stood firm against the repeal of the Johnson Act, which banned additional credits to nations in defaults on American loans made during, or after, World War I.

JOHNSON'S fourth consecutive term followed the 1934 general election when California again returned him to the Senate. At the primary he had won the Republican, Progressive, and Democratic nominations.

By the greatest vote of his career, JOHNSON was reelected for his fifth consecutive term on November 5, 1940. Again he had won the Republican, Democratic, and Progressive nominations from his opponents at the August primary with ease. JOHNSON'S vote for his fifth term set a record—2,238,899—topping any previous total given a candidate in California. In the 1940 Presidential campaign, JOHNSON backed Wendell Willkie for the Presidency.

Governor Dewey, Republican nominee in 1944, also was supported by JOHNSON.

JOHNSON took no active part in political State-wide campaigning in later years. His own final campaign consisted principally of a few statements of policy and limited radio broadcasts.

Senator JOHNSON fought the pre-Pearl Harbor moves of the Roosevelt administration, constantly insisting the President was leading the United States into war.

The doughty warrior made one of his final last stands in his opposition within the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to the Mexican Water Treaty early in 1945.

The same papers that carried the news of the death of the California senior Senator also disclosed to the public for the first time a dropping of the first atomic bomb at Hiroshima. An epoch had ended, the Atomic Age had begun.

Fire 'Em If They Enforce a Law That You Don't Like But Which Congress Will Not Repeal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE P. MILLER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 18 (legislative day of Thursday, June 17), 1948

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, as the Washington Post observed in an editorial of June 16 entitled "Congressional Club," it was a very dark day in the history of the United States Congress when the Interior Department appropriation bill for 1949 was passed with a provision that would fire Michael W. Straus, commissioner, and Richard L. Boke, California regional director of the Bureau of Reclamation, for enforcing the public power policy and the family-farm provisions of the reclamation law that Congress has written and maintained on the statute books.

The ouster rider is dressed up as a requirement that the commissioner, assistant commissioners, and regional directors of reclamation should be engineers of 5 years' experience. This was made a time bomb planted under the chairs of Straus and Boke, who are not engineers, by making it effective January 31, 1949. The very manner in which this provision came about, its recommendation by the Harness committee on one-sided evidence and before permitting any Interior Department or Reclamation witnesses to be heard, and the time-bomb effective date which transparently was fixed to place it after the inauguration of the President who is elected in November of this year—all lend color to the charges that are rife from coast to coast.

These are reflected in such phrases as "Skulduggery rears its ugly head in Congress," with which the San Francisco News headed its editorial of June 2 on the subject; "It smells of politics," with which the Valley Evening Monitor of McAllen, Tex., headed its editorial of May 28 on the subject; and "What the interests don't think of," with which the Des Moines Register headed its editorial of June 3 on the subject.

I include the text of the editorials to which I have referred, since they state the case better than I could by paraphrasing them:

[From the Washington Post of June 16, 1948]

CONGRESSIONAL CLUB

A notable victory has been won by Senator SHERIDAN DOWNEY. He has succeeded in punishing two Government officials, Michael Straus, Reclamation Commissioner, and Richard Boke, regional director of the Reclamation Bureau, because they dared in opposition to his wishes, to insist upon application of the acreage limitation provisions of the reclamation law to the Central Valley of California. The punishment was effected by a neat little ruse which is a testimonial to Senator DOWNEY'S ingenuity if not to his ethics. A rider was attached to the Interior Department appropriation bill requiring that the Reclamation Commissioner, the Assistant Commissioner, and regional directors be engineers with at least 5 years of engineering experience. Mr. Straus and Mr. Boke, although they have admirable records of service in the Bureau, do not possess this particular—and wholly irrelevant—qualification.

Congress, having now acted to satisfy the personal spleen of Senator DOWNEY, might do well to count the cost. It may entail a complete subversion of the reclamation law which has had the support of Republican and Democratic administrations alike since the turn of the century. It will probably entail a huge handout to a few of Senator DOWNEY's large landowning constituents and a total denial of the Central Valley project's benefits to veterans and others who would like to be small landowners. And it will certainly entail a degradation of the United States Congress which has now let itself be used as a thumbscrew to wreak vengeance upon individuals who incurred the displeasure of one of its elite members.

Senator O'MAHONEY, a very astute judge of this sort of thing, says that the rider is unconstitutional in that it prescribes qualifications solely for the purpose of inflicting punishment on Commissioner Straus and Regional Director Boke. But Senator DOWNEY insists that it gets around the constitutional prohibition against bills of attainer in that it does not actually name its victims. How exceedingly clever of him. This must be a red-letter day, indeed, in Senator DOWNEY's career. But it is a very dark day in the history of the United States Congress.

[From the San Francisco News of June 2, 1948]

SKULDUGGERY REARS ITS UGLY HEAD IN CONGRESS

We doubt if congressional annals record any action more disgraceful and dishonest than that of the House of Representatives last week in passing the Interior Department appropriation bill with a series of riders attached, the effect of which is to fire two officials without a hearing, hamstring the Bureau of Reclamation, and wreck the Central Valley project.

It is impossible to believe the Senate, to which the bill now goes for consideration, will be an accessory to such a parliamentary crime.

With respect to the two officials, here is the story: California's Senator SHERIDAN DOWNEY some time ago, in his fight against the Department and the Bureau, demanded that President Truman dismiss Reclamation Commissioner Michael Straus and Regional Director Richard Boke. The President refused to do so. Recently, Representative FOREST HARNESS, playing DOWNEY's game, demanded that a subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, headed by Representative BEN JENSEN, add a rider to the Reclamation appropriation bill specifying that the positions of Director and regional director must be filled by registered engineers. Neither Straus nor Boke is an engineer. Chairman JENSEN did not comply, although he has been sympathetic with the attack on the two officials. But when the appropriation bill came up for passage in the House an amendment was offered adding the rider and the bill passed in that form. At no time did the committee give either Straus or Boke a chance to reply to the charges against them. They thus stand condemned by the House without a hearing.

Why were these desperate, underhanded, and grossly unfair tactics employed by the foes of the Central Valley project? It was to push out of the way two men who have stood resolutely for enforcement of the terms of the United States Reclamation Act in regard to acreage limitation and multiple public development of natural resources in the big California project. It is a momentary and ignoble victory for the forces that have fought the CVP from the beginning. The shady scheme to oust the two officials by gestapo methods is only a part of the general plot. Other riders attached to the bill prohibit use of power revenue to reduce the cost of irrigation water to farmers; prevent sale of power to any customer except the P. G. & E., and forbid surveys for use of CVP power outside California (a way of stopping a tie-in of Bonneville and Shasta power).

These nefarious steps were taken at the last moment before adjournment of Congress in the hope the Senate will, because of pressure of time, be unable to take the objectionable riders off the bill without risking the danger of a conference filibuster that would prevent final passage of the measure and leave the Reclamation Bureau without funds for the next fiscal year. If the bill passes in its present form, President Truman will hardly be able to veto it for the same reason.

The Members of Congress who were parties to this shabby trickery have the dubious satisfaction of knowing they accomplished by indirection what they dared not do in the open.

The News believes there is too much honor in the Senate to permit that branch of Congress to be made a party to such proceedings. The Senate Appropriations Committee can do no less than call Straus and Boke before it for a full and public hearing and, if it finds them guilty of the charges, recommend their dismissal in the regular way, not by the dishonest method of a rider on the appropriations bill requiring that only engineers can hold their jobs.

[From the McAllen (Tex.) Valley Evening Monitor of May 28, 1948]

IT SMELLS OF POLITICS

There is a distinctive odor to that Interior Department appropriation bill which the House passed this week in Washington.

The scent smells strongly of politics. The bill carries a whopping big sum for the Department, one agency of which is the United States Bureau of Reclamation, an organization in which the valley is vitally interested because of the proposed valley gravity project. While the funds approved by the bill are less than President Truman recommended, they still are $112,000,000 larger than the Department received for the current year. They total over $375,000,000.

This increase in itself is an expression of confidence in the Department. But a California Congressman tagged onto the bill a rider which provides for the removal of the Reclamation Commissioner and the regional director in California. How many others are affected by the rider, if any, is not disclosed. The peculiar provision is that the director of the Bureau and the directors of its regional offices be men with at least 10 years' engineering experience.

The Congressman who offered the rider declared that the two men, the Bureau director and the regional director in California, were incompetent. The statement has the sound of personal opinion, a shallow basis indeed for consideration of any measure providing so much money.

Just as shallow, it seems, is the provision for 10 years' experience as an engineer. Why 10 years? Why not 15, or 20, or 5? When is an engineer experienced—or inexperienced?

The Reclamation Bureau has been in operation for many years. It has a wealth of experience behind it. But it evidently has not concluded, on the basis of that experience, that a man must serve for 10 years to be a capable engineer. How can a Congressman know what is best for Bureau administration?

It is impossible at this distance of course to know the true score on the Interior Department legislation.

But it has all the signs of being a case in which there's a bug under the chip.

It sounds like some California politician is irked at the bureau director because he possibly has declined to take his advice, or that of some of his more powerful constituents. As a result he's out for the director's hide.

It would be educational to see the Senate investigate this case when the bill goes to that Chamber for action.

[From the Des Moines Register of June 3, 1948]

WHAT THE "INTERESTS" DON'T THINK OF

Once again certain Congressmen are trying by legislative fiat to fire some Interior Department employees they do not like.

Only last year Congress was given a stinging rebuke for this by the Supreme Court, which said it was unconstitutional—in fact a "bill of attainder"—to name employees for whom appropriations might not be used.

This year, in deference to the Supreme Court, a little less direct method is being tried. The appropriations bill passed last week by the lower House does not name names. It simply sets up requirements which the incumbents cannot meet. It requires 10 years of engineering experience for posts in the Bureau of Reclamation now held by Michael W. Straus and Richard Boke.

We don't know Straus and Boke (though a friend of ours who does writes that they are "honest and competent"). But we do know that it is highly improper for Congress to usurp the functions of the executive branch.

Here's how it happened.

The whole ruckus is part of the perennial feud in California's Central Valley between the power companies and the big landowners on one side and the public interest in family-sized homesteads on reclaimed land on the other.

Straus and Boke are under fire because they insisted on enforcing the law (on the books since Theodore Roosevelt's time), limiting holdings to 160 acres. An attempt to repeal this law failed recently in Congress.

An attempt to legislate Straus and Boke out of office was sprung on the Appropriations Committee. Iowa's BEN JENSEN is chairman, and he did not include it in his report. So Representative ALFRED J. ELLIOTT (Democrat, California) offered the disguised "bill of attainder" from the floor, as an amendment to that section of the regular Appropriations bill.

ELLIOTT was perfectly frank about it.

He attacked Straus and Boke personally.

Representative ALBERT GORE (Democrat, Tennessee) pointed out that ELLIOTT's amendment was not based on principle, but on a desire "to get rid of the present Reclamation Commissioner." But with nearly 80 percent of the House absent, ELLIOTT got the votes, the amendment was passed, and the Interior Department appropriations were sent to the Senate for action.

The Senate has a chance to strike this improper amendment from the bill, and hold firm in conference committee.

It would be unthinkable for a Republican House in an election year to let the whole Interior Department die just to help a Democrat spite a couple of Reclamation officials who support the principle of the family-sized farm, as required by an act of Congress.

Charles Oscar Andrews

OF

HON. SPESSARD L. HOLLAND

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 21 (legislative day of Monday, March 29), 1948

In the life, character, and public service of Hon. CHARLES OSCAR ANDREWS, late a Senator from the State of Florida

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, Senator CHARLES O. ANDREWS, Democrat of Florida, my distinguished predecessor, served as a Member of the Senate from November 3, 1936, until his passing here in Washington on September 18, 1946. He was nominated to the Senate in a special primary held August 11, 1936, and elected at the general election of that year to fill the unexpired term of 4 years of Park Trammell, who had died the previous May 8, 1936. Senator ANDREWS had had a career of service in all of the major branches of the State government of Florida. He was not very well known by the public at large but had a sincere and loyal group of friends who, upon his announcement for the Senate, became very active in his behalf. Practically all of the large daily newspapers in the State, except the two daily newspapers in his home town, the Orlando Morning Sentinel and the Orlando Reporter Star, supported his opponent, a distinguished former Governor of Florida, and almost unanimously asked Senator ANDREWS to withdraw from the race, inasmuch as they felt he had no chance for election. Notwithstanding these discouragements Senator ANDREWS was supported so loyally by his State-wide circle of friends that he was nominated to the Senate and subsequently elected. He was renominated and reelected in 1940, but had announced in October 1945 that he would not seek reelection in 1946 because he felt that his health was such that he would not be permitted to give the full measure of service that the people of Florida were entitled to expect of their elected representatives.

It appeared that, with the adjourning of Congress, Senator ANDREWS relaxed, in that he felt that in a measure his work had been done, and he became less able to carry on his daily routine and had gone to the Naval Medical Center at Bethesda, Md., early in September for a check up and instructions before leaving for his home in Orlando, Fla., and it was there that he died in his sleep on September 18, 1946.

At this point I ask to have reproduced a letter from President Truman to Mrs. Andrews, dated September 18, 1946:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, September 18, 1946.

Mrs. CHARLES O. ANDREWS,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MRS. ANDREWS: I have heard with deep sorrow of the death of your distinguished husband. I came to know his quality as a man and as a statesman when I served with him in the Senate. He had courage and common sense and a finely balanced judicial mind. Through his passing I have lost a valued personal friend and Florida and the country have lost a devoted and able public servant.

Mrs. Truman joins me in this expression of sympathy.

Very sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

I also ask to have reproduced herein a letter to Senator ANDREWS from Senator VANDENBERG, dated May 24, 1946:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., May 24, 1946.

Hon. CHARLES O. ANDREWS,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CHARLES: Thanks for your letter of May 23.

I was sorry not to be able to attend the meeting of your special committee. But I am glad to note that everything is proceeding to your satisfaction. So long as it satisfies you, I am content to believe that it will satisfy me. This is only a small indication of my very deep respect for you—to which I may add a word of genuine affection.

With warm personal regards and best wishes.

Cordially and faithfully,

A. H. VANDENBERG.

I also ask leave to have reproduced herein as a part of my remarks my brief tribute to Senator ANDREWS as it appears in the RECORD of the joint memorial service in the House of Representatives conducted May 19, 1947:

Mr. HOLLAND. Senator CHARLES O. ANDREWS was a native Floridian, born in Holmes County in the western part of the State on March 7, 1877. He was educated in the public schools of Florida, and in the South Florida Military Institute, a small but excellent military college then existing at my lifelong home, Bartow, Fla. It was while he was a cadet at that school that I first saw him. He also held diplomas from Florida State Normal and the University of Florida. In military activities he served as captain, Company M, First Regiment, Florida National Guard, and also volunteered for the Spanish-American War and applied for service in the First World War but was not accepted. He acquired invaluable experience as bill secretary of the Florida Senate. He was admitted to practice law, by the Supreme Court of Florida, in 1907, and by the Federal courts in 1911. His legal attainments and standing were of the highest. He served as judge of the criminal court, Walton County, 1910–11; as assistant attorney general of Florida, 1912–19; as circuit judge, 1919–25; and as a commissioner of the Florida Supreme Court, 1929–32. He was president of the Florida State Bar Association in 1921–22. In civic and fraternal affiliations he was a Rotarian and a Mason, a member of the Florida University Alumni Association, of Pi Kappa Alpha, social fraternity, and of Phi Delta Phi, legal fraternity. He was elected to the United States Senate November 3, 1936, and reelected for a 6-year term November 5, 1940. He received the honorary LL. D. degree from Rollins College, Winter Park, Fla., in 1941.

Senator ANDREWS married Miss Margaret Spears, of Tallahassee, Fla.—his beloved "Daisy"—to whose inspiration and influence he attributed much of his success. No man had a more devoted wife; and no children, of whom there were three, a more devoted mother.

It was as a young attorney that I first became closely acquainted with Senator ANDREWS. This was while he was a circuit judge in Florida and I had just begun the practice of law. From this acquaintance grew a friendship that increased in strength throughout the years and which was always a source of pleasure and inspiration to me. One of his outstanding contributions to the business life of Florida was his service as an attorney and as a citrus grower and citizen in organizing a State-wide agency for citrus growers and handlers known as the Florida Citrus Growers Clearing House Association, which he served as general counsel. He was entitled to much credit for the large amount of good which was accomplished by that organization.

A stanch defender of States' rights and imbued with a patriotism and love of his country transcending all other considerations, Senator ANDREWS believed in the literal interpretation of the Constitution. Indeed, with him it was truly the supreme law of the land. He made this known in the Senate upon his arrival in 1936 by joining forces immediately with others of his southern colleagues of like convictions on issues where either encroachment on or impairment of the powers reserved to the States was threatened. Senator ANDREWS' advice and opinion on constitutional questions was eagerly sought and highly regarded by his fellow Senators.

Although Senator ANDREWS had not been in robust health for some time, which was of great concern to his myriad friends in Florida as well as in Washington, his passing in the early hours of the morning last September 18 came as a shock to all of us. Of a kindly and sympathetic nature, with the modesty and gentleness that so become a gentleman, Senator ANDREWS from the very beginning of his service in the Senate formed friendships that endured to the end. He was recognized and loved for his sincerity of purpose and for his unwavering devotion to duty, said by General Lee, whom he idolized, to be the "sublimest word in the English language."

In conclusion, I ask leave to have reproduced an excerpt from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 2, 1946, the last day of Congress that year, showing spontaneous tributes paid to Senator ANDREWS on the floor of the Senate, together with various Florida newspaper articles and editorials paying tribute to him.

TRIBUTES TO SENATOR ANDREWS

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, my colleague, the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS], is voluntarily going out of the Senate at the conclusion of this session, and this bill will be the last session of the Senate which, so far as I know his present intentions, he will have the honor and distinction to attend.

I am sure that every Senator will miss the kindly, friendly, sincere, earnest, and patriotic senior Senator from Florida from this body. He is rounding out a distinguished career of public service which has carried him through the legislative, executive, and the judicial branches of the government of the State of Florida and of the Nation.

As I said, it was his own choice that he retire from the Senate, which he does for reasons of health which have plagued him for some time.

It has been a great privilege for me to share service in the Senate with the senior Senator from Florida. He will carry with him not only my affection and esteem, but I am sure the affection and esteem of every other Senator who has had the real pleasure and satisfaction of service with Senator ANDREWS in the Senate.

The State of Florida will be greatly the loser when his distinguished service is no longer being given to the State and to the Nation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the Senator from Florida in his expressions of esteem and good will toward the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS].

I have enjoyed not only the service of Senator ANDREWS here, but his personal friendship and his cooperation. I wish for him long life and health and happiness in whatever he undertakes. I hope that his departure from the Senate will not mean that we shall not, from time to time, allow our paths to merge so that we may see more of him in the future.

I thank the junior Senator from Florida for giving me this opportunity to express my high esteem and my personal affection for Senator ANDREWS.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the ideas expressed by the two Senators on the other side of the aisle toward our good friend the "Judge" as we call him. It has been my privilege to visit with him in his home. I know his fine wife, and I agree with everything that has been said about him. I am sorry that ill health has made it necessary for him to leave the Senate. The people of Florida would have been happy to send him back.

When I was in Florida, everywhere I went, I found people of all parties and of all creeds who really loved him. He had served on the bench with distinction, and has found a place in the hearts of many of his colleagues in the Senate.

We join in the wish of the majority leader that he may regain his health and in his fine home in Florida, down there among the lakes, will be able to enjoy the grandchildren and his family for many years to come.

Mr. MCFARLAND. Mr. President, I wish to join in what has been said about Senator ANDREWS. Since he has been in the Senate he has rendered great service to his State and to the Nation.

SENATOR ANDREWS SUCCUMBS TO HEART ATTACK—FLORIDA SOLON STRICKEN AT NAVY HOSPITAL; FUNERAL SUNDAY IN ORLANDO—TERM NEAR END—CORTEGE LEAVES WASHINGTON TODAY OVER ACL; ARRIVES AT HOME FRIDAY

WASHINGTON, September 18.—CHARLES OSCAR ANDREWS, of Orlando, Florida's conservative senior United States Senator for the past decade, died from a heart attack at 6 o'clock this morning in the Naval Hospital at nearby Bethesda, Md. He was 69.

Haunted by a heart ailment for the past 5 years, Senator ANDREWS entered the hospital 10 days ago for a periodic examination. He was in fine spirits early last night when his wife visited him. He had spent part of the day in a chair on the sun porch.

Mrs. Andrews said her husband's physicians advised her that the heart condition was not improving, but they believed if he would go to his Orlando residence early this fall and escape the severe Washington winter, his condition might improve.

Recently Senator ANDREWS wrote to friends in Jacksonville that he expected to leave Washington the latter part of September, and probably would not return unless an emergency developed or a special session of Congress was called. His term would have expired when the next Congress convened in January.

FUNERAL SET SUNDAY

Funeral services will be held at 3 o'clock Sunday afternoon in the First Presbyterian Church at Orlando, of which Senator ANDREWS had been a member for many years, and burial will be in Greenwood Cemetery. The Reverend L. E. McNair, formerly of Jacksonville, pastor emeritus, and the Reverend Marshall Dendy, pastor, will officiate.

The body will leave Washington at 4:40 o'clock tomorrow afternoon over the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad, and will arrive in Orlando Friday night.

Senator ANDREWS led a long, hard fight for passage of a bill which would repay Florida citrus and vegetable growers $10,000,000 in claims for damage done during a Mediterranean fruitfly eradication campaign in 1929. Just before Congress adjourned a few weeks ago, he pushed the bill to passage in the Senate, but it failed to get final consideration in the House.

Among the last bills Senator ANDREWS introduced was a proposed constitutional amendment to provide that no agency, individual, or organization should infringe upon a man's right to bargain individually or collectively with his employer.

He also was a strong supporter of a proposed cross-Florida barge canal, for which Congress repeatedly has denied funds.

Although Senator ANDREWS was not as close to the White House as Senator PEPPER during the long Roosevelt Administration, his contact with the Presidency became more intimate when Harry S. Truman—his old Senate seat mate—took the Presidential oath of office more than a year ago.

CHATTED WITH TRUMAN

Last week President Truman, on a visit to the naval hospital, visited Senator ANDREWS and they had a long chat.

Last winter, Senator ANDREWS announced he would not be a candidate to succeed himself. Later, he gave his public backing to his old friend, former Governor SPESSARD L. HOLLAND, who last May won the Democratic nomination, which virtually assures election in the general election in November.

Political circles here and in Florida expect Gov. Millard F. Caldwell to name HOLLAND to fill the unexpired term of Senator ANDREWS, but in Jacksonville today there was some talk that friends of Senator ANDREWS and his successor may ask Governor Caldwell to appoint Mrs. Andrews to fill the unexpired term. Governor Caldwell is in New York on business, and said he would have no statement on his action until after Senator ANDREWS' funeral.

Mrs. Andrews, her sister, Miss Sarah Spears of Jacksonville, Federal Judge Dozier DeVane of Orlando, a life-long friend of the family, and members of Senator ANDREWS' secretarial staff, will accompany the body to Orlando. Judge DeVane arrived from Orlando tonight. Miss Spears reached here at noon.

Senator ANDREWS is survived by his widow, the former Miss Daisy Spears, of Monticello; three sons, Charles O. Andrews Jr., an Orlando attorney, Lt. Thomas Oakley Andrews, and Edgar Andrews, of Lakeland; three grandchildren, Charles O. Andrews III and David W. Andrews of Orlando, and Thomas Oakley Andrews Jr., of Lakeland; two brothers, Oakley Andrews of Umatilla, and David H. Andrews of Tallahassee; three sisters, Mrs. Lee Padgett and Mrs. Joan Moore of Ponce de Leon, and Mrs. Alice Parish, of Bonifay.

In a rare Senate procedure, Senator ANDREWS and Senator CLAUDE PEPPER first took their seats on the same day 10 years ago, but in many cases their political careers have been divergent.

RARELY TOOK FLOOR

Senator PEPPER was the orator, whereas Senator ANDREWS rarely took the floor. He tended toward the conservative while Senator PEPPER became the leader of the liberals. While Senator PEPPER lined up almost invariably with the New Deal, Senator ANDREWS voted against Roosevelt bills as often as he supported them.

The soft-spoken Senator ANDREWS was a native Floridian, whose election in 1936 over former Gov. Doyle E. Carlton of Tampa was regarded as a major political upset. He rose to the Senate after a long public career devoted largely to secondary judicial positions.

While his younger colleague moved into the spotlight with his speeches on international affairs and domestic economic problems, Senator ANDREWS confined his activities more to the affairs of Florida.

Senator ANDREWS won the Senate nomination 10 years ago by a close 5,000 votes over Carlton in a special Democratic primary to fill the vacancy created by the death of Senator Park W. Trammell. On the same day, Senator PEPPER was nominated without opposition to succeed Senator Duncan U. Fletcher, who had died about 6 weeks before Trammell. Senator ANDREWS' age brought him the rank as senior Senator from Florida.

Senator ANDREWS was born at Sandy Creek in Holmes County, Fla, on March 7, 1877.

He was a high ranking member of the Naval Affairs Committee, and was instrumental in Jacksonville being chosen as the site for the United States naval air station.

AIDED SENATE PROJECT

He was chairman of the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee, and as such he steered to passage an appropriation for remodeling the Senate Chamber. Work of renovating the Chamber is under way. Senator ANDREWS had hoped that the project could be completed before his term expired.

He also held membership on the Immigration Committee, Rules Committee, Judiciary Committee, and the Public Lands and Survey Committee. He devoted much of his time to such activity, particularly on the Judiciary Committee.

Senator ANDREWS received his elementary education in the public schools of Holmes County, and received his higher education in the South Florida Military Institute, the Florida State Normal School and the University of Florida.

During the Spanish-American War he held the rank of captain in Company M, First Regiment, Florida National Guard, and volunteered for service. He applied for service in World War I but was rejected.

Senator ANDREWS began his political career as a bill clerk in the 1903 State senate session. He was admitted to practice law in 1907, and in 1910 he became judge of the Walton County Criminal Court of Record. From 1912 to 1919 he was an assistant Florida attorney general. Later he moved to Orlando and was elected judge of the Seventeenth Judicial Circuit, a post he held until 1925.

He represented Orange County in the State legislature in 1927, and from 1929 to 1932 he was one of the State supreme court commissioners, named to help the tribunal clear up a huge backlog of cases on its docket.

HEADED BAR ASSOCIATION

He was president of the Florida State Bar Association in 1921, and held membership in the Orange County Bar Association and the American Bar Association. He was a member of the Rotary Club, the York Rite bodies of Masonry, the Florida University Alumni Association, Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity, and was an honorary member of the legal fraternity of Phi Delta Phi. He held an honorary degree, LL. D., from Rollins College.

Senator ANDREWS was the first general counsel for the Florida Association of Real Estate Boards, counsel for the Florida Citrus Commission, and city attorney for Orlando.

The State's highest governmental officials were making plans in Florida today to attend the funeral. The State cabinet and the State supreme court both met in special session and sent expressions of condolence to the family.

Hundreds of telegrams of sympathy poured into Senator ANDREWS' office today, and many dignitaries, including representatives from the White House, called on Mrs. Andrews, President Truman will be represented by an aide at the funeral.

Senator PEPPER said that his colleague's death was "not only a great shock but a deep personal sorrow. He was loved and respected by those who worked with him in every path of life. The State has sustained an irreparable loss."

Representative EMORY H. PRICE, of the Second Florida District, en route to Florida, wired his condolences from Richmond, Va.

Governor Caldwell described Senator ANDREWS as a "splendid gentleman, a good Senator, level headed, who had common sense and was courageous."

Senator-nominee HOLLAND said Senator ANDREWS was one of "Florida's leaders and among its very best citizens."

President John J. Tigert of the University of Florida stated that Senator ANDREWS' passing "was a great loss to the Nation, the State, and to the University of Florida in particular."

Meanwhile, four veterans' organizations at Miami urged that HOLLAND be appointed to replace the vacancy resulting from Senator ANDREWS' death. The suggestion was incorporated in a telegram sent to Governor Caldwell.

FLORIDA'S SENIOR SENATOR PASSES AWAY IN SLEEP IN UNITED STATES NAVAL HOSPITAL—CENTRAL FLORIDA MOURNS PASSING OF PUBLIC SERVANT; FUNERAL SERVICES IN FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN ORLANDO ON SUNDAY

Florida's senior Senator and one of the most beloved and respected Members of the United States Senate, CHARLES O. ANDREWS, of Orlando, passed away in his sleep in the United States Naval Hospital in Washington, D. C., Wednesday of this week. The Senator had entered the hospital shortly over a week before for a check-up before returning to his home in Orlando after 3 years of failing health and wartime pressure while serving Florida in Congress.

Funeral services for the Senator will be held Sunday afternoon, at 3 p. m., in the First Presbyterian Church, of Orlando, the Reverend Marshall Dendy, officiating.

Senator ANDREWS had given some 30 years of his life to public service and had endeared himself to thousands of Floridians during his terms as assistant attorney general of Florida, judge of the seventeenth judicial circuit, city attorney of the city of Orlando, a member of the Florida Supreme Court Commission and, finally, as United States Senator from Florida, a position which he held from 1936 until his death this week.

A past president of the Florida Bar Association, a member of the Orlando Rotary Club, a Mason and a member of the First Presbyterian Church of Orlando, Senator ANDREWS had brought many improvements to his native State. Serving as a member of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee, he was responsible for much of the speed and efficiency with which our Navy rose to its wartime position of dominance of the world's sea lanes. His fight for the "Medfly" bill was outstanding among his senatorial accomplishments and was finally approved by his colleagues last July and will go before the House when Congress reconvenes in January. To Senator ANDREWS goes the credit for the Navy's selection of Jacksonville as a site for one of the largest training stations of the Nation, the securing of a new Federal building for Orlando and his help was a vital factor in the construction of the Banana River Naval Air Base in Cocoa.

High tribute was paid by citizens of Florida and the entire Nation to Senator ANDREWS this week as persons of all walks of life extended their condolences to the Andrews family.

Besides his wife, the Senator left his three sons, Charles O., Jr., of Winter Park, Thomas Oakley, and Edwin, who were living with the family in Washington at the time of his death.

SENATOR CHARLES O. ANDREWS TAKEN BY DEATH IN CAPITAL—FUNERAL SERVICES IN ORLANDO ON SUNDAY—SENATORIAL PARTY TO HONOR FLORIDIAN

(By Wilton Allen)

Senator CHARLES O. ANDREWS, Florida's senior Senator and one of the State's ablest statesmen, died unexpectedly of a heart attack yesterday at the United States Naval Hospital, Washington, D. C. He was 69.

Kept away from many Senate sessions during the past 2 years by illness and with only a few months of his term left to run until his voluntary retirement from public life because of ill health, Senator ANDREWS entered the hospital approximately 10 days ago for a physical check-up.

The Senator's body will leave Washington for Orlando today at 4:40 p. m., accompanied by congressional colleagues and members of the family.

Funeral services wil be held here Sunday at 3 p. m. in the First Presbyterian Church with the Reverend Dr. Marshall C. Dendy, pastor, officiating. Interment will be in Greenwood Cemetery.

According to word received in Tallahassee yesterday from Senator KENNETH D. MCKELLAR, Democrat, of Tennessee, President of the Senate, a senatorial party will arrive in Orlando Sunday to attend the funeral. Senator MCKELLAR said the group will be made up of Senators who are now on vacation from congressional duties, the party leaving Washington Saturday.

Senator ANDREWS is survived by his widow, the former Daisy Spears, of Tallahassee, and three sons, Charles O., Jr., of Winter Park, and Thomas Oakley and Edwin of Lakeland.

After some 30 years in public life, 10 of which he spent in Washington, Senator ANDREWS did not anticipate another term in the Senate. Last winter he announced that he would not be a candidate to succeed himself. Later, he gave his public support to former Gov. SPESSARD L. HOLLAND, who won the Democratic nomination last May.

In failing health for the past 3 years, the Senator planned instead to retire from public life and devote his remaining years to his interests in central Florida.

Mrs. Andrews was in Washington at the time of his death. A daily visitor to the Bethesda Hospital just outside Washington, she was notified yesterday at 5 a. m. that the Senator had suffered a heart attack, dying without regaining consciousness. He had appeared in no danger when she left the hospital Tuesday night.

As news of the Senator's death swept the Nation yesterday, high dignitaries, State and local officials, and friends paid tribute to the closing of a long and distinguished service in public life in expressions of sympathy and regret.

At Tallahassee the State cabinet and supreme court met in special session and sent expressions of condolence to the family. Meanwhile, the State's highest governmental officials made plans to attend the funeral here Sunday.

Regarded as an expert parliamentarian in the Senate, Senator ANDREWS was chairman of the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee and of the special committee charged with reconstruction of the Senate Chamber.

He was also a member of five other committees: Naval, Judiciary, Immigration, Public Lands and Surveys, and Rules.

As a member of the Naval Affairs Committee, Senator ANDREWS believed in a strong Navy and had much to do with putting it in as good shape as it was when the war broke out. In this connection he was instrumental in securing several naval bases throughout the State.

Among the last bills he introduced was a proposed constitutional amendment to provide that no agency, individual, or organization should infringe upon a man's right to bargain individually or collectively with his employer.

Long the champion of the Mediterranean fruitfly bill, he won Senate passage last August of a $10,000,000 appropriation to compensate growers for their losses sustained by the Mediterranean fruitfly infestation during the late 1920's, only to see it die in the House when Republicans threatened a filibuster until the predesignated adjournment hour. The bill, however, is scheduled to go before the House when Congress reconvenes in January.

He was also a strong supporter of the proposed cross-Florida barge canal, for which Congress repeatedly has denied funds.

Elected to the Senate in 1936 in a political upset, Senator ANDREWS defeated former Gov. Doyle E. Carlton for the Democratic nomination by some 5,000 votes in a special election to fill the vacancy created by the death of Senator Park W. Trammell.

On that same day, Senator CLAUDE PEPPER was nominated without opposition to succeed Senator Duncan U. Fletcher, who had died about 6 weeks before Trammell.

In rare Senate procedure, Senators ANDREWS and PEPPER took their seats on the same day 10 years ago, but in many respects their political careers have been divergent. Senator PEPPER was the orator whereas Senator ANDREWS rarely took the floor. Almost invariably, Senator PEPPER lined up with the New Deal, Senator ANDREWS voted against Roosevelt bills as often as he supported them. While his younger colleague became the leader of the liberals and moved into the limelight with speeches on international affairs and domestic economic problems, Senator ANDREWS leaned toward the conservative and confined his activities more to the affairs of state.

Soft spoken and mild mannered, lean and scholarly, Senator ANDREWS was not as close to the White House as Senator PEPPER during the Roosevelt administration. However, his contact with the Presidency became more intimate when Harry Truman—his old Senate seat mate—took the Presidential oath of office more than a year ago.

Senator ANDREWS died without seeing one of the greatest objectives of his senatorial career—the renovation of the outmoded House and Senate Chambers. He had devoted considerable time as chairman of the Buildings and Grounds Committee in joint work with a similar House committee to replace the sagging roofs and skylights and to provide each Chamber with modern lighting and acoustics.

The project had reached the bid-letting stage, but construction firms had refused to take on the job now because of the shortage of materials and uncertainty of labor costs.

He was largely responsible for Orlando securing its new Federal building and is given full credit for bringing the large naval base to Jacksonville after it had been turned down by naval authorities. Likewise, he was instrumental in obtaining the Banana River Naval Air Base near Cocoa as well as other projects throughout the State.

Senator ANDREWS at various times served as a clerk in the State senate, judge of the criminal court of records in Walton County, assistant attorney general for the State, judge of the seventeenth judicial circuit, Orange County representative in the State legislature, and as a member of a special State supreme court commission.

In addition, he was the first general counsel for the Florida Association of Real Estate Boards, counsel for the Florida Citrus Commission, city attorney for Orlando, and served one term as president of the State bar association.

In Orlando, where he practiced law for many years with his son, Charles O., Jr., he was a Mason and a member of the Rotary Club and the Presbyterian Church.

The son of a Confederate veteran, Senator ANDREWS was born in west Florida's Holmes County, the seventh of 10 children. He was educated in the public schools, the old South Florida Military Institute and the University of Florida. He was graduated from the University of Florida and admitted to the bar in 1907.

A captain in the National Guard, he volunteered for service in the Spanish-American War and applied for service in the First World War.

His political career was started in Tallahassee as a bill clerk in the State senate in 1907. It was in Tallahassee that he met Trammell, then President of the Senate. A strong friendship sprang up and it was largely through Trammell's influence that Senator ANDREWS came to the fore in politics.

Trammell became State attorney general in 1912 and promptly appointed his youth protégé as an assistant. Senator ANDREWS kept the job through Trammell's term as governor. Then, in 1919, when the seventeenth judicial circuit was created—composed of Lake, Osceola, and Orange Counties—and attorneys in this district could not agree on a judge, Gov. Sidney J. Catts appointed the young assistant attorney general as judge of the new circuit.

In 1925, he resigned as circuit judge to enter private practice in Orlando. He was named general counsel for the State real-estate commission and appointed city attorney for the city of Orlando, which he held for several years.

One of the prominent leaders in the citrus industry and the owner of a grove himself, he was one of the organizers of the Citrus Clearing House Association. Serving as its general counsel, he wrote the organization's charter which was later adopted almost intact by the Florida Citrus Commission when created by Gov. Dave Sholtz.

In 1929, he represented Orange County in the State legislature. In that same year, the State supreme court had a backlog of some thousand cases. The legislature created the Florida Supreme Court Commission and Senator ANDREWS was one of three judges named to help clear up the docket.

After 3 years as State supreme court commissioner, he returned to Orlando in 1932 and reentered the practice of law, being joined by Charles O., Jr., in 1934.

In 1939, Senator Trammell died in Washington. Judge ANDREWS' friends urged him to run to fill the vacancy. It was in this election that he scored his political upset, defeating former Governor Carlton.

TRIBUTE PAID SENATOR ANDREWS BY NATION'S DIGNITARIES

As the news of Senator CHARLES O. ANDREWS' death at the United States Naval Hospital in Washington became known yesterday, many of the Nation's dignitaries as well as State officials and close friends paid tribute to the passing of Florida's senior Senator in statements of regret and sorrow in the closing of a long and distinguished life.

Senator CLAUDE PEPPER, visiting his family in Tallahassee, said he not only suffered a "great shock, but a deep personal sorrow" at the death of Senator ANDREWS.

"For 10 years in the Senate, Senator ANDREWS and I have had as close and cordial association as two Senators can have," he said, "and his passing to me is not only a great shock, but a deep personal sorrow.

"Senator ANDREWS was a good and great man. No man surpassed him in love of his State and country. No character was cleaner or nobler than his.

"To Florida, the birthplace of him and his ancestors, he rendered a long life of distinguished service in executive, judicial, and legislative office. The State has suffered an irreparable loss. His colleagues in Washington who had such deep affection and esteem for him will join us in Florida in honor of his memory and in deepest sympathy to Mrs. Andrews and to the family."

Gov. Millard F. Caldwell said in New York while en route to Buffalo for a National Guard convention that "Senator ANDREWS was a splendid citizen and a fine Senator. He had common sense and courage."

Former Gov. SPESSARD L. HOLLAND, Democratic nominee to succeed Senator ANDREWS, said at Bradenton, where he is vacationing with his family at Anna Maria on the Gulf coast:

"I am profoundly sorry to hear of Senator ANDREWS' death. He was one of Florida's leaders and among its very best citizens. He rendered this State service of high degree. In every way he was sound, conservative, and wholly diligent in looking after the affairs of this State. He was my personal friend, and I shall miss him."

HOLLAND said Senator ANDREWS had undergone a severe strain during the war years and expressed belief that this taxing of his strength led to his fatal illness.

At Gainesville, President John J. Tigert termed Senator ANDREWS' death "a great loss to the Nation, the State, and to the University of Florida in particular.

"He was one of the university's most outstanding alumni and always manifested intense interest in the institution's affairs. He cooperated wholeheartedly during the 10 years of his service in the United States Senate in all matters concerning the university.

"He will be mourned by a host of friends in the university community, including members of the faculty and student body."

In Orlando, Criminal Court Judge W. M. Murphy, long-time friend of the Senator, said: "I knew Judge ANDREWS during all the time he was circuit judge and since, and always held him in the highest admiration and respect. Florida has lost a true friend and our country a wise statesman. He will be greatly missed."

Howard Phillips, vice president of the Dr. Phillips Co. here, said: "The Florida citrus industry had lost a great friend and benefactor.

"Senator ANDREWS never failed to come to the aid of the industry at home or in Washington. Farming, and especially the growing of citrus, was always close to his heart and I personally think he contributed more to the orderly marketing of Florida citrus than any other man in the Nation."

N. P. Yowell, long time a close friend of the Senator, was deeply shocked when the news of Senator ANDREWS' death was relayed to him.

"I consider Senator ANDREWS' contribution to his State and Nation as outstanding. He was a quiet and unassuming person, honest and sincere in all of his efforts and always did his utmost to serve his fellow man.

"His life was a life of service, and the people he knew and their problems were his chief concern. Florida has lost a loyal and devoted servant," he said.

Dean Melville E. Johnson, of St. Lukes Cathedral, termed the Senator "a devoted father and husband and a Christian gentleman."

"I have personally known Senator ANDREWS for 15 years and had heard of him and admired him even before that. I admired his opinions and efforts exceedingly and I know of no man that is more entitled to eulogy.

"His indefatigable labor in the discharge of his duty is worthy of a memorial. He served his country in wartime as much as any man in uniform and was unselfish in his sacrifices. The State and Nation have lost a great leader and the people of Orlando a great friend as well," Dean Johnson said.

The Orlando City Council at its regular weekly meeting yesterday adopted the following resolution:

"RESOLUTION

"Whereas our State and Nation have lost a distinguished citizen and public servant in the passing of United States Senator CHARLES O. ANDREWS; and

"Whereas the people of Orlando particularly will feel the loss of this able but cordial and friendly citizen: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the City Council of the City of Orlando, Fla.—

"1. The members of this council personally and officially lament the passing of United States Senator CHARLES O. ANDREWS and express to his family their sincere heartfelt sympathy in their great loss.

"2. The council gratefully acknowledges the outstanding sacrificial service which Senator ANDREWS has rendered to our city, State, and Nation and bemoans the loss of his continued influence in public affairs.

"3. The city clerk is directed to forward a copy of this resolution to the family of Senator ANDREWS and deliver a copy to the press.

"Unanimously adopted this September 18, 1946.

"[SEAL] WM. BEARDALL, Mayor.

CAREER LIKENED TO JOSEPH—NEIGHBORS, DIGNITARIES JOIN FINAL HOMAGE PAID SENATOR CHARLES O. ANDREWS

(By Wilton Allen)

Orange County friends and neighbors were joined by Florida's governmental leaders in paying final tribute to Senator CHARLES O. ANDREWS here yesterday as simple funeral services were conducted in the flower-banked First Presbyterian Church, of which he was an elder and a member for more than a quarter of a century.

Florida's senior Senator, who planned to retire from public life at the end of his present term a few months hence, died suddenly in Washington last Wednesday.

Services at the church lasted 22 minutes as Dr. Marshall C. Dendy, pastor, spoke briefly of Senator ANDREWS' life and likened his career to that of Joseph, expressing the hope that the Senator's deep moral convictions and unselfish spirit would inspire future leaders as Joseph had inspired Moses.

"In the life of this public servant there was revealed honesty of deed and sincerity of purpose, which are jewels that will adorn the name of any man of state," Dr. Dendy said.

"In years to come, some new Moses may well look into the record of CHARLES OSCAR ANDREWS and be guided by the spirit of one who has written a record of devotion to duty which should inspire future public servants to greater deeds for the State he loved so well."

Dr. Dendy selected his text from Exodus 13:19: "And Moses took the bones of Joseph with him, for he had straitly sworn the children of Israel, saying, 'God will surely visit you; and ye shall carry up my bones away hence with you.'"

In the funeral party as honorary pallbearers were Gov. Millard Caldwell, who arrived from New York a few minutes before the services; Senator CLAUDE PEPPER, and former Gov. SPESSARD L. HOLLAND, four Florida Congressmen and representatives of virtually every branch of the State and Federal Government in Florida.

Music at the church consisted of a 20-minute organ prelude played by Mrs. Margaret C. George, the church organist.

Friends and associates of the Senator began filling the church more than an hour before the services began. Every seat was occupied and many were turned away.

Several hundred persons stood in the vicinity of the church for a glimpse of the plain brown casket when the Senator was carried to the Carey Hand funeral home hearse by eight fellow Rotarians who acted as active pallbearers.

The entire rostrum was hidden by the high bank of beautiful floral offerings from friends, State and Federal Government leaders and agencies.

In the center in front of the casket was the purple and gold wreath of the Rotary Club made in the shape of the Rotary insignia. To the right was the big wreath of white chrysanthemums and pink gladioli sent by President Truman, who was Senator ANDREWS' seat-mate in the Senate before he became Vice President. To the left of the casket stood the large wreath of red roses bearing the official gold-stamped red ribbon of the United States Senate.

Serving as a direct background was a solid row of multicolored chrystanthemums, extending all the way around the rostrum.

Governor Caldwell and HOLLAND, Senator-elect who drew Senator ANDREWS' support when he did not seek reelection, entered the church together and were taken to seats nearest the casket. They had been preceded by Senator PEPPER, who arrived a few moments previously. Other dignitaries sat in the same section of the church.

Members of the Rotary Club and the Orlando Bar Association sat in a group in another section. United States District Judge Dozier DeVane, a former law partner of the Senator, sat with the family, which, in addition to Mrs. Andrews, included three sons, Charles O., Jr., of Winter Park, Thomas Oakley and Edwin of Lakeland.

The family entered and left the church via a side door.

Leading the funeral procession were 2 State highway patrol cars, followed by the 20 vehicles bearing Federal and State officials. The hearse carrying the Senator's body was escorted by the Orlando motorcycle patrolmen after which came the four family cars.

Services at the graveside beneath the moss-hung oaks of Greenwood Cemetery were brief and simple, lasting less than 10 minutes after the family was seated. They consisted of the reading of a short passage of Scripture and a prayer by Dr. Dendy.

All floral offerings were not used at the church. The number of offerings was said by the Carey Hand funeral home to be several hundred.

Active pallbearers were V. W. Estes, Jacob Burkhard, W. L. Tilden, Paul Stein, H. L. Jacobs, N. P. Yowell, C. C. Brown, and W. S. Branch, all long-time friends of the Senator. Ushers were deacons of the church.

Besides Governors Caldwell and HOLLAND, honorary pallbearers, were headed by Senator PEPPER and four Congressmen, Representatives BOB SIKES, J. HARDIN PETERSON, DWIGHT L. ROGERS, and JOE HENDRICKS.

Other honorary pallbearers included: United States Circuit Court Judge Curtis L. Walker, United States District Judge William J. Barker, United States Marshals J. B. Royall and Chester S. Dishong, Secretary of State R. A. Gray, State Supreme Court Justice Alto Adams, State Treasurer Ed Larson, Attorney General Tom Watson, Comptroller J. M. Lee, State Superintendent of Education Colin English, Internal Revenue Collector John Fahs, Customs Collector A. J. Angles, United States District Attorney Herbert S. Phillips and S. Kendrick Guernsey, member of the State road department.

Others attending included: Tom Gurney, chairman of the State board of control; Courtney Campbell, State road department member; John T. Wigginton, executive secretary to Governor Caldwell; State Representative M. B. Smith, of Sanford; Tom Shackleford, former member, State road department; and Assistant Attorney General Howard Bailey.

Senator ANDREWS' body arrived in Orlando Friday. It lay in state in the chapel of the Carey Hand funeral home 5 hours Saturday and 3 hours yesterday as hundreds of friends visited the chapel to pay their respects to Orlando's statesman who had served the State in the Senate for the past decade.

In failing health for the past 3 years, Senator ANDREWS planned to retire at the end of his present term after some 30 years of public life, during which he served as assistant attorney general, judge of the criminal court of records for Walton County, judge of the seventeenth judicial circuit, State supreme court commissioner, State legislator, and Senator.

In addition, he was the first general counsel for the Florida Association of Real Estate Boards, counsel for the Florida Citrus Commission, and attorney for the city of Orlando, serving one term as president of the State bar association.

Born in Holmes County, the seventh of 10 children of a Confederate war veteran, Senator ANDREWS graduated from the University of Florida and was admitted to the bar in 1907. A veteran of the Spanish-American War, he got his political start in Tallahassee as a bill clerk in the State senate.

It was in Taliahassee that he met the late Senator Park Trammell, which resulted in a strong friendship. In 1912 Trammell became attorney general and promptly appointed his young protege as his assistant.

Senator ANDREWS held the post of assistant attorney general through Trammell's governorship. In 1919, when the seventeenth judicial circuit, composed of Lake, Osceola, and Orange Counties was formed, he was appointed judge of the new circuit.

He resigned in 1925 to enter the private practice of law in Orlando. He was then named general counsel for the State association of real estate boards and appointed city attorney of Orlando.

One of the prominent leaders in the citrus industry and owner of a grove himself, he was one of the organizers of the Citrus Clearinghouse Association. As counsel for the organization, he wrote the charter which was later adopted almost intact by the Florida Citrus Commission when created by Gov. Dave Sholtz.

In 1929 he represented Orange County in the State legislature and in that same year was named one of the three judges on the State supreme court commission, created by the legislature to help clear a backlog of cases from the supreme-court docket.

Three years later he returned to Orlando and reentered the private practice of law, being joined by Charles O., Jr., in 1934.

Senator Trammell died in Washington in 1936. Persuaded by friends to seek the office, Judge ANDREWS defeated former Gov. Doyle E. Carlton in a special primary.

In the same election, Senator PEPPER was nominated to fill the vacancy created by the death of Senator Duncan U. Fletcher a few months before. So, in rare Senate procedure, both Florida Senators took their seats on the same day.

He was reelected in 1940 to another term, but last winter announced that he did not intend to seek reelection. Instead, he threw his public support behind HOLLAND, who was nominated in the primaries last May. Senator ANDREWS planned to devote his time to his central Florida interest.

Regarded as an expert parliamentarian, the lean and scholarly Senator was chairman of the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee and of a special committee charged with reconstruction of the Senate Chamber.

He was a ranking member of the Naval Affairs Committee and served on the Judiciary, Immigration, Public Lands and Surveys, and Rules Committees.

As a member of the Naval Affairs Committee, Senator ANDREWS believed in a strong Navy and had much to do with putting it in as good shape as it was when the war broke out.

He was instrumental in securing the new Federal Building for Orlando, the naval air bases at Jacksonville and Banana River, and other State projects.

Among the last bills he introduced was a proposed constitutional amendment to provide that no agency, individual, or organization should infringe upon a man's right to bargain individually or collectively with his employer.

He was a strong supporter of the cross-Florida barge canal, for which Congress repeatedly failed to provide funds.

Long a champion of the med-fly bill, he won Senate passage last August of a $10,000,000 appropriation to compensate growers for their losses sustained in the med-fly epidemic of the late 1920's, only to see it die in the House when Republicans threatened filibuster until the hour of prearranged adjournment. The bill is scheduled for House consideration when Congress reconvenes in January.

Soft-spoken and mild-mannered, Senator ANDREWS was not as close to the White House as Senator PEPPER during the Roosevelt administration. His contact, however, became more intimate when his Senate seatmate, Harry Truman, was elevated to the Presidency.

Although taking their seats on the same day, the careers of Senator ANDREWS and Senator PEPPER have been divergent in many respects. Senator ANDREWS rarely took the floor and voted against Roosevelt bills as regularly as he voted for them. Senator PEPPER took the floor frequently and almost invariably lined up with the New Deal.

Senator ANDREWS leaned toward the conservative and confined his activities more to the affairs of state while his younger colleague became the leader of liberals and moved into the limelight with speeches on international affairs and economic problems.

Simplicity was the theme of the Senator's final rites in accordance with the wishes of Mrs. Andrews and the family. Tentative plans for a military funeral were canceled here after the arrival of Mrs. Andrews when it was learned that she preferred simpler rites with a minimum of elaborance.

Dr. Dendy started the service immediately upon the arrival of the family and 22 minutes later it was over. It consisted of an opening prayer, a passage of Scripture, a closing prayer, and Dr. Dendy's brief eulogy, which follows:

"Today we reverently and affectionately gather in this church in the presence of the earthly temple which held the spirit of Senator CHARLES OSCAR ANDREWS, who was a member and an elder in the First Presbyterian Church of Orlando. On March 7, 1877, in Holmes County, Fla., there was born to John Andrews and his wife, Mary Yon Andrews, a son, whom they named CHARLES OSCAR ANDREWS. He was the seventh of 10 children. That was the beginning of a life that was to be dedicated to the people of his State and Nation. God gave him a companion who has been the inspiration and strength of his life. To them were given a daughter, who has died, and three sons, who have increased the happiness of the home and who will prolong the influence of their parents' lives. In this church, which was his church, we meet today to invoke the blessings of Almighty God upon the deeds of his life, and to ask for the comforting peace of our Lord, Jesus Christ, upon his beloved family.

"When Joseph, beloved servant of his people, wise statesman of a nation, and faithful believer in God, approached the hour when he would retire from his work, he exacted one promise of his family, 'God will surely visit you and ye shall carry my bones from hence.' The man who walked among princes and talked with the mighty had a longing to leave Egypt and rest among the people whom he had served. At the close of his life he was homesick for his own beloved land.

"Long years after Joseph died his people took up his bones and bore them back to Canaan. Their new leader, Moses, thought of Joseph's spirit; of his dreams for his people, of his chivalry when tempted, of his courage when tested, of his loyalty to principles, and of his faith in God. The spirit of Joseph lived again in the life of Moses, who guided Israel in her new day.

"In the story of Joseph there is a parallel with the life of the statesman whose memory we honor. That nation is fortunate which has as her leaders men who have deep moral convictions and an unselfish spirit. Such men accept their office as a trust. They administer our Government upon the principles of a Constitution which was written under the providence of God. In the life of this public servant there was revealed honesty of deed and sincerity of purpose, which are jewels that will adorn the name of any man of state. In the years to come some new Moses may well look to the record of Senator CHARLES OSCAR ANDREWS and be guided by the spirit of one who has written "a record of devotion to duty which should inspire future public servants to greater deeds for the State he loved so well.'

"Let the leaders of our Nation, the officials of our State, and the hosts of friends from every walk of life join the minister in praying that God, our Heavenly Father, may give peace and comfort to his family through the riches of grace in Christ Jesus; that the blessings of God may rest upon his colleagues in Government and upon the people of his State; and that the fullness of eternal life may be the reward of our fellow Christian forevermore. Amen."

COLLEAGUES IN SENATE PRAISE SENATOR ANDREWS

(By Radford Mobley)

WASHINGTON.—Never a spectacular figure, Senator CHARLES O. ANDREWS of Florida, fondly known to his cronies as "The Judge," served his constituents with quiet efficiency here.

Senate leaders were among his best friends. Floor Leader ALBEN BARKLEY, of Kentucky, was a close friend of the judge, and when ANDREWS wanted a piece of legislation for some section of his State he simply turned the matter over to the Democratic leader who, with ANDREWS, would put it through.

"We would do almost anything for the judge," once said Senator TOM CONNALLY, of Texas, veteran Democrat, who described Andrews as "genuine true blue in all his relationships."

The Senator was ill during his latter days in the Senate and rarely took part in debate. He watched proceedings whenever possible, however, and was a stickler for upholding the dignity of the United States Senate.

Once he rose to inform his colleagues that their diction was slipping and some of them should take elocution lessons. From any other Member this remark would have caused a storm, but the Senate lions took it docilely from the judge.

SPONSORED MIAMI AID

The Senator was a great Navy man and his happiest legislative days were probably spent as a member of the Naval Affairs Committee. He was sympathetic with south Florida's interests and sponsored legislation to make Miami a cultural and trade-relations center for pan-America.

He urged an international highway to Latin America, and constantly called attention to the need for more intelligent development of trade with the good-neighbor states.

During his early Senate days—he served from 1936 until his death—Senator ANDREWS was an ardent follower of President Roosevelt. Later he differed with the former President on some of Mr. Roosevelt's social and economic legislation. He backed him 100 percent during the war and was quick always to tell his colleagues of the fine record of Florida servicemen.

COLLEAGUES PRAISE HIM

Senator SCOTT LUCAS, Illinois, Democrat, who served with ANDREWS on the Naval Affairs Committee, spoke for his colleagues Wednesday, saying, "Senator ANDREWS will be greatly missed by our body. He was an able Member and a fine citizen."

Hal Phillips, former secretary to ANDREWS, speaking for Floridians here, said: "He was a gentleman of the old school. He was kindly and wise and will leave his mark in the Senate."

Aptly summing up the lovable "judge," Frank J. Wideman, of West Palm Beach, former assistant attorney general, said: 'The passing of Senator ANDREWS is a real loss to Florida and to thousands of devoted friends. He was genuine in all of his relationships by reason of his modest and unassuming nature. He worked quietly and effectively for the State on many important projects not generally known. CHARLES ANDREWS applied himself to the limit, and beyond the limit, in unselfish public service. The respect and sincere friendship of his colleagues in the Senate was a great asset in his successful work."

A TRIBUTE TO SENATOR CHARLES O. ANDREWS

(By Thomas W. Hagan)

WASHINGTON, September 21.—For your tribute to Florida's late beloved Senator CHARLES O. ANDREWS, look in your book of quotations under "simplicity." For the venerable Orlandoan was in all things just that.

Gray, ramrod erect despite his years, Senator ANDREWS could be angry. He was a sensitive man who knew the worth of friend and foe, and who was equally vehement in denouncing both—if the occasion demanded. But in most things he was placid, quiet, long-suffering.

He was a product of his State and times. He was by all present-day standards a "conservative." Undoubtedly the effect of his conservatism was heightened by the contrast most drew between him and Senator CLAUDE PEPPER.

[From the Delray Beach (Fla.) News of October 27, 1946]

A GOOD REPRESENTATIVE OF THE PEOPLE—SENATOR ANDREWS WAS ONE OF THE SENATE'S HIGHEST ESTEEMED MEN

In the sudden but not unexpected death of Senator CHARLES O. ANDREWS, Florida's senior Senator, the South and the Nation lost one of the most popular and able men on the Washington scene.

Mild mannered and unassuming, almost shy in his contacts, but warm and genial among his colleagues in the United States Senate, Senator ANDREWS, during his 10-year tenure in "the greatest deliberative body on earth" became one of the most respected and highly esteemed men in that body.

Senator ANDREWS was not regarded as a fighter in the accepted sense of that term, but his colleagues knew him to have a streak of stubborness and an ingrained perseverance and determination which, despite his illness of the past few years, caused him to show the utmost tenacity of purpose in pursuing any course in which he had determined that he was in the right. And because of this determination, he never let up in his attempts to pass legislation which he believed in the interest of his constituents or in the interests of the people of the United States.

SURE OF FACTS

Tall, gaunt, for during the last few months he had lost weight almost to the point of emaciation, slow and deliberate of speech, ofttimes hesitant in his enunciation, Senator ANDREWS always was sure of his facts, had always marshaled his forces with the mind of a keen lawyer, when he infrequently arose to address the Senate upon any legislation in which he was interested. And he always had a respectful, tolerant, and sympathetic audience in the membership.

As a matter of fact, many times during his career, Senator ANDREWS won votes for his pet measures, not articularly on their merit, but because of the high esteem in which he was held by his colleagues.

Senator ANDREWS came to the Senate in November 1936 along with Senator CLAUDE PEPPER, the junior Senator from Florida. They were sworn in together, the senior Senator then 59, the junior Senator then 36 years old, the one aging and graying and a little stooped, the other vigorous and vibrant with young manhood.

PHILOSOPHIES DIFFERED

And in comparing the political philosophies of these two Senators from the same State, the years have developed them as the antithesis of one another. Senator ANDREWS, a conservative of the old southern school, following in the footsteps of Florida's famous Senator Duncan U. Fletcher and a disciple of the veteran Walter F. George of Georgia, who was one of his closest friends, while Senator PEPPER has developed into an extreme liberal and is outdealing the New Deal in his progressivism.

Senator ANDREWS, while accepting some of the reforms of the Roosevelt administration, broke with the late President over the Supreme Court fight and was among the delegation of Senators who marched to the White House to urge President Roosevelt to recede from his Court-packing stand which then threatened to split the Democratic Party.

His background as a jurist and his high regard for the reputation of the Supreme Court stirred strong feelings in the Floridian over the Court fight.

Influence of Senator ANDREWS' opposition to the Court-packing bill caused it to be recommitted within 5 days to the Judiciary Committee, where it was pigeonholed. So strongly did the Floridian feel against tampering with the Supreme Court that he introduced, as a substitute for the Supreme Court bill, a constitutional amendment providing for the appointment of one judge from each of the 10 respective circuit courts of appeal districts, and one from the Nation at large, which would have prevented so many appointments to the bench from a single State or a single section of the country. His amendment would have provided for appointment by apportionment throughout the United States and would have permitted members of the courts of appeal to sit on the Supreme Bench when members of that tribunal were ill, disqualified, or otherwise absent.

ALMOST APPROVED

It is not generally known, but at one of the famous "good will" picnics of the Democratic Party held at Jefferson Island in the Chesapeake Bay in the summer of 1937 this resolution or constitutional amendment, came near being approved by the President and the party leaders. With his tenacity of purpose the Senator introduced his resolution at succeeding sessions of the Congress, but without avail.

Senator ANDREWS had no high ambitions to become a party leader. His one thought while here in Washington was to "be a good representative of the people." He was not a good politician in the accepted sense and never would yield to expediency in any matter which might reflect upon his motives or which might affect pending legislation which he considered good. That he did understand practical politics, however, is borne out by an incident which happened in 1943 prior to the 1944 campaign.

As a senior Senator from Florida, he was approached concerning the appointment of patronage in his State in setting up the war manpower commission in Florida. And while he did not see eye-to-eye with his junior colleague, he recognized that Senator PEPPER might face a tough fight for renomination in that campaign.

"Give the patronage to Senator PEPPER, it might help him and he'll need all the help he can get," he told the representatives of war manpower. And as it turned out Senator PEPPER did need help in that campaign.

TOLD NO CHANCE

When Senator ANDREWS announced his candidacy for his first term, many leaders in Florida sought to dissuade him on the theory that he did not have a chance of election. His stubborn streak asserted itself, however, and with the help of his wife, who is a good campaigner in her own right, he stumped the State and was elected over such opposition as Charles Frances Cot, the author; Bernar McFadden, magazine publisher; and Jerry Carter, Florida railroad commissioner.

Senator ANDREWS' closest friends in the Senate included GEORGE of Georgia, and also Senator RUSSELL of that State, STEWART of Tennessee, BYRD of Virginia, Radcliffe of Maryland, MAYBANK of South Carolina, and BARKLEY of Kentucky.

His friendship with BARKLEY dated from his early days in the Senate when he supported Senator BARKLEY in his close fight for Democratic floor leader against the late Senator Pat Harrison of Mississippi. He was close to and had great admiration for President Harry Truman, with whom he served in the Senate.

Among the important pieces of legislation which Senator ANDREWS fostered was repeal of the Chinese Exclusion Act, opening the doors of the Nation and Hawaii to Chinese immigration on the same quota basis as other nations; providing for an overseas inter-American highway connecting highway terminals with a system of ferries linking up pan-American highways; he sought a constitutional amendment which would provide for trial by jury of less than 12 members for crimes for which maximum penalty is less than death or life imprisonment; another constitutional amendment dubbed the "right to work" amendment which would prohibit the denial or infringement of the inherent right of a citizen to work and bargain freely with his employer.

Senator ANDREWS thought this right should be inherent and added to the Bill of Rights and his amendment would declare that this right individually or collectively shall not be infringed by any Federal or State law or by any organization. His amendment has been interpreted in some sources as being a threat against union picketing when other men want to work, for it says: "No minority group nor combination of minority groups, acting by force or threat, has the right to intimidate or to dictate the destiny of the people of the United States."

FOR STATES' RIGHTS

His close association with his southern colleagues, and his philosophy of political science made any infringement of States' rights distasteful to Senator ANDREWS. For this reason he joined with other southern Democrats in opposing such legislation as Fair Employment Practices Commission, the anti-poll-tax bill, antilynching bill, and he was determinedly against the usurping of power by union leaders and so-called irresponsible acts of some unions.

For instance, in commenting on the coal strike the Senator declared, "John L. Lewis is getting to be the greatest menace this country faces at this time, outside of the Axis Powers."

To support the statement that Senator ANDREWS was not an opportunist nor did he use expediency in his dealing with what he considered right and wrong, was his opposition to a proposed amendment to the Constitution which would give so-called equal rights for women, sponsored by many women's organization and several labor organizations.

On July 18 of this year he made a lengthy speech on the floor of the Senate in support of his stand on this proposed constitutional amendment.

WOULD ROB STATES

"If this proposed amendment is made a part of the Constitution of the United States, then the States may be robbed of all the power they have at present and have exercised over rights as between men and women for 150 years.

"Under this amendment * * * Congress could ultimately take over all the powers heretofore resting in the States to regulate the innumerable domestic or family rights arising as between husband and wife, mother and son, brother and sister, including those rights existing between men and women of every kind, creed, and race. Congress could also ultimately usurp and take over all the present adequately established local powers now in the States to legislate for the safety and health of women in the industries * * * the irrefutable laws of nature cannot be changed by Congress."

Senator ANDREWS took a leading part in legislation and appropriation for authorization and construction of the Florida cross-State canal and other maritime construction in Florida coastal waters. He introduced in several succeeding Congresses the measure to provide Federal repayment of losses to some 7,000 Floridians for destruction of crops and groves in the fight against the Mediterranean fruit fly. This bill passed the Senate during this last session, but failed to get through the House.

Stricken by illness early in 1943, Senator ANDREWS had fought a plucky but discouraging fight to regain his health these past 3 years. Forced to remain away from his office in the Senate Office Building, which by the way, is the same office occupied by President Truman when he was a Member of the Senate, the Senator through a loyal office staff had been able to keep in close touch with the Senate Calendar and the important legislation passing through that body.

He was intensely in favor of the United Nations organization and supported zealously all legislation necessary for the successful establishment of that organization.

During the past year he steered a measure, as chairman of a special committee, for the modernization of the Senate and House Chambers. He also sponsored a bill providing for construction of a new building for the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, at a cost of approximately $1,700,000.

He was a member of several important committees including the chairmanship of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, Immigration, Judiciary, Naval Affairs, Public Lands and Surveys, and Rules.

BORN IN HOLMES

Senator ANDREWS was born in Holmes County March 7, 1877. His education included the Florida common schools, South Florida Military Institute and he holds diplomas from Florida State Normal and the University of Florida. He was captain of Company M, First Regiment, Florida National Guard, and volunteered for duty in the Spanish-American War. He also applied for service in World War I.

He served as bill secretary for the Florida Senate and served as judge of the criminal court, 1910–11; assistant attorney general of Florida, 1912–19; circuit judge, 1919–25; and a member of the Florida Supreme Court, 1929–32.

His club membership included Rotary, Masonic, Florida University Alumni Association, Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity. He was honorary member of the Phi Delta Phi, legal fraternity, former president of the Florida State Bar Association, member of American, State, and Orange County Bar Associations. He was given honorary degree of LL. D. of Rollins College in 1941.

He was married to Miss Margaret Spears, of Tallahassee, and they had three sons, Charles Jr., Orlando; Oakley, at Vero Beach; and Edgar, Lakeland.

PAID TRIBUTES

Senator ANDREWS sang his swan song as a Member of the United States Senate on August 2, 1946, when Senator PEPPER touched off a series of tributes to his senior colleague when he said:

"I am sure that every Senator will miss the kindly, friendly, sincere, earnest, and patriotic senior Senator from Florida from this body. He is rounding out a distinguished career of public service which has carried him through the legislative, executive, and the judicial branches of the Government of the State of Florida and of the Nation.

"As I said, it was his own choice that he retire from the Senate, which he does for reasons of health which have plagued him for some time. It has been a great privilege for me to share service in the Senate with the senior Senator from Florida. He will carry with him not only my affection and esteem, but, I am sure, the affection and esteem of every other Senator who has had the real pleasure and satisfaction of service with Senator ANDREWS in the Senate. The State of Florida will be greatly the loser when his distinguished service is no longer given to the State and to the Nation."

BARKLEY ADDS PRAISE

Senator ALBEN BARKLEY, of Kentucky, Democratic floor leader in the Senate, also paid high tribute to Senator ANDREWS when he said:

"Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the Senator from Florida in his expression of esteem and good will toward the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS].

"I have enjoyed not only the service of Senator ANDREWS here, but his personal friendship and his cooperation. I wish him long life and health and happiness in whatever he undertakes. I hope that his departure from the Senate will not mean that we shall not, from time to time, allow our paths to merge so that we may see more of him in the future."

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY (Republican, Wisconsin) joined in the parade of tributes for the judge. "It has been my privilege," Senator WILEY said, "to visit with him in his home. I know his fine wife and I agree with everything that has been said about him. I am sorry that ill-health has made it necessary for him to leave the Senate. The people of Florida would have been happy to send him back.

"When I was in Florida, everywhere I went I found people of all parties and of all creeds who really loved him. He had served on the bench with distinction and has found a place in the hearts of many of his colleagues in the Senate.

"We join in the wish of the majority leader that he may regain his health and, in his fine home in Florida down there among the lakes, will be able to enjoy his grandchildren and family for many years to come."

[From the Orlando (Fla.) Morning Sentinel of September 19, 1946]

A TRIBUTE TO A GREAT ORLANDOAN

We will remember United States Senator CHARLES O. ANDREWS as one of the few men called to Washington for public service who refused to change his personality, his way of life, to conform with the Capital pattern.

Senator ANDREWS never was bitten by that insidious bug called Washingtonitis.

He was the same quiet, unassuming, conscientious, serious-minded citizen as a Senator that he had been as a private citizen.

It was a pleasure to go into his office on business, or merely for a friendly call. There was something of a touch of Florida there, despite the proximity to the great Halls of Congress nearby and the cold, marble lengths of the Senate Office Building corridors just outside his doors.

His secretaries and his clerks caught the spirit of the Senator and were as quietly helpful to any who came there as was the Senator himself.

If we were able to grant a last boon to the Senator, we would see that the med-fly bill passed during the next session of Congress, or during the rumored extra session this fall.

His work on the reimbursement of Florida growers who suffered damages and losses during the 1929 eradication campaign was typical of his entire career.

Quietly but doggedly he labored to fulfill a promise he had made to himself and to the people of Florida who voted for him.

And he performed his share of the work. The bill passed the Senate only because his fellow Senators held him in such high respect. He was able to circumvent bills which had higher priorities, bills which had more

Nation-wide political significance, because "CHARLIE ANDREWS wanted it passed."

This in itself was a wonderful tribute to a man who was retiring from the Senate scene.

His home town and Winter Park, his neighboring community, had planned a lasting tribute to Senator ANDREWS.

He never had been informed of the move, because his modesty might have revolted against fulfillment of it and because his fellow citizens wanted it to come in the nature of a surprise home-coming tribute.

When President Truman was scheduled to come to Rollins College and Orlando last spring, Mayor Beardall and Mayor Halverstadt of Winter Park had arranged that the President himself dedicate the community's tribute to his friend, Senator ANDREWS.

In a brief ceremony on the Winter Park-Orlando line, the President was to rename Mills Street for the Senator—calling it Andrews Boulevard.

We believe this plan should be carried out.

President Truman is scheduled to come to Rollins sometime next winter. We are certain that he would be happy to participate in the dedication ceremonies, as a friend and an admirer of Senator ANDREWS.

Andrews Boulevard, a long, straight road through one of the most beautiful sections of the community he loved so well, would recall to future generations of Orlando citizens the city's first United States Senator and the sort of a life he led, the example of service he set.

Senator ANDREWS long had known his time in this world was short. He decided before the last Democratic primary that he would retire. He felt that his failing health would preclude his performing his duties for the people of Florida.

And so we bid hail and farewell to the mortal Senator CHARLES O. ANDREWS.

He lived long, he served well and he passed on to future Florida public servants a record of devotion to duty which should inspire them to greater deeds for the State he loved so well.

With Walt Whitman we say:

"This dust was once the man, Gentle, plain, just and resolute."

A true son of Florida.

[From the Orlando (Fla.) Star of September 20, 1946]

THE NATION SUSTAINS A LOSS

A pall of sorrow came over the city Wednesday when the news of Senator ANDREWS' death became known.

It touched the city hall. It clouded the Rotary meeting when the members stood in silent prayer. It was on the lips of every Orlandoan.

Senator ANDREWS was truly loved and respected.

In his death Florida loses a great citizen, the country a statesman.

Senator ANDREWS was never a a person to play to the gallery. In fact his reserve was considerably against him in his public life. That is why he was a statesman.

Had the Senator been as good an orator as he was a thinker, he would have been in the newspaper headlines constantly. But because he thought more than he spoke, the Senator was seldom heard. He was constantly sought by colleagues. His mature thinking and sound judgment could always be relied upon.

Senator ANDREWS was a real American.

He was a stanch supporter of the Constitution. He didn't belong to the school that wanted to decorate it with frills, or twist meanings to fit conditions, he made the conditions fit the Constitution. This may have been inconvenient. It prevented many a walk into dangerous grounds.

The Senator was a friend of everyone. He was tolerant and kind. There was nothing wishy-washy about him. His convictions were strong. He stood upon them. He realized always there are two sides to a controversy.

The Senator was a good citizen. He was a good neighbor.

The home is the foundation of this Nation. The Senator set an example in his home life.

Perhaps it was his even temper, his ability to remain calm under the most trying circumstances or his never-ending patience that made his home life so exemplary. Then, too, it might have been the charm and loveliness of his always attractive wife, who had the happy faculty of being both a devoted wife at home and a partner outside.

Charles and Daisy, as their friends knew them, won the hearts of all who came to know them.

Senator ANDREWS served his country. If there were more men of his stamp in Washington much of the Nation's troubles would soon disappear.

His ideas on the country's foreign policy were sound. He could not be termed an internationalist, yet he was by no means an isolationist. He believed that the nations of the world each had to yield something toward a common goal of peace. He would have maintained a force, either by this Nation alone or some sort of combined world government, to put down disturbances which might cause world wars.

We like to remember Senator ANDREWS most as a neighborly, kindly gentleman who came from south of the Suwanee to make his home in Orlando and be one of its citizens.

[From the Panama City (Fla.) News-Herald of September 19, 1946]

OUTSTANDING PUBLIC SERVANT

The death of Senator CHARLES O. ANDREWS ends a long and distinguished career of public service, and his passing will be mourned throughout the State.

For 10 years he has served Florida in the United States Senate—served it faithfully, diligently, and quietly.

Senator ANDREWS, who was Judge ANDREWS for many years before his election, never made any sensational headlines. He didn't work that way. He was a quiet, affable type of man, with a judicial mind.

And he had courage. In the face of widespread support for an opponent, he persevered in a senatorial campaign and scored one of the most surprising upsets in Florida political history. That was back in 1936 when he won the senatorial nomination over former Gov. Doyle Carlton. The Orlando judge was not daunted by seemingly overwhelming support for his opponent.

Nor was he daunted, during his years in the Senate, by the fact that the spotlight was usually focussed on his colleague from Florida. He continued to persevere, to work for the interest of Florida and the Nation.

Senator ANDREWS served the State long and well.

[From the Jacksonville Journal of September 19, 1946]

SENATOR CHARLES O. ANDREWS

Last October, after Florida's senior Senator had suffered a considerable period of ill-health, he came to a difficult decision. Despite his illness, he might have continued to hold his seat in the Nation's highest legislative body. Most of the likeliest candidates were waiting to see whether CHARLES O. ANDREWS would run for reelection, and if he had decided to do so it seems probable that he would have had little opposition. But he knew that, with the best will in the world, his service to Florida would be hampered by his health. And so, after 10 years of conscientious work as a United States Senator, he retired with the utmost grace. The news that came yesterday from Bethesda showed that he knew only too well what the future held.

He was not a spectacular legislator. He conceived it to be his task to know his State thoroughly, to be ever watchful for its welfare, and to proceed quietly with those measures which seemed to him to be best for Florida and the Nation. Few have done these things better than he.

Florida has suffered a loss; the man who looked forward to many quiet days among the lakes and orange groves that he so loved, has gone on to greener groves.

[From the Lakeland (Fla.) Ledger]

A GENTLEMAN SENATOR

Invariably, when Floridians expressed themselves concerning Senator ANDREWS during his lifetime, they said: "He is a fine gentleman."

That, in essence, is the epitaph he leaves in the memories of his fellow Floridians.

He was a true southern gentleman of sound character and genuine dignity. When he went to the high office of United States Senator, he took with him a practical background that included many years of practice as a lawyer, a tenure as judge of the criminal court of record of Walton County, 7 years as assistant State attorney general, 6 years as a circuit judge, 2 years as a State legislator, and 4 years as a member of the special State supreme court commission established to cope with an unusually heavy docket.

Floridians knew he had been in poor health for many months, but his sudden death as the result of a heart attack came as unexpected news.

He will be remembered as a citizen who was substantial in the fullest sense of the word and as a public servant who was honorable.

[From the Winter Park (Fla.) Herald of September 20, 1946]

SENATOR CHARLES O. ANDREWS

Florida lost one of its most respected and sincere public servants in the death of Senator ANDREWS this week. The Senator, noted for his quiet and unassuming manner in public and private life, had upheld the highest traditions of his most illustrious predecessors in the United States Senate. He was never one to make much noise of his efforts in behalf of Florida and the Nation, but rather would he work in his quiet way to bring about the things which, after careful consideration, he thought best for his constituents.

A man of strong convictions, Senator ANDREWS held the profound respect of his colleagues in Washington, not only for his ability as a statesman but also for his courage and the personal sacrifice of his health to carry out his responsibilities to his State and country.

Many Winter Parkers and Orlandoans knew the Senator personally and feel deeply the loss of a personal friend. Thousands of Floridians whom he had served since 1936 know that they have lost a representative in Washington on whom they could rely for sound advice and capable support in matters affecting the welfare of this State.

From the standpoint of service to his fellow man, sincerity of purpose, and a life devoted to high ideals of statesmanship and democracy. Florida lost this week its outstanding public servant and friend, in the death of Senator CHARLES O. ANDREWS.

[From the Tampa (Fla.) Daily Times of September 18, 1946]

SENATOR ANDREWS KEPT THE CONSTITUTION HANDY

During the nearly 10 years that CHARLES O. ANDREWS, of Orlando, represented Florida in the United States Senate, he gained the respect of Congress and his constituents for his sincere effort to act in accordance with the spirit and the letter of the Constitution.

Mr. ANDREWS, who died this morning in Washington of a heart attack, was little known in Florida in 1936 when he first won the Senate seat in a special election caused by the death of Senator Park Trammell. There were skeptics who thought he would be a radical in Congress because of his sympathy with the needs of elderly citizens, but from the beginning he filled the office with dignity and voted in the Senate along lines he believed thoroughly in accord with the Constitution.

No New Dealer, Mr. ANDREWS nevertheless did not hew to a strict anti-New Deal line. He saw some things that were good in the New Deal program and voted for them. Others he opposed quietly but firmly. He came into national prominence when he helped in the fight against President Roosevelt's plan to pack the United States Supreme Court.

[From the Pensacola (Fla.) Journal of September 19, 1946]

STATE SUFFERS LOSS

The State of Florida suffered a distinct loss yesterday in the death of its senior United States Senator, Judge CHARLES O. ANDREWS.

Although in poor health for several years, Judge ANDREWS stuck to his post in the Nation's Capital and quietly, but efficiently, wielded his influence for those things which he sincerely believed to be right.

From his beginning in the service of Florida as a bill clerk in the State senate, up through the years as jurist and State and national legislator, Judge ANDREWS served faithfully, conscientiously, and with an honesty of purpose which lifted him to a place of high esteem among the citizens of his native State and among his colleagues in Washington.

Having lived in Walton County, where he was judge of the criminal court of record from 1912–17, Senator ANDREWS was admired by many stanch friends in northwest Florida.

Among his last official acts was to greet Pensacolians in the Capital to obtain increased air service and to pledge to them his best efforts. As a member of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee, he was an important personage in all naval matters.

It is regrettable that Senator ANDREWS was not spared to enjoy some years of well-earned rest in retirement to observe the fruits of his labors and to serve as an elder statesman to those who follow him in high public office.

[From the Fort Pierce (Fla.) News-Tribune of September 19, 1946]

COMMENT OF THE NEWS

The traditional eulogy of prominent men who die concerns itself usually with the man's tangible accomplishments, his honors, and his record in public life, if any. Too often such bits of post mortem praise become cut and dried and follow the same groove. It is also difficult at the time of a friend's death to say or write the things one wishes to express. We find ourselves, upon the death of Florida's senior United States Senator, beset by both obstacles.

As a native son of whom Florida should be proud, CHARLES O. ANDREWS left nothing to be desired. If he were unknown to you before he became Senator, think how many other conscientious and capable men who happen to be from another part of even your own State are equally unknown to you. And if, during his two terms as Senator, his public conduct in Washington was such that it made few headlines and we therefore felt his presence less forcibly at the moment, remember the loudest public man is not always the most admirable.

For Senator ANDREWS did have his share of public honors. As a lawyer, judge, teacher, and representative in the State legislature and in Congress he bore always his full share of the responsibility imposed on him by the people.

But to this writer personally that was not the impressive thing about Senator ANDREWS. He was first of all a man of quiet and kindly dignity. We met him on but two occasions, both brief incidents which we know must not have stayed in the man's mind much longer than they lasted, but they did in ours. The first time was some 4 or 5 years before he became Senator at a time when his duties kept him much in Tallahassee, although his home and family were in Orlando. His eldest son and this writer happened to be classmates and fraternity brothers at the university, which is where we met "the Judge." On that occasion he was driving through to Orlando and offered a lift that far to a youth headed home to Fort Pierce.

We were sensible of the honor of a 3- or 4-hour night drive and conversation with the distinguished gentleman, and being the rawest of callow college boys sought feverishly to make a fine impression. In retrospection the effort could scarcely have been less than noticeable, it seems to us now, but the Judge never let on he thought so.

His conversational contributions gave the impression of a man who talks with an equal in dignity and judgment. We forget the subjects we discussed during that evening, but we will never forget the man with whom we talked. We couldn't have declined the reasons, but from that hour on the Judge had a steady admirer.

The other occasion was after he became Senator and when he visited Fort Pierce briefly one afternoon. During that visit we met him on the street and exchanged greetings, and saw once more the tall old gentleman, somewhat frail in appearance but warm and kindly, and still with the air of scholarly dignity.

Warm kindliness and quiet dignity may be old-fashioned qualities these days. In a tough, cynical and catch-as-catch-can world, such a man may miss a lot of the earthly things we all seek, but we suspect he gains much that the rest of us miss. And we feel certain the world loses a lot when a gentleman of the old school passes from our midst. We personally honor Senator ANDREWS for the mark he made as a very human individual.

ROLLIN L. ROGERS.

SENATOR ANDREWS

Senator CHARLES O. ANDREWS, who died yesterday after a long illness, was a superior Senator and conscientious public servant. In his actions he was motivated by a desire to serve his State and Nation the best he could.

[From the Lakeland (Fla.) Ledger of September 20, 1946]

ANDREWS BOULEVARD

Long before Senator ANDREWS died some of the leading citizens of Orlando and Winter Park got together and planned for dedication of Mills Street, the Orlando-Winter Park line, as Andrews Boulevard, the Orlando Sentinel relates. The plan was kept from Senator ANDREWS because his friends in the two adjoining communities wanted to surprise him.

President Truman was to dedicate the thoroughfare during a visit at Rollins College, Winter Park, last year. But the President didn't get to make the visit. However, dedication by the President is still the plan, since there is some indication he may visit Rollins sometime within the next few months.

During an interview with the President in his White House office last June we were much impressed by the sincerity of his praise for Senator ANDREWS. He said he regarded the Florida Senator as one of the most excellent gentlemen he had ever known, and he expressed anxiety over Senator ANDREWS' failing health. It was the President who brought up mention of the Senator.

Senator ANDREWS gave the President loyal support, and since they were such good friends, it would be most fitting if the President should be the one to dedicate Mills Street as Andrews Boulevard.

How unfortunate that the dedication could not be arranged before Senator ANDREWS' death. Such an expression from the citizens of his own home area would have enriched the golden hue of his sunset period.

[From the Orlando (Fla.) Morning Sentinel of September 23, 1946]

LAST TRIBUTE TO SENATOR ANDREWS

Orlando, the State, and the Nation yesterday paid final tribute to the late Senator CHARLES OSCAR ANDREWS.

The First Presbyterian Church, of which he was a member and an elder, was packed with persons from all walks of life.

There were senatorial colleagues, members of the congressional delegation, the governor, city officials, State legislators, life-long friends, young people he had befriended and helped, bankers, and laborers.

It was a fitting tribute to a man who walked humbly through life, serving and helping to the best of his ability almost to the hour of his death.

Orlando, the State, and the Nation will miss him.

What Became of the $5,270,000,000 of 1946 and Prior Years' War Department Balance of Funds?

OF

HON. ALBERT J. ENGEL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, on February 21, 1947, Maj. Gen. George J. Richards, then budget officer of the War Department, testified before the War Department Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee—see pages 169–170 of hearings on 1948 military appropriation bill—that the War Department had unliquidated obligations on July 1, 1946, of $5,270,883,316. These obligations were incurred in pursuance of and covered by appropriations made by Congress for 1946 and prior fiscal years.

General Richards testified at that time that a critical review had been made which indicated "that the amount of firm obligations as of June 30, 1946, after all adjustments had been made, will approximate $3,700,000,000." So, according to General Richards' statement, the status of 1946 and prior years' funds was as follows on June 30, 1946:

First. Available for expenditure from appropriations for 1946 and prior years' funds, $5,270,000,000.

Second. Required to meet unliquidated obligations for 1946 and prior years, $3,700,000,000.

Obligations for 1946 and prior years might mean anything, from a building cost-plus-fixed-fee contract to a war claim of a foreign government.

CONGRESS RESCINDS $1,400,000,000

As a result of this and other testimony and upon recommendation of my subcommittee, the 1947 War Department appropriation bill contained a rescission of $1,100,000,000 of 1946 and prior years' appropriations, which was later increased to $1,400,000,000.

WHAT BECAME OF THE BALANCE OF THIS $5,270,000,000 1946 AND PRIOR YEARS' FUNDS

I have been working on this matter for more than 2 years with one object in view, that of making the War Department account for whatever moneys they have expended or will expend of this tremendous sum, and to itemize the "unliquidated obligations" that made up this $3,700,000,000. The War Department claimed these funds were required to pay war debts incurred in 1946 and prior years' funds. Whenever I tried to find out what they were doing or were going to do with this money the atmosphere around the Pentagon building where they were supposed to keep this information looked like an Oklahoma dust storm during an early morning London fog covered by a wartime Army smoke screen. I did learn however that they built a new Army theater in Hawaii at a cost of $789,000. The story was given out that this building was erected with post exchange and other nonappropriated funds. An investigation shows that only $102,000 of this amount was not appropriated funds and that $687,000 was paid out of 1946 and prior years' appropriated funds. Tripler Hospital and the buildings that go with it, erected under the War Powers Act at Honolulu at a cost of $36,000,000 plus, were built out of "1946 and prior years' funds." Of these 1946 and prior years' funds, $46,500,000 were allocated to Alaska for housing and other projects which were discussed by me recently more in detail. There was reserved and listed as unliquidated obligations against 1946 and prior years' appropriations the sum of $200,000,000 for portal-to-portal pay. There was set aside as unliquidated obligations approximately $261,000,000 for Army of the Philippines to be used for guerrillas' pay. While a great many guerillas did good work while Japan occupied the Philippines, it was a notorious fact that thousands of these guerrillas who if they did not cooperate with Japan certainly did not cooperate with us, yet are now asking for pay.

It will be recalled that the War Department requested and Congress wrote into the various appropriation bills transfer clauses allowing the War Department to transfer funds from one service to the other. I opposed these transfer clauses strenuously and in each instance was overruled. I have an itemized statement consisting of 21 pages, which pages are 17 inches long and 14 inches wide, giving a detailed statement and break-down of this $5,270,000,000 of "1946 and prior years' funds." It took me almost 2 years to obtain this statement despite the fact that I had the best investigators that could be obtained working on these items. I did not obtain this detailed information until after Major General Arnold was appointed budget officer. General Arnold has cooperated with me 100 percent and I now have a detailed accounting of every dollar of this vast sum.

SUMMARY AND FINAL RESULT

First. February 21, 1947, in testifying before our committee, Maj. Gen. George J. Richards maintained and insisted that of the $5,270,000,000 available out of 1946 and prior years' funds at least $3,700,000,000 would be required to meet unliquidated obligations. After some time he finally conceded that the House could de-obligate and rescind $1,100,000,000 of the principal sum. When the bill went to the Senate I believe he stated that $300,000,000 more could be rescinded, still maintaining that at least $3,700,000 plus would be required to meet this unliquidated obligation.

Second. Here is the final result, according to the detailed statement as furnished me by General Arnold: On July 1, 1948, $3,000,785,444 will have been rescinded. Of the remaining $2,270,340,000, $337,000,000 will have been reappropriated in the 1949 bill and $912,000,000 will have reverted to the United States Treasury and will no longer be available under the Reorganization Act.

Third. Instead of $1,500,000,000 which was the maximum amount General Richards said would revert to the Treasury, $3,912,785,000 will revert to the Treasury either by rescission or under the Reorganization Act.

Fourth. Instead of spending $3,700,000,000 as stated by General Richards for unliquidated obligations there will actually have been spent only $1,358,000,000.

WHY DID THE PRESIDENT FAIL TO SHOW THIS $5,270,000,000 OF 1946 AND PRIOR AVAILABLE FUNDS IN THE BUDGET SUBMITTED TO CONGRESS?

The War Department budget officers in testifying before our committee made the unqualified admission that this $5,270,000,000 of 1946 and prior years' appropriations, which was available for expenditure and could have been drawn out of the Treasury and at least $3,700,000,000 of which it was claimed would be drawn out of the Treasury for unliquidated obligations, was not shown in the condensed budget which the President through his Budget Bureau sent down to the committee of 102, which is the Congressional Budget Committee that fixes the appropriation ceiling. Col. E. B. Gallant, executive officer of the budget division, and the entire financial management group of the War Department appeared before my committee on April 1, 1948. I handed him the condensed budget for 1948 which the President sent down to the Congressional Budget Committee and which was used by that committee in fixing the appropriation ceiling. On page 232 we find the following testimony:

Mr. ENGEL. Now just where is there shown in this book (referring to this budget) unobligated or unliquidated obligations of $5,270,000,000? Where is that reflected in this book?

Colonel GALLANT. I am not familiar with the book.

Mr. ENGEL. The amount should be in the unliquidated obligations.

Colonel GALLANT. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. ENGEL. The total amount for the military activities only show $2,250,000,000.

Colonel GALLANT. Yes.

Mr. ENGEL. Where is that $5,270,000,000 unliquidated obligations shown in this book? I would like to have it shown to me.

Colonel GALLANT. You will not find the $5,270,000,000 in that book.

Again—

Mr. ENGEL. The Budget Bureau submitted to the committee of 102, which consists of the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate, and the Appropriations Committee of the two Houses, a budget, upon which that committee fixed a ceiling for the 1948 budget. Is that right?

Colonel GALLANT. That is right.

Mr. ENGEL. And that $5,270,000,000 is not on this sheet?

Colonel GALLANT. No, sir.

Mr. ENGEL. If they were unliquidated obligations, then you would be called upon to liquidate those obligations with money out of the United States Treasury?

Colonel GALLANT. That is correct.

The record speaks for itself. It is inconceivable that the President of the United States should fail to show these liabilities in the budget sent down to the committee of 102.

Are the Government's Terms for the Belasco Theater a Farce?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an editorial entitled "Theater for Washington," which appeared in the Washington Post this morning, June 19, 1948, and a letter captioned "Belasco Theater" from the same newspaper. It appears that after its brave words about making the Belasco Theater available, the Truman administration is offering it on terms which no responsible businessman would accept:

THEATER FOR WASHINGTON

With the passing of the National Theater into limbo or filmdom, the Capital of the United States will be without a single legitimate playhouse. The one structure which can more or less speedily be reconverted to remedy this lack is the old Belasco Theater, facing Lafayette Park. The Public Buildings Administration has announced that it will receive bids for the rental of this structure. But the terms under which bids have been invited afford scant hope that the reconversion will become a reality. Elsewhere on this page a correspondent analyzes in some detail the defects of these terms from the point of view of those interested in keeping the legitimate stage alive in Washington. We agree with him that the offer of the Public Buildings Administration to make the Belasco available will be no more than an empty gesture unless that agency acts to make private operation of the theater feasible and to insure that it will actually be operated in the interest of the community's cultural life.

There is no doubt at all that the people of Washington will support a theater which offers them first-class theatrical fare and which offers its tickets for sale on the nondiscriminatory or American plan. Several commercial entrepreneurs have expressed lively interest in operating such a theater here. So has the American National Theater and Academy, which, through the Washington Art Center Association, has done much toward inducing the Government to make the Belasco available. ANTA is perhaps peculiarly qualified to meet the drama needs of the National Capital. It was chartered in 1935 by Congress for the purpose of stimulating interest in the drama and bringing to all Americans their heritage of the past, the best of the present, and to aid the development of better drama in the future through its academy. Many of the most distinguished American dramatists, actors, and producers are among its officers and directors. Washington would be an ideal home for ANTA. And ANTA would be an ideal custodian of a Washington theater.

It was Washington's need which prompted the Public Buildings Administration to offer the Belasco for rent. That need should not now be ignored in the selection of a tenant. It is a far more important consideration than the amount of income which the Government can glean from the lease. It merits, indeed, on the part of the Government which has its site here, affirmative and sympathetic, and generous help.

BELASCO THEATER

The Federal Government paid $400,000 for the Belasco Theater and grounds. Under the proposal as drawn and advertised by the Public Buildings Administration the Government in effect most generously offers to lease the Belasco for at least a year. In return for this a theatrical producer willing to bring theater—legitimate theater—to the Nation's Capital for a democratic audience must invest approximately $400,000 to restore the theater to operating condition.

To put it mildly this is to make a farce of any prospect of theater in the near future. It appears that every possible obstacle to make the restoration and operation of this theater unreasonably hard and unrewarding has been incorporated into the proposals for bids.

Since the property will continue to be owned by the Federal Government the proposal should stipulate that the Belasco should and must be open to all. A clause should also have been written into it stipulating that the Belasco must be used only for theater production, i. e., legitimate theater, opera, ballet, concerts, etc., but not as a movie house. This was not done.

Constitution Hall is furnished Federal steam for heat, though Negro artists are barred from performing there. The prospective Belasco tenant is faced with the heavy and needless cost of installing his own heating plant—a tremendous investment and totally unnecessary since the building could continue to be heated as at present, the tenant paying for this, of course.

Let Us Oil for Peace as Well as Oil for War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, there is probably no single industry that contributes as much to the well-being of humanity as does the petroleum industry.

Think of the heart of tropical jungles, mountain fastnesses, luscious valleys—as yet undeveloped—because of the lack of highways and modern transportation.

Think of the darkness which for centuries enveloped the earth when the sun went down in the evening. The only light then known was the tallow candle or the little wick floating on a piece of wood in a vessel that burned olive oil.

Think of Abraham Lincoln—studying his "reader" lying on the floor in the light given off by the logs burning in the fireplace.

Think of the impetus given civilization when the American petroleum industry furnished oil for the lamps of China and then sold the Chinese little tin lamps for a couple pennies apiece in which to burn American-produced oil, and brought the teeming millions of China's people into the light of knowledge, truth, and modern civilization.

Ponder on the fact that even today, wherever on the face of the earth candles are still used, they are now made of paraffine—a byproduct of the great world of petroleum and of petroleum products.

Visualize modern America. Thousands upon thousands of miles of railroads with millions of tons of food, fuel, clothing, medicine, household goods, and enormous quantities of other necessities—roaring across the country day and night, powered by Diesel-oil engines and oil-fired locomotives. Gasoline tractors plowing and cultivating our farm lands. Crops harvested—stored, processed, and transported in great trains of motor carriers from the farm sides to our cities.

Now, let's go back only a few years. Without the products of petroleum, our national defense would have been blocked on land, on the sea, and in the air, and it will redound to the everlasting glory of the oil industry for its superb performance during World War II which brought victory to the Allied Nations.

I could go on for hours telling what petroleum burning in furnaces or in internal-combustion engines has done for civilization in furnishing the fuel for powering motor cars, barges, boats, airplanes, and oceangoing vessels.

I want, however, to tell what the petroleum industry in America, in addition to the benefits which have come out of its development, is doing to support a modern government in every facet of vast activities and at all levels of operation—merely through the payment of taxes to manage its indebtedness and pay the cost of its manifold services. Ponder on the following contributions to the well-being of society paid by the petroleum industry:

Hundreds of millions annually in leaseholds on lands yet to be developed.

Hundreds of millions in royalty on land now producing oils.

Hundreds of millions in wages, salaries, commissions, and other income to all classes of workers.

All of the above are subject to Federal and State income taxes at established rates of taxation.

Additionally thereto are paid:

Millions of dollars for auto licenses which would never be collected were it not for American gasoline production.

Millions of dollars in taxes on gas stations, garages, repair plants, tank cars on railroads, oil pipe lines, on scores of other small industries, paint shops, and what not for which there would be no need if gasoline and lubricating oil were not available for their operation.

This was made evident to all during the war when gas was rationed—and even the wayside restaurants were obliged to shut their doors—for the duration.

It might well be said that all taxes paid by the entire automobile industry on their real and personal property—the Federal and State income taxes paid by the great automobile manufacturers—the manufacturers of auto parts—glass, tires, paint—as well as the income taxes paid by all the labor employed in that tremendous industry, are inevitably bound up with the ability of the American petroleum industry to continue to produce an ever-increasing and adequate supply of motor fuel and lubricants—at reasonable prices for use by the American people.

Let us for the moment consider the prices paid for sundry commodities—including gasoline—as reported by the United States Department of Labor, Wholesale Commodity Index, 1926=100—as contrasted with prices prevailing in September of 1946:

Commodity	September 1946	March 1948
Hides and leather	141.6	185.6
Farm products	154.3	186.0
Food	131.9	173.8
All commodities	124.0	161.4
Metal and metal products	114.2	156.5
Textiles	125.7	149.0
Housefurnishings	113.6	142.1
Chemical products	98.4	136.1
Petroleum products	73.0	121.8

Source: U. S. Department of Labor.

From the foregoing it becomes evident that while with the exception of chemicals, the price of which decreased somewhat, all other products skyrocketed to new high levels, the price of petroleum products as a whole in 1946 was only 73 percent of the price in the base period, or a decrease of 27 percent.

Let us now review the retail price indices on 1935–39 base, and contrast those with the retail price of gasoline in the months of June 1946 and March 1948 (1923=100):

Commodity	June 1946	March 1948
Food	116.2	202.3
Combined index	108.2	166.9
Sundries	117.3	146.2
Clothing	96.4	196.3
Fuel and light	97.4	130.3
Housing	91.0	116.3
Gasoline	67.2	N.A.

Thus it becomes further evident that even at retail price levels of June 1946, the price of gasoline was but 67 percent of the base period while food rose to 116 percent, and the combined index of all retail prices rose to 108.2.

Let us now review the figures showing the cost of gasoline and the tax per gallon over the last 25-year period in order to disclose that while the price of gasoline was dropping each year that the taxes on gasoline were constantly increased, wiping out all savings to consumers effected by the petroleum industry:

Prices as of Jan. 1

	Service station price of gasoline per gallon, exclusive of tax	Gasoline tax per gallon	Service station price per gallon, including tax
	Cents	Cents	Cents
1920	29.74	0.09	29.83
1925	20.09	2.11	22.20
1930	16.16	3.79	19.95
1935	13.55	5.29	18.84
1940	12.75	5.66	18.41
1945	14.22	6.02	20.50

Source: Unit prices, 50 leading cities.

Thus it becomes very evident that while gasoline prices excluding taxes have fallen more than 50 percent in the last 25 years increased taxes now levied on gasoline have wiped out all savings in gasoline prices made by American petroleum industry in the past 15 years.

Remove the shackles that bind the industry if you would have more and still cheaper gasoline. It's the tax that loads the price, for gasoline itself is basically cheaper than any other commodity listed.

It is to be further remembered also that during the time the petroleum industry was cutting gasoline prices in half, the millions of workers employed in the petroleum industry were receiving shorter work hours per day—shorter work week, and new and higher social security benefits, and tremendously increased wage scales.

At the same time the direct taxes levied against producers were increased both in rates and in gross amount collected as is evident from the following table as reported by the United States Treasury Department:

Receipts from special Federal petroleum taxes in calendar year 1947

Gasoline	$455,350,120.23
Lubricating oil	78,649,309.01
Pipe lines	18,029,960.60
Total	552,029,389.84

Authority: Bureau of Internal Revenue.

The $552,029,389.84 enumerated above is not inclusive of taxes paid by the petroleum industry to city, county, and State governments on their plants, structures, pipe lines as real or personal property taxes.

Neither does it include capital stock, State and Federal income and a veritable host of other taxes running into the hundreds of millions of dollars which are paid annually by and through the petroleum industry to the State and Federal Governments.

All of the above special taxes amounting to more than $552,000,000 are also exclusive of the license fees paid for license plates on trucks, automobiles—license and mercantile fees and taxes paid on service and sales stations—by both themselves and subsidiary owners of the hundreds of thousands of gas stations which abound on every hand throughout the United States.

In discussing the need for and justice that would accrue from the equalization of the tax burden, Woodrow Wilson once stated:

In a country of great industries such as this—it ought to be easy to distribute the burdens of taxation without making them anywhere bear too heavily—or too exclusively—upon any one set of persons or undertakings.

Review that statement by the eminent educator, author, historian, scholar, and President, Woodrow Wilson, in the light of the fact that more than 25 years after his demise we find the petroleum industry burdened by the payment of more than 200 different and individual tax payments—to Federal, State, and local governments.

Federal taxes paid by the petroleum industry	39
State taxes, licenses, etc	121
Local taxes, licenses, etc	41
Total of taxes paid	201

This list comprehends the greatest conceivable variety of tax payments. It pictorializes an almost inconceivable list illustrating a great multiplicity of taxes and the imposition of a duplication of taxation.

They enumerate as of the date compiled from 182,651 taxing jurisdictions, and give positive evidence for a pressing need for revision, coordination, and tax controls over the present unjust, uneconomic, unsystematic, wasteful, and unduly expensive methods of taxation now being imposed upon a single industry.

Add to all of the above the income taxes paid by approximately 1,250,000 employees—with a pay roll of nearly $3,000,000,000, and you begin to get a true insight into the taxes paid by the oil producers of the United States.

Americans today own and operate about three-fourths of all the motorcars in the world, as well as about one-half of all the railroads. Likewise it is one of the greatest industrial nations.

Without the petroleum industry there would be no motorcars, no concrete highways, nor superhighways.

Man would be tied to his home. Social intercourse, trade, and commerce would fall to the level of Colonial days.

Think of modern American industry giving up its fuel and its lubricants.

Our homes with their central heating plants cold for want of furnace oil.

Our railroads dependent upon coal and wood to steam the locomotives. Water transportation, either abandoned or relying chiefly upon draft animals, to power the barges.

America must be oiled for peace just as surely as it must be oiled for war.

To encourage the further development of the American oil industry, every encouragement ought to be extended here at home to the development of new oil fields and greater proven reserves to insure our supply—both in peace as well as in war.

The National Congress should and must lift the enormous overburden of taxation from the back of this basic American industry.

It ought to proceed to see that the petroleum industry is provided with an abundance of rigs, pumps, drills, steel casings, tank cars, pipe lines, and all things necessary to its future development—in adequate quantities and at reasonable prices.

Such action should be taken at once—to insure not alone the national wartime economy, but the future development of our national life—now inseparably bound with the well-being of the American petroleum industry as a whole.

Since America is the hope of the world, to keep America strong should be the prime objective. This can best be achieved by aiding, not hindering an industry which has done and is doing so much to accomplish this result.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. CLYDE M. REED
OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 21 (legislative day of Monday, March 29), 1948

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. JOHN THOMAS, late a Senator from the State of Idaho

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in the early seventies when Kansas was considered more or less a new country—inhabited mostly by Indians and buffaloes—a boy, JOHN THOMAS, was born to sturdy pioneer settlers in Phillips County, Kans., in 1874.

This lad grew up to know the rigors of frontier life and struggled unceasingly for an education. His love of adventure took him farther west where he became a well-known figure in Idaho. There he made his home until his death on November 10, 1945.

JOHN THOMAS demonstrated and took advantage of one of the greatest heritages of Americanism, the opportunity for an individual to make good on his own. From his meager beginnings he took to farming and eventually became a successful banker and large-scale livestock raiser. He became interested in politics and served as chairman of the Idaho Republican State central committee for 4 years. He was also a member of the Republican National Committee.

JOHN THOMAS was appointed to the United States Senate in June 1928. Following this he was elected to the office in November 1928 to succeed Senator Frank Gooding for a term ending March 3, 1933. Again he was appointed to the Senate in 1940 to succeed the late Senator Borah. Later he was elected and reelected. Senator THOMAS' success, coupled with a wide knowledge of Idaho's agriculture, mining, and livestock industry, made him a valuable man not only to the State of Idaho but to the entire West during the several terms he served in the Senate. From a political angle the Republican Party lost an outstanding and far-sighted leader when Senator THOMAS answered "the last roll call." He was married to Florence Johnson, who died in 1943. An only child, Mrs. C. Wayland Brooks, survives.

Clifford J. Durr

OF
HON. CLAUDE PEPPER
OF FLORIDA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, on the 30th of this month the public service will lose one of the most devoted public servants who have ever served the people of this country. I refer to Mr. Clifford J. Durr, at present a member of the Federal Communications Commission. With a singular devotion to the public interest, he has served his Government for many years, and the public service will be immeasurably the poorer following his resignation. I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the RECORD some data concerning his service.

There being no objection, the data were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRIEF BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF CLIFFORD JUDKINS DURR

Mr. Durr was born in Montgomery, Ala., March 2, 1899. He attended the University of Alabama, where his education was interrupted by a short period of service in the United States Army in 1918. He received his A. B. degree from the University of Alabama in 1919 and the following year went to Oxford University, Oxford, England, as a Rhodes scholar, where he received his degree in jurisprudence in 1922. Mr. Durr is a member of Phi Beta Kappa and Sigma Alpha Epsilon.

Returning to the United States, Mr. Durr was admitted to the Alabama Bar in 1923 and to the Wisconsin Bar 2 years later. After practicing law for 10 years, first in Montgomery, Ala., then in Milwaukee, Wis., and later in Birmingham, Ala., he entered the Government service in 1933 as a member of the legal division of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. A few years later he was made assistant general counsel of that organization. His first duties there related to the recapitalization of banks following the banking collapse of the early thirties. Later he became chief of the litigation section and in 1940, upon the organization of the Defense Plant Corporation, he became its general counsel and was later made a director. He was also vice president and director of the Rubber Reserve Company from 1940 to 1941.

On October 13, 1941, he was nominated by President Roosevelt for a 7-year term as a member of the Federal Communications Commission and was confirmed by the Senate on October 29. He is at the present time serving as a member of the FCC.

In 1926 he married Virginia Heard Foster, of Birmingham. They have four daughters.

ALABAMIAN FILLING IMPORTANT NICHE IN GOVERNMENT SET-UP

(By Marguerite Johnston)

WASHINGTON, August 31.—Rangy, deceptively casual of manner, Cliff Durr, of Alabama, is one of the big men of Washington—a part of that inner core which holds together and gives direction to that vast, fluxing organism known as the United States Government.

He is one of the five Federal communications commissioners.

Born in Montgomery, variously a farmer, Rhodes scholar to Oxford, lawyer, and Government official. Durr must look like the epitome of American masculinity to visiting Britishers. His long, relaxed body looks at ease, but never really settled in the chair behind his desk. Desk and chair are for him merely a base of operations out of which to move and to act.

To him the FCC is not a comfortable, well red-taped-up bureau, but a vigorous organization meant to bring the best possible performance out of America's radio stations, television laboratories, and telephone and telegraph services.

The FCC—in the war just past and now in peace—regulates, guides, sets the policy for American communications. In war, the job was one of guarding the national security, detecting threats to that security. In peace, the job is to promote sound growth in all fields of communication for the best good of the American people.

All these things interest Clifford Durr genuinely. And as a result, he does things that Washington remembers.

In depression days, when he was with the RFC, he helped organize the bank recapitalization plan.

When war loomed, he originated the Defense Plant Corporation idea.

When war ended, and big-time radio stations flooded the FCC with frequency modulation applications, it was Durr, who launched and won the fight to hold space on the spectrum open for the returning veteran who hopes to enter this new field of radio against the already established radio stations.

Versed in the ways of Washington, Durr comes from a background of solid Alabama faintly spiced with the exotic.

His father was John Wesley Durr, of the Montgomery wholesale drug business. "Despite that name," Commissioner Durr says, "he was a Presbyterian."

Mrs. Durr was Lucy Judkins, of Elmore, County, an interesting person who had spent part of her childhood in South America where her parents had gone after the War Between the States.

Clifford Durr was born in Montgomery in 1899, and went to Miss Gussie Woodruff's school and to Starke's University School.

He got an A. B. from the University of Alabama in 1919. "I wasn't very distinguished," Durr insists. "I wasn't even on the football team. It seems to me that I liked to cance on the Warrior River mostly."

But his record was enough to earn him a Rhodes scholarship to Oxford.

During college he took time out for the Army of World War I—60 days spent largely in the last O. C. S.

Out of college, and with the Rhodes scholarship not yet in pocket, he decided to apply his intelligence to farming.

"I had always liked farm life," he says. "Or thought I did."

Cotton was 40 cents a pound at that time, and Durr went to work for Will Howard Smith, of Autauga County, one of the few Alabamians at that time who had an agricultural education. The firm was McQueen-Smith Farming Co., with 5,000 acres of land farmed as a business.

"I started out as a plowhand," he remembers, "and after a while became a straw boss.

"I plowed several months, and then got to be a mechanic, veterinarian, and carpenter. When it was too wet to plow, we'd work the sawmill."

Durr gets an affectionate look in his eyes when he remembers "the silos on the edge of the Alabama River—I helped to build them."

But gradually he decided to give up farming.

"It was," he says reflectively, "rather strenuous. The price of cotton and steers began to tumble. And then there was a female in it, too. A mare mule named Belle. She was the "orneriest" mule.

"She could so effectively express her contempt for me and my skill at the plough."

June to November farming was enough to send Durr gladsomely off to England.

He was in the first group of Rhodes scholars to enter Oxford after the war—January 1920.

He studied law at Queens College. He remembers his law tutor. A. E. Hazel, and being farmed out to Jesus College for special study under a great legal historian.

He had a morals tutor too. He would always see me before long vacation and ask me where I was going in Europe, and when I got back, what the rate of exchange was. And he always asked me what size trees cotton grows on.

He was on the track team, and made some good friends.

And he emerged with a thorough respect and liking for the British people. "If I had stayed only 3 months," he says, "I would have left thinking they are terrible people. But after 2 years, I knew better."

He came down in July 1922, and went home to Alabama to work for Rushton, Crenshaw & Rushton in Montgomery. Then Mr. Rushton ran against LISTER HILL for Congress.

"I drove him around, and that was my first and only political campaign," Durr said. "We would drive from one place to another, Mr. Rushton in a brown study, thinking out fine and important points of the Constitution."

Once after a speech, Durr was standing at the back of the crowd and a rural gentleman standing by turned and said: "Mr. Rushton has experience. That's what we need. That young feller HILL ain't got it."

"Thank you," said Aide-de-Camp Durr, "Mr. Rushton will appreciate your vote."

"But I ain't gonna vote for him," the man said surprisedly.

"Why not?"

"Because that young feller HILL has shuck my hand and asked for my vote. Mr. Rushton ain't."

Milwaukee offered young Lawyer Durr a bid, and so after a year in Montgomery, he went to Wisconsin, was admitted to the bar.

After two Wisconsin winters, Durr decided firmly that that really wasn't the place for him.

He returned to Birmingham and became connected with Martin, Thompson, Foster & Turner. Judge Foster of the firm is now on the State supreme court.

All the work was corporation practice, much of it for the Alabama Power Co.

In 1926, he married Miss Virginia Foster.

The Durrs now have three daughters, one 19, a sophomore at the University of Wisconsin; one age 9, and a youngster, 6.

The Washington phase of the Durr life began in 1933, spang in the middle of the bank crisis.

Durr had pulled out of the law firm in Birmingham, and was planning his own practice. He and his wife had gone fishing at their camp in Chilton County when the call from the RFC in Washington came through.

"I came to Washington to stay 1 year," Durr says. "I've been here 13."

"Pretty dramatic days we had there. That was May 1933, and the depression had banks toppling in every direction."

Durr became second in command, then chief, of the preferred section, Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and helped to organize the bank recapitalization plan.

The plan recapitalized more than 6,300 banks in the United States—half of all those in the country at the time.

The saving of those banks indirectly meant the saving of all the others, because if half the Nation's banks had failed, the others would have fallen too.

"That was a billion and a quarter dollar program," Durr says. "The banks saved ranged from the smallest ones, in which we put $5,000 worth of saving funds, to Chase National Bank which needed $50,000,000 to survive."

Once the plan was organized and functioning, the job became one of administration.

Durr then set up and headed the litigation division of the RFC. "We had to pick up the wreckage of all RFC mistakes," he said.

One May morning in 1940, when war in Europe seemed not so far away from America as it once had, Durr was reading the newspaper and saw where President Roosevelt was setting up an advisory board for the national defense program.

Durr recalled the American efforts to produce munitions and armaments in World War I—when the Government paid bonuses to manufacturers to expand their works.

"We tried to bait the manufacturers to expand," Durr reminds, "and when the war ended, we were still relying on France for artillery, Britain for rifles, and there was not an American plane in combat."

Durr remembered, too, his own visits to Germany in 1921, when he found Germans already talking about "next time."

"If they had been preparing for a new war ever since the last one," he reasoned, "our own preparation was going to be too big a job for private industry to handle alone."

The Government, he felt, would have to direct and finance a thorough, widespread, and drastic expansion of all American industry if this country was to be only the "arsenal for democracy."

And if, he thought further, the Government was to put a great deal of money into plants, it would be criminal to scrap those plants after the war when peacetime production was sure to be needed.

"If the Government was to provide the money," he says, "I believed that we needed a Government organization to keep the title to the plants we built and lease them to the manufacturers."

Durr called in picked men from his old section and his new one in the RFC, and together they all mapped a plan.

Durr sold Jesse Jones on the idea of recommending the plan to Congress, and the legislation went through.

Wright Aeronautical and Packard were the first companies to come in.

Meanwhile, with big business firmness, William Knudsen had already set up an arrangement using a plus-profit basis.

The RFC would finance the building of new wings, or assembly lines, for example. Then for each aircraft engine the Army bought from that plant, the Army would pay the cost of production, allow a reasonable slice of profit for the company, and then pay an additional $300 to go toward the cost of the building.

The RFC financed the expansion, the Army paid for it, the manufacturer either accepted the plant additions or scrapped them.

This system was O. K.'d, and Durr was instructed to set it up legally. He mapped procedures as instructed. Then he entered official protest to the RFC board, outlining all his original reasoning.

While all this machinery of war contracting was being formed, Wright Aeronautical had already gone to work on a contract using Durr's Government-lease idea as approved by Congress.

Then the Packard contract came up. The lawyer for Packard remembered the Liberty Motor stink of World War I. He wanted nothing similar for his company.

"We simply haven't got enough capital to put the money into expansion which our contract would require," he said. "But neither do we want anything which would smack of our being given plants by the Government."

Durr outlined his own plan of letting the Government hold titles to the plant and lease it to Packard. Packard approved.

"That's against our policy," the Defense Plant Corporation announced, pointing to its plus-profit custom.

"But Congress approved the Government lease plan," Durr and his colleagues pointed out.

Douglas Aircraft, Drumond, Beech, and North American all came into the RFC and asked for contracts on the same basis as Packard's.

Douglas Aircraft said frankly: "We cannot expand to 20 times our present size. The Government will have to expand us if it uses us. And if the Government has to put up the money, it should be allowed to keep the title."

One large corporation head put in the clinching argument. "If my Government is going to go Socialist after this war," he said, "my one little contract on the old plus-profit basis won't stop it or speed it."

And so the plan went into affect and America got its expansion and its production.

It was revolutionary in 1940. "Emil Schram was chairman of the RFC board," Durr remembers. "He was really interested in this country and in the outcome of the war. He was a conservative who was not scared of a new idea.

"That was still before Pearl Harbor, remember, and you were risking your reputation to put that much tax money into getting ready for a war that was never supposed to come. If America had not been attacked and had never entered the war, all of us would have been guilty of having thrown away billions of America's dollars."

The first war plants were built almost by stealth, Durr now remembers. But once it became apparent that the war was on, they were being built on a mass-production basis.

In his RFC office, six lawyers were having to do the legal work and to negotiate contracts for billions of dollars in war production.

In 1941, October, he realized that his war-plants program was going and couldn't be stopped. Schram had left the RFC board. Durr felt that the man under whom he could best work was no longer on the board. And so—not knowing that Pearl Harbor was to come 2 months later—Durr accepted the FCC post.

With war, the FCC expanded into a vast and highly technical FBI of the communication systems.

"The load of the war," he says, "was on the technical staff. The FCC had chased down unlicensed operators and race-horse touts before the war; in war it had to find and silence subversive radio transmitters. The FCC brought in many a lost plane in the early stages of the war by locating its radio, and just before Pearl Harbor, it detected a radio transmitter in the German Embassy in Washington—just before it radioed Berlin."

In peace the load of the FCC falls back upon the Commission.

"All Commissioners act on everything," Durr says, "but naturally each man gets into things which interest him most. Radio broadcasting is mine. I understand broadcasting and the regulation of utilities, and now we have the vast backlog of applications for new stations and new-type broadcasting which gathered during the war."

FM and television are the new fields in his line. "We want to hold 20 percent of the frequency-modulation frequencies in abeyance," he said. "The applications have flowed in from established stations throughout the war, but it would not be fair to let the spectrum be filled immediately by stations who can afford to go into FM production immediately.

"That 20 percent is being held for boys in service, who, when they finally get their feet on the ground, hope to compete for station space on the FM spectrum, and for newcomers who cannot afford to apply now and absorb the losses "until the public has bought FM sets."

For a station to go into FM production, it will have to absorb $30,000 to $40,000 a year losses for 3 years.

"If the standard broadcasting stations gobble up the frequencies now, when the sets do get out, no newcomers can enter the field," Durr said.

The FCC must renew license on established stations, but first must check to see that the station has maintained the level of service to the public which it promised in its original application.

It must guide FM certifications to be sure that standard stations do not corner FM permits and then continue to give only standard broadcasts.

The FCC has television, radar, international cable, and wireless to look after.

"Television is already in operation in New York," Durr points out, "but the problem for the television industry to lick now is more economic than technical. A Grade A movie costs millions to produce. Try to match that for the public with a one-shot television show."

Television is good so far for sports events, major news events such as the opening of UNO Security Council and the like. It is a substitute neither for motion pictures nor radio.

"Television has to be good enough to command attention," Durr points out. "You can leave a radio on for 3 hours, and do housework or wash the car at the same time. To get anything out of a television show, you have to sit down and watch. This is one of the problems for the industry to work out."

A radio lack, Durr feels, is community participation. A newspaper is a part of its community and State, an institution.

"Radio in many sections," Durr says, "has ignored the potentialities of the respective communities. There are few towns so bankrupt of talent that they could not be drawn upon for radio programs. Talented young people leave the Southern States to go to New York or Hollywood to find a place to use their talents. Radio could fill that need. Local shows could be good enough to compete with network shows, if the local stations throughout the country tried.

"Each community has local problems which could be discussed in as interesting a way as that of the Town Meeting of the Air on national and international problems."

PEOPLE IN THE NEWS

CLIFFORD JUDKINS DURR AMONG FOREMOST CRITICS OF GOVERNMENT'S LOYALTY PROGRAM

Clifford Judkins Durr, Federal Communications Commissioner and vigorous opponent of the President's loyalty test program, comes from rebel stock.

In fact, the Judkinses were so unreconstructed after the War Between the States that rather than tolerate the Damyankees, this Confederate family emigrated to Brazil. The Judkinses thought the better of it and after 5 years returned.

Except for that heritage, though, there was nothing—superficially, at least—in the early career of tall, angular Cliff Durr that indicated he'd turn out to be a stormy petrel and New Dealer.

NATIVE OF ALABAMA

The 49-year-old gray-haired commissioner was born in Montgomery, Ala. He went through the University of Alabama, sandwiching World War I service in between his undergraduate education. Cliff was a studious fellow and spent 3 years at Oxford University as a Rhodes scholar, acquiring his law degree in the meanwhile.

He returned to the United States in 1922, went into law for the next 10 years, and was a corporation lawyer when he joined the Government service in 1933, starting the legal division of RFC. For 8 years Durr moved onward and upward in Government service, but except for those who knew him intimately in the Defense Plant Corporation, or other RFC activities, he was certainly not regarded as a rebel.

In 1941 he was nominated by the late President Roosevelt for a 7-year term to the FCC, as a matter of strict orthodox politics. An Alabama man was going out as Commissioner, so it was simple politics, to replace him with an Alabamian.

Durr stepped into the FCC cold on the subject, but quickly became hot. He took a leading role in defending Goodwin Watson and William Dodd when Congress tried to fire these two former FCC officials by legislative action. The Supreme Court overruled Congress.

OUTSPOKEN IN OPINIONS

In 1943 Durr plunged into a head-on fight with Representative E. E. Cox (Democrat of Georgia), charging that Cox had an ax to grind when the Georgian sought to investigate the FCC. As a result, Cox personally withdrew from the probe.

In the communications field, Durr was outspoken in his opinions which sometimes clashed with his fellow Commissioners, and sometimes with spokesmen of industry, but at all times Durr was eager and ready to debate the issue in public. Durr is an effective speaker—southern accent and all—and he believes a public official should expose himself to public questions.

Of late, Durr has been one of the foremost critics of the loyalty tests. That may not hold true after June 30, when his term is up.

Durr married in 1926. His wife is the former Virginia Heard Foster, a sister of Supreme Court Justice Hugo Black's wife. They have four children, all girls, ranging from 14 months to 21 years. They live at Seminary Hill, Alexandria, Va.

"UNTOUCHABLES" FEARED FROM LOYALTY TESTS

(By Sam Stavisky)

The Federal employee loyalty tests are "on the way to creating a new class of outcasts from society—a casts of economic and social untouchables," Federal Communications Commissioner Clifford J. Durr declared yesterday.

"This new caste will certainly threaten our security," Durr told a meeting of 150 national civil-rights leaders. "It will also challenge our humanity."

The stigma attached to the disloyal Government employee will brand him throughout his life, Durr asserted, adding:

"Barred from the normal occupations by which people earn their living, its members will be faced with the alternatives of hunger, an uncertain charity, or crime."

ADDRESSES CONFERENCE

He spoke before a 1-day session of the National Citizens Conference on Civil Liberties, held at the Washington Hotel, and called by a group of civil-rights leaders chiefly from denominational organizations.

The session broke into three units, each of which came up with a set of recommendations, to be carried back by the delegates to their own organizations for discussion and possible action.

The unit on governmental invasion of civil liberties recommended:

1. Disapproval of the President's loyalty program on the grounds that it covers all Federal employees and not just those involved with security; that it gives the Attorney General an unchecked hand in designating organizations, that are subversive; that it doesn't provide basic rights for the accused.

WOULD END THOMAS GROUP

2. Abolition of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, on the ground Congress should not inquire into the political beliefs and associations of Americans under so vague a term as un-Americanism.

3. Adopton by Congress of a fair practices code for all investigating committees.

4. An end to the policy of refusing American citizens passports abroad on account of political beliefs and associations. Also that long-resident aliens should not be deported solely on account of political beliefs and associations.

5. Condemnation of proposed House legislation requiring registration of the Communist Party and front organization; of any legislation which would discriminate against the voluntary association of American citizens on account of political beliefs.

ASKS RECOGNITION OF "RIGHTS"

A second unit urged, as steps toward strengthening academic freedoms:

1. Condemnation of the action by Evansville College, Indiana, in dismissing a faculty member for supporting the Wallace third party.

2. Recognition that teachers have the right to full freedom of research and publication, subject to adequate performance of their other academic duties; the right to full freedom of discussion in classrooms; the right to organize to protect their group interests; the right to speak or write freely on any subject that interests them; the right to join any organization not outlawed by law.

A third unit, dealing with the President's recommendations for civil-rights legislation, recommended:

1. Immediate strengthening of the civil rights section of the Justice Department.

2. Congressional passage of FEPC, anti-poll-tax, antilynch, and District civil-rights legislation.

3. The President ban discriminatory practices in Federal employment, and abolish discrimination and segregation in the armed forces.

4. Local communities set up civil-rights action committees.

RADIO—DISSENT BY DURR—AN ANALYSIS OF THE OPINIONS AND SPEECHES OF THE MOST FREQUENTLY DISAGREEING COMMISSIONER

Clifford J. Durr is a soft-spoken, gray-haired southerner who looks like the Hollywood version of a kindly uncle and yet is regarded in radio circles as the most formidable of the Federal Communications Commissioners. Broadcasters agree Durr is a brilliant thinker and writer. They also believe he constitutes a threat to the established system of broadcasting.

One Washington broadcaster last week put it this way: "You can't convince people that Durr is not for Government ownership and operation of radio."

In the past few months Durr has intensified his attack upon the commercial phases of broadcasting, has more frequently disagreed with his colleagues, so that "Dissent by Durr" has become a byword of FCC decisions. The estimates of his power range from "irritating" to "dangerous."

Since he is usually in the minority (joined sometimes by Commissioners R. C. Wakefield and less often by Paul A. Walker) some broadcasters regard Durr's opposition as simply an unpleasant needling. Others actually fear his attacks on radio advertising and his decisions, so frequently unfavorable to the industry. Whatever Durr's influence, his views merit analysis as one of radio's most literate critics.

PATTERN OF CRITICISM

Throughout Durr's written dissents, the same pattern occurs: A distrust of business (especially big business); and a concern for the public interest which overshadows that of the other Commissioners. Such trends showed up in his first three dissents:

In the case of the Panama City Broadcasting Co., the entire FCC agreed that a license for station WDLP (Panama City, Fla.) had been obtained through fraud, since the application did not show the interest of John H. Perry, publisher and broadcaster. A four-man majority voted to let Panama City keep its station, since it felt Perry had been duped by his agents and the station was performing good public service. A three-man minority (Durr, Walker, and James L. Fly) thought deception should not be condoned and questioned whether Perry had been victimized.

When the FCC approved transfer of the Yankee network to the General Tire & Rubber Co. without a hearing, Durr disagreed. His arguments were forerunners of his feelings in the recent Aviation Corp. case; he was leery of absentee control, of Ohio residents running New England stations; and he feared if one big tire company owned a network its competitors might want to do likewise, thus turning radio into "an instrument of pure commercial enterprise instead of the independent medium of entertainment and expression which it must be."

As a lone objector to the merger of Western Union and Postal Telegraph, Durr felt the plan offered did not give sufficient protection to the public interest—in promising rapid development of telefax, increasing the hours of service, stepping up the speed, and lowering the rates.

STATION PRICES

Another facet of broadcasting that has aroused Durr is the current boom in the prices of radio stations. In the summer of 1944 he issued a memorandum explaining his dissents against the sale of three stations. He felt hearings should have been held to decide whether a price was being laid down for the frequencies and to learn whether the high sums might affect the public interest.

But Durr does not think the answer is the legislation introduced last month by Representative EMANUEL CELLER, Democrat, of New York, which would limit the sale price to twice the bare assets of the station. "A station operator is entitled to not only what he invests in cash dollars, but in imagination and energy," Durr reasons. "If one built up a good listening audience while the other sat back and did nothing, they shouldn't have to sell for the same price."

Instead of a mathematical formula, Durr thought the answer lay in the application of sound business judgment—presumably the judgment of the Commission's.

AVCO AND FM

In the AVCO case, Durr again showed his distrust of Big Business. He characterized the Aviation Corp. as "a type of corporate structure which has long been a matter of concern to the people * * * and to Congress itself because of its effectiveness as a device by which small groups of individuals, through the use of other people's money, are enabled to dominate large segments of our national economy without any corresponding responsibility to the public * * * or even to their stockholders."

Aside from the holding-company issue, he recommended a denial on these grounds: no price was set on the station alone, and he didn't feel AVCO showed even minimum qualifications to operate a publicly owned radio highway into the minds and emotions of millions of American men, women, and children.

Durr's other recent written deviation from Commission policy occurred in the rules for FM programing. He held the Commission should have required 2 hours of independent programing a day and reserved 20 channels for newcomers (especially veterans).

"Our standard system of broadcasting," Durr explained, "is pretty badly molded into one pattern, pretty badly in need of new blood. We should reserve 20 channels to give the new blood a chance." He is especially concerned about the veterans; he thinks all the frequencies in the eastern and other tight areas will be quickly gobbled up and he doesn't think it fair to tell a returning serviceman from Manhattan that he should start his radio career in Little Rock.

FORMER CORPORATION LAWYER

Durr's background up to a point is rather surprising for the bête noir of the radio industry. A member of an aristocratic Alabama family, he took a Rhodes scholarship and then for 10 years practiced law in Montgomery (Ala.), Milwaukee, and Birmingham, handling a lot of corporation cases. "It was there I learned about absentee ownership."

He first entered the Government working for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, of which he became general counsel, then served for 2 years as a Director of the Commodity Credit Corporation. When the Defense Plant Corporation was being established, he fought bitterly for its present setup. He became general counsel and later a director of Defense Plant.

Durr married Virginia Heard Foster, which made him a brother-in-law of Supreme Court Justice Hugo Black. In radio circles the two sisters are rumored to influence considerably their husbands' liberal views.

Durr's dislike for the commercial aspects of radio has come out in three recent speeches. In perhaps the strongest, at the Christ Church forum, he summed up his views: "Those who are coming more and more to dominate the use of the radio channels take over that use without responsibility to the public at all, but only to the clients whose goods or whose particular idea of the 'American way of life' they are employed to sell. Radio is becoming predominantly an advertising medium and program production is being taken over by advertisers and advertising agencies who are enslaving the Muses to serve their ends."

Not only did Durr urge radio listeners to write to the station operators, as FCC Chairman Paul Porter recently suggested, but he also recommended writing to the Commission—and to Congress.

As a remedy for overcommercialism, Durr insisted he "doesn't want to see the Commission get in the position of dictating program service—though I have been accused of that." He thinks there are two possible approaches: to regulate the percentage of radio time that may be sold, stipulate that a certain amount of each 5-hour segment must be withheld from sale; and to encourage more active competition for frequencies.

"I have gone along almost every time a station comes up for renewal," said Durr. "Yet I think if a station uses less than 10 percent of its time for local live talent—and that includes a commercial from a department store or reading the news off an AP ticker—that station should come up for a hearing." The FCC should welcome applications from other groups in the community, he continued, and give the frequency to the one promising the best public service.

SAE HONORS CLIFFORD DURR AT UNIVERSITY—MEMBER OF FCC GIVEN FIRST FRATERNITY BADGE OF HONOR

UNIVERSITY, ALA., February 8.—Clifford J. Durr, a member of the Federal Communications Commission, has been chosen by the Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity at the University of Alabama to be the first recipient of its Badge of Honor, a yearly award to some outstanding alumnus of the local chapter.

The badge will be presented March 8, the ninety-first anniversary of the founding of the SAE chapter at the university in 1856. After the presentation of the badge to Durr by Dr. Robert I. Little, also an Alabama Mu alumnus and a member of the faculty at the university, he will speak to a large group of active chapter members and alumni from all over the State.

This occasion will mark the first observance of a custom which will become an annual event; the selection of Alabama Mu Chapter's "Man of the Year." The honoree's name will be engraved on a special plaque which will hang in the chapter house.

Durr was born in Montgomery, March 2, 1899. He attended Starke Military Academy in Montgomery and entered the university in 1915. After being graduated as a Phi Beta Kappa, he won a Rhodes scholarship to Queens College, Oxford, England, where he studied law.

Upon completion of his studies at Oxford, Durr returned to Montgomery to practice law in the office of Rushton and Crenshaw. Later he was connected with the law firm of Fausett, Smart, and Shea in Milwaukee, Wis., and also with Martin, Thompson, Foster, and Turner in Birmingham.

In 1933 he became assistant general council for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in Washington. President Franklin D. Roosevelt appointed him to the FCC in 1934, and he has served on that body since.

Durr recently returned from a 6 weeks' tour of Russia. His mission included a study of the communication organizations of the U. S. S. R.

INDUSTRY'S "DRAFT DURR" MOVE—HIS NEED AS FCC "BALANCE" IS FELT

A move to draft Clifford J. Durr for renomination to the Federal Communications Commission has been quietly gaining momentum in recent weeks. Durr's term expires June 30 and with President Truman expected to send in his designations some time in April, it's considered likely that the "draft Durr" movement will crystallize itself into a snowball of sentiment within the next 2 weeks.

The significant part of the whole draft-Durr movement is the almost complete reversal of expression and opinion concerning the FCC's stanch liberal and stormy petrel by assorted facets of the industry which not long ago were dead set against risking another Durr appointment. Today they take the position that a continuance of Durr would give the FCC a much-needed balance, plus the contribution of an honesty and integrity that, it's opined, the radio industry must grasp in an approaching period of turbulence and uncertainty.

One top "exec," a "web veepee," on the District of Columbia scene, whose opinion obviously reflects the network he represents in Washington, put it this way only last week: "With Durr on the FCC at least we know we are dealing with an honest man even if we don't agree about his politics."

RECEPTION IS MOOT

Just how receptive Durr himself is to the draft movement remains pretty much of a moot point. He's expressed a desire to return to Alabama and law practice, an ambition motivated not only by the frustrations attending his "lone dissent" role but because of a more realistic viewpoint taken by other FCC members who have checked out—that it's tough sledding on $10,000 a year. However, the feeling is that, with sufficient industry support, he could be persuaded to accept a renomination.

FCC Chairman Wayne Coy is reported in favor of Durr's renomination and has told intimates he will go to the President on his behalf. President Truman, it's figured, might find in a pro-Durr gesture the avenue to a slice of the liberal Democratic vote.

The senatorial duo from Alabama wants Durr, but it's questionable how much weight the two would carry with the President in view of the fact that they came out only last week in opposition to the Chief Executive.

Midwest broadcaster sentiment among even NAB diehards is said to favor a new term for Durr and from labor (AFL, CIO), educator, and even commercial segments of the industry have come expressions that may crystallize in favorable action.

PROGRESSIVES SEEK TO RETAIN DURR IN RADIO

WASHINGTON, April 27.—Progressive outfits in and outside the radio field are already hard at work here trying to line up another spot where retiring FCC Commissioner Clifford J. Durr can "operate in the public interest." Several have declared publicly they would like to have his services as a "combo" lawyer-lobbyist to plug for causes he has espoused at the radio agency.

Move started when President Truman revealed last week that Durr had refused his offer of reappointment for another 7-year hitch in Government. The Commissioner himself says he has made no plans beyond June 30, when his present term expires.

It's generally believed he isn't interested in another government agency assignment, hasn't made up his mind about private law practice, and has several teaching offers, including a college presidency, at his disposal.

Announcement by Mrs. Virginia Durr that she will head the Henry A. Wallace campaign in northern Virginia has sparked new speculation on Durr's plans. The Commissioner declares, however, he has no political commitments and won't make up his mind on this count till after the party conventions. Meanwhile, he intends to stick at FCC through June 30. Already pushed for speaking and writing assignments, Durr addressed the Acoustical Society of America last Friday and blasted the House Un-American Committee for its treatment of atomic scientist E. O. Condon. He will speak before the Atomic Scientists next Friday and then fly to Columbus for the Ohio University radio institute sessions.

STOOD UP AND FOUGHT

Radio men here admit that, with the possible exception of ex-Chairman James Lawrence Fly, Durr has done more to influence FCC policies and radio regulation generally than any incumbent since 1934. His opinions, in dissenting and majority FCC decisions, have generally plugged for diversified ownership of radio outlets, an equal break for all groups in getting ether time, and rapid development of FM. He has challenged both Congress and the FBI when it appeared to him they were infringing on or abusing personal liberties.

For example, Durr was the first FCC'er to fight star-chamber tactics of the Cox committee investigating the radio agency in 1943–44. He protested a congressional technique of using a rider on a House appropriations bill to force dismissal of three FCC employees on loyalty charges in 1944. And he traded blows last winter with FBI's J. Edgar Hoover on the Justice Department's manner of collecting loyalty information on radio personalities.

He was a moving figure in FCC's decision to measure program performance against broadcasters' promises in renewing radio licenses. This in turn led to preparation of controversial Blue Book, fixing public-interest standards for broadcast operations. He held out for the AVCO transfer rule and waged an abortive fight to fix price ceilings on stations changing hands during the war years. One of his most controversial dissents declared that broadcasters should not have a blanket rule denying time on the air to an atheist and that under certain conditions, a non-believer had a right to be heard. He has been a vocal critic of overcommercialism in radio and of the impact of big business on station operations generally.

CLIFFORD J. DURR

Clifford J. Durr is one of the few Commissioners in the history of the FCC who has been able to see the woods for the trees. By contrast with the lawyers and engineers who have usually been his colleagues, he has insisted that the decisive criterion of radio service is not primarily the coverage pattern, the balance sheet, or the subtleties of a practitioner before the FCC bar, but what comes out of the loud speaker: the program. It is preeminently Durr who has refused to lend his assent to Commission decisions which might tend to corrode the foundations of a truly free and unmonopolized radio. It is Durr who has struck out sharply against inflated sale prices for facilities which are primarily the property of the public. And finally, it is Durr who has not hesitated to state his position publicly and in lucid terms, stumping the country from end to end to preach the gospel of democracy in radio.

To the great dissenter of the present FCC: the guardsman of the American people's stake in the air they nominally own and the most show-management-minded Commissioner on the FCC, Variety extends its esteem and its 1946 award.

OHIO STATE IN TRIBUTE TO DURR

COLUMBUS, OHIO, May 4.—FCC Commissioner Clifford Durr, one of the Ohio State Institute's faithfuls and the only Commission member to show for the 4-day session last week end, found himself Sunday night the recipient of an unexpected tribute. Dr. I. Keith Tyler, institute director, presented Durr with a lifetime membership, an honor which institute banqueters heartily applauded.

"His courage and integrity," said Tyler, "his willingness to 'stick his neck out' on matters of belief and conviction, have won the respect and admiration of all, whether or not they share his views. His deep devotion to the democratic process of discussion has been constantly exemplified by his own unstinted participation in innumerable sessions here. The many friends and admirers whom he has won by his activities here will not lightly face the prospect of future institutes without Mr. Durr."

As inconspicuously as any school-teacher delegate, Durr padded conscientiously from one session to another throughout the institute. In his only bit of speechmaking, he tossed the educational broadcasters a verbal bouquet.

Talking briefly to the National Association of Educational Broadcasters, Durr disclosed he'd received calls from several Republican Senators urging him to reconsider his decision to retire and promising to vote for his reappointment. Durr said he knew the States these Senators were from and believed their support stemmed from "the fine job you fellows (the educational broadcasters) are doing."

NAEB, with 82 stations now members, announced its annual meeting will be held early in October at the University of Illinois, following the annual school broadcasters meeting.

[From the Montgomery (Ala.) Advertiser]

CLIFF DURR—RADIO PUBLIC'S FRIEND

The best friend of the American radio listener is a gentleman from Montgomery—Clifford Judkins Durr.

Since Franklin Roosevelt named him to the Federal Communications Commission in October 1941, he has established himself as a national figure worthy of the people's confidence and esteem by insisting that the public weal is a matter of prime concern to the Commission.

As Time magazine says in the issue of June 24, Cliff Durr "has continually demanded better programing—more public service, fewer commercials—and opposed the purchase of stations by corporations with no knowledge of radio."

It is a curious fact that Durr should so often stand alone in his concept of public responsibility. "He dissents so often from his fellow Commissioners' decisions," says Time, "that it is big news when he says 'yes.'"

Fatherly, honest, courageous, Cliff Durr believes that Herbert Hoover was right when he said on the radio subject: "The ether is a public medium, and its use must be for public benefit. The use of radio channels is justified only if there is a public benefit. * * *"

When one listens to some of the stuff going out on the air these days to the children of America, it is easy to wish that all three of the member Commisisoners would support Durr's enlightened view.

This Montgomery product is fighting also to see that all the new frequency modulation channels are not gobbled up by the big fellows already in radio. Largely because of his efforts, the FCC has decided to hold out 90 FM channels for a year, thereby giving returning servicemen a chance to get into the broadcasting business.

Old friends sometimes have hoped Cliff Durr would come home and let his star shine in Alabama, but it is a selfish wish. He should never do it so long as he can stay in Washington and serve the whole Nation with such high distinction.

TOOK THE PEOPLE'S SIDE—CLIFFORD DURR QUITS THE FCC; FRIENDS TELL REASONS WHY—HOW REGULATORY AGENCIES ARE GRADUALLY TAKEN OVER BY BIG INTERESTS; WHAT'S THE REMEDY?

Uncle Sam is losing a good public servant. That's the way of progressives in Congress felt about it this week when Clifford J. Durr announced his resignation from the Federal Communications Commission.

That agency—which regulates radio broadcasting and the telephone and telegraph companies—has had really few dependable members in all its history. From the start in the 1920's, big broadcasting "chains" and station owners "packed" it with their hand-picked men, and rewarded them later by hiring many of them at fat salaries.

As a result, the air waves, which belong to all the American people, have been increasingly monopolized for private profit. No other Government agency has been involved in so many scandals as the FCC.

Durr has often "dissented" from rulings by the majority of his colleagues, and always he has been on the people's side.

Why did he decide to resign? Newspapers said it was because he could not support his family on his Government salary which is $10,000 a year, minus income taxes.

Durr is not talking for publication, but his close friends give other reasons.

Of course he would never get rich on Uncle Sam's pay, but, they say, he knows he can "get along" on it, and have a comfortable Government pension when he retires.

Though still in the full vigor of life, Durr is turning 56. His friends say that is the main reason why he decided to step out.

CLING TO JOBS

He has seen other officials, as they grew older, come to consider holding their Government job as more important than anything else. Fearing it was too late to make a new start in private life, they began to "shade" their opinions to please the powerful interests with might keep them in office or get them fired.

His friends doubt Durr would yield to such temptation, but said he feared he might do so unconsciously, so he got out while he is still able to make a place for himself.

That is an unusual explanation, but it fits in with Durr's ideas of public service. He expressed some of them in a recent speech which, incidentally, points out this situation.

STATE AGENCIES TOO

Not only individual officials, but also whole Government agencies, lose their fighting spirit as they grow older, and lean more and more toward the side of the private interests they are supposed to regulate.

Experienced observers know that is true not only of Uncle Sam's regulatory and administrative agencies but of those of the States.

Durr described a typical example.

"First," he said, "an evil is discovered and public feeling is aroused about it." Congress or some other legislative body moves in to correct the situation. It creates an agency with power to act, and tells that agency to see that the public interest is protected.

HOW IT WORKS

"The new agency pitches into its task with vigor. Its staff works day and night. Hearings are held and orders issued, fought through the courts, and finally sustained. The immediate evil is corrected.

"The public sighs with relief and goes back to its daily business of earning its living, secure in the belief that it now has a champion, that its interests will be protected without further concern on the public's part.

"The representatives of the industry that started the trouble changed their tactics. Their spokesmen begin to call on the members of the agency and its staff. They are nice fellows after you get to know them.

"LOOK LIKE PUBLIC"

"They call on the agency more often—sometimes with problems, sometimes just for a friendly chat.

"Gradually, they begin to look a little like the 'public.' At least they are the only members of the public the agency sees. The other members of the public don't come around.

"They are busy minding babies, driving trucks, teaching school, farming, and running grocery stores. They are far away, and the vision of them begins to grow a little blurred."

ALSO CALL ON CONGRESS

Meanwhile, Durr explained, the industry's lobbyists have also been visiting Members of Congress or the State legislatures, impressing them with the idea that the lobbyists are reasonable and attractive gentlemen. They haven't overlooked the executive branch of government. They succeed in getting their friends in the agencies.

So, next time the agency tries to do some real regulating, the cry goes up that the agency is going too far.

For all these reasons, the agency begins to back off from its job of regulation and reform. The private interests' lawyers and lobbyists, who are on their job all the time, get more and more of what they want. The public, which has many other things to think of, is more and more forgotten.

CAMPAIGN FUNDS INTERFERE

Is there a remedy? Obviously, any President or governor could help by appointing men who have proved themselves devoted to the public interest, and by refusing to reappoint men who yield to private interests. Why don't they do it? Largely because the interests and their retainers contribute to campaign funds. Durr did not quit because he thinks the FCC is hopelessly bad. On the contrary, his friends say, he considers that the Commission is doing a better job now than it has most of the time in the past. But there's plenty of room for improvement.

[From the New York Times of May 2, 1948]

MR. DURR'S DECISION

The decision of Clifford J. Durr not to accept reappointment to the Federal Communications Commission means the loss to that body of one of its ablest and at the same time most controversial figures. With his term expiring on June 30, Mr. Durr, in the light of his family responsibilities, believed it time to seek a more remunerative post than a commissionership which pays $10,000.

As an outspoken liberal of the New Deal school, Mr. Durr's career with the FCC always has been a tempestuous one and he himself would be the last either to expect or to want anyone always to agree with his views. But certainly he leaves the FCC with a record of both very real and very important accomplishment in behalf of better broadcasting.

Mr. Durr's guiding concept was a greater freedom of radio from the standpoint of the listener as opposed to the more publicized freedom of radio from the standpoint of the broadcaster. If not the father of the FCC's bluebook, which called for improved over-all balance in programing, he was its most energetic and articulate exponent. Though in practice the bluebook has been badly bleached, the mere discussion of its main points prompted the broadcasters to look at themselves and, in many cases, introduce beneficial reforms. For the achievement of that progress Mr. Durr is entitled to a generous share of the credit.

In his years devoted to broadcasting, Mr. Durr often was the lone dissenter on the FCC. Many of his points of view he was later to see accepted by the majority. His thoughtful opponents, if not the element of the trade press which delighted in subjecting him to petty and carping criticism, always respected his consistency of position in radio matters. In a business where expediency so often prevails, Mr. Durr's devotion to principle will be missed.

A PLACE ON THE PAY ROLL IS BESET BY HAZARDS

In 2 days hand running, and on two separate points, a Government official has got a load off his chest. He is Clifford Durr, a progressive and thoughtful member of the Federal Communications Commissions. First, he lets go at the low standards of pay that keeps many a qualified man from a career of public service. Himself, he has declined reappointment to FCC because with a home to keep, a family to rear and educate, he cannot make it on a Commissioner's salary.

The Commission and the public are the losers as Mr. Durr joins the long list of competent men forced out of Government service by congressional policy. It is a policy that, unless revised, in the end is bound to reduce public administration to a level of mediocrity. Besides those who have perforce gone back to business or the professions for their families' sake, there is no telling how many more have been deterred from taking appointments for the same reason.

However, it is on the second point of his discontent that Mr. Durr really lets the Government have it. He believes with many others that violence is being done to American institutions and traditions of individual freedom by such thought-policing practices as the so-called loyalty checks of all public workers. As part and parcel of the new surveillance he sees the judge-jury-executioner program of the committee on Un-American Activities which has a fresh illustration in the criticism of Dr. Edward U. Condon, director of the Bureau of Standards. Mr. Durr fears what he describes as "new standards of Americanism," "strange new courts," "new forms of punishment."

And it is true that if we go along with this scrutiny of ideas, this acceptance of the mental processes of J. PARNELL THOMAS and JOHN RANKIN as the measure of loyalty, the country is likely to find that something rather precious and fundamental has gone from our traditions of security. Far more perhaps than the financial consideration will this become a sure way to keep scrupulous and sensitive men out of public office.

DURR HONORED

CHICAGO, May 8.—A lifetime membership in the Ohio State Institute for Education by Radio was awarded Clifford Durr, FCC commissioner, at the institute's annual dinner Sunday night (2) in a gesture which found those in attendance rising to their feet to applaud him.

In making the award because of Durr's announced intention of resigning from the FCC, Dr. I. Keith Tyler, institute head, said, "It seems to me highly appropriate to express at this time the sentiment which I believe is shared by all who have known Clifford Durr and observed him in action here at these annual meetings. His courage and integrity, his willingness to 'stick out his neck' on matters of belief and conviction have won the respect and admiration of all, whether or not they share his views."

DURR AND CBS LEAD AWARDS MADE BY SCHOOL CONFERENCE

CHICAGO.—Clifford J. Durr, member of the FCC, was voted "man of the year" in educational radio by the 65 members of the advisory committee of the School Broadcast Conference in session here. In presenting the award for outstanding and meritorious service in the field of educational radio, George Jennings, director of the conference, said: "For 7 years Mr. Durr has been a stanch supporter and friend at court of educational radio. It was largely through his efforts that the educator's petition for additional frequencies in the FM band was granted. Commissioner Durr has evinced an understanding of the power of radio as a social force for good in the local community and has had great influence in the industry's program structure to the advantage of listeners and industry itself."

NEW YORK CRITICS CIRCLE PRESENTS CITATIONS—GROUP REGRETS DURR'S LEAVING COMMISSION POST

Issuing its first annual statement last week on radio and television, the recently organized Radio-Television Critics Circle of New York cited networks and a few independent stations for "outstanding service" during the year.

The circle also expressed regret for the impending departure of Clifford Durr from the FCC naming him a "symbol of public service ideals for radio."

Other citations went to the following: New developments, Child's World and Candid Microphone on ABC; network's relationship to the community in terms of public service, responsibility, information, and entertainment, CBS is There (now, You are There), Doorway to Life, documentary unit, CBS Views the Press, all CBS.

WNEW New York was again praised for its tolerance jingles, Little Songs and Big Subjects.

RADIO CRITIC

Although the radio industry may not recognize it, the expiration of Clifford J. Durr's term on the Federal Communication Commission at the end of June will deprive it of one of its best friends as well as of one of its severest critics. Mr. Durr has done a great deal to help radio grow up. He has encouraged broadcasters to emancipate themselves from their advertisers. He has fostered a measure of independence on the part of network affiliates. He has fought consistently for freedom of the air—viewing freedom always as the interest of the listener and insisting that radio make itself a medium for the conflict of ideas which is the essence of the democratic process. He has had faith in the tremendous potentialities of radio and an understanding of its great social impact.

In asking Mr. Durr to accept renomination, President Truman paid tribute to the quality of his service and made amends, at least in part, for certain past failures to reappoint other men who had served his administration faithfully and well. The request was the more commendable in this case because Mr. Durr has been a vigorous critic of the President's loyalty investigation program. There ought to be room in the Government for rebels of such courage; they relieve the conformity which is too often the curse of bureaucracy. It is a public misfortune that Clifford Durr can no longer afford the luxury of public service.

Federal Aid to Education

OF

HON. ADAM C. POWELL, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 18 (legislative day of Thursday, June 17), 1948

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following newspaper article and editorials:

RIGHTS AND DUTIES IN A DEMOCRACY

(By Luther P. Jackson)

READERS CALLED TO WRITE MEMBERS OF CONGRESS IN SUPPORT OF FEDERAL AID TO EDUCATION BILL

Upon every adult citizen falls the responsibility of writing letters or communicating in some way with the officeholders of the government under which he lives. At one time this may be the Federal Government, another time it may be the State, and finally it may be the local government. Throughout life every person has some need which only the officials of one of these three units of government can supply. For it is they who make the laws, raise funds by taxation, and decide for what purpose the money they raise shall be spent.

In the judgment of most Americans one of the greatest needs of our country now is a greater sum for the education of the millions of boys and girls in the elementary and secondary schools of the Nation. More money is needed for them in every State of the Union, but especially in the poorer States such as Virginia, Alabama, Louisiana, and others. More money is needed for every child in these States, but especially for the Negro child—that child upon whom less has been spent than any child in the United States.

The poorer States of the Union do not spend more money on education for the simple reason that they are financially unable. Because of the difference in the wealth of all the States, the amount each spends varies widely. In a Northern State a school system sometimes spends as high as $220 annually per child; in a Southern State the amount drops as low as $3.70 per child. Obviously this wide disparity needs to be corrected.

It appears that the only way to effect a change is for the Federal Government to come to the rescue with an eye to equalization of educational opportunities. Schools are so poor in some States and the people themselves are so poverty-stricken that we have today 2,000,000 children who are not enrolled in school and 10,000,000 adults who have such little education that they are virually illiterate. There is indeed more illiteracy in the United States than England, France, Russia, and other European countries.

Until the 19th day of the present month, when Congress is due to adjourn, the people of our country have an opportunity of securing money from the Federal Government for education by the time-honored method of bombarding Congress with letters and telegrams asking that this body act before the date of adjournment. Now is the time for individual citizens to act, for a bill to assist the States has already been passed by the Senate while now this bill is bottled up in a committee of the House of Representatives. It appears that a majority of the Members of the House favor this measure and would vote accordingly for it if only the Committee on Education and Labor would report it out to them. The fate of this vital bill depends mainly on the action of just four Members of this body. These are the Honorable JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Speaker of the House; the Honorable CHARLES A. HALLECK, majority leader of the House; the Honorable FRED HARTLEY, chairman, House Committee on Education and Labor; and the Honorable LEO E. ALLEN, chairman, House Rules Committee.

For a long time the people of our country have realized that the States alone cannot supply sufficient funds to guarantee a good education for the children within their borders. Bill after bill has been introduced in Congress for Federal aid, but each time it was defeated. Now in the present session the bill for this purpose has advanced further than ever before in the history of the effort to gain Federal aid.

I hope my announcement is clear. I have written this piece with the hope that all readers of it will act immediately. This is an S O S call. Wire or write Messrs. MARTIN and HALLECK urging favorable and early House action, and Messrs. HARTLEY and ALLEN urging favorable and early committee action. President Truman the other day urged the passage of the Federal bill; surely every humble citizen can do likewise.

[From the Chicago Defender of June 12, 1948]

SPEAKING OUT FROM THE NEW SOUTH

(By Robert Durr, for the NNPA)

WANTED: THE TOOL TO SAVE AMERICA

The best defense for America today depends upon the extent to which America makes available to all its children adequate and equal educational opportunities.

America, like a parent, fails in everything if it fails in its children—fails to give them the tool with which to serve and make the fullest contribution possible as responsible citizens to all that makes for a richer and fuller life by and for all. Education for complete living is the tool.

A great deal is being said these days about the menace of communism and its spread among the less alert, while too little recognition is given to the fact that history is replete with episodes of spiritual and violent rebellion of peoples against systems which denied them the opportunity to acquire the educational tools with which to earn bread and build a decent life for themselves and their loved ones.

There is an area today in America where out of public funds as much as $300 per year is appropriated for education for each child of school age. And another poor and backward area, as little as $3.75 per year is the score.

The children who are getting the $3.75 education are going out into the world to compete with those getting the $300 education, which means that the former have two strikes on them before they come to bat. If they should hit the ball with rotten bats, the same will be splintered in their faces and so blinding them that in desperation they will yield to the philosophy on changing the form of government which denies them the educational tools with which to work, fight, and serve on a basis of equality.

SENATE PASSES BILL

The Senate of the United States, on April 1, 1948, by a vote of 56 to 22 passed S. 472, proposing $300,000,000 for Federal aid to education. At this writing, H. R. 2953, counterpart of S. 472, is resting in the House Committee on Education and Labor where it has been favorably reported 6 to 2 by a subcommittee.

If the pending legislation is not given the green light by the Speaker of the House, Mr. MARTIN, and the majority floor leader, Representative CHARLES A. HALLECK, Indiana, during this session, when it seems to have an excellent chance of passage, an irreparable disservice will be done to helpless children of this Nation who need the educational tools with which to save America from a totalitarian form of government.

Seldom in American history has more power over the basic welfare of millions of children been concentrated in the hands of two men. The Martin-Halleck decision, whatever it may be, will cut deeply across the face of American history.

It is completely past our understanding that the $300,000,000 cost of H. R. 2953 should stand in the way of its passage when we are committed to five or six billions a year for Europe and Asia and fifteen billions a year for military defense.

The amount of money called for in the Federal aid-for education bill now pending before Congress—$300,000,000—is a very small amount compared to the aid we are rightly giving for the reconstruction of the war-devastated countries of the world. It is less than 1 percent of the Federal budget.

When one finds that under our plan of aid to Europe we are spending $265,000,000 for tobacco, one wonders about our sense of values. It is true that the tobacco industry is a part of the economic life of our country and of the countries being aided. We submit, however, that this operation is less vital to the welfare of the world than the educational well-being of the children of our own country.

Seventy-one million dollars' worth of the grain to go overseas under the European recovery program this year is allocated to the liquor industries of the European countries. This, too, may be a part of the economic life of these nations. But, again, we insist that the education of American youth is more important.

EDUCATION THE FOUNDATION

Education is the foundation upon which the national defense of the country must rest. The facts of World War II are ample evidence of this.

Consider the burden of educational neglect in connection with World War II. We rejected 659,392 men for educational deficiency—twice as many as were deployed in combat divisions in the entire Pacific theater. Five million of fifteen million men examined under selective service were rejected for deficiencies, most of which could have been prevented had we had the kind of schools the Nation needed.

Thirty-two and one-tenth percent of the rejections among Negroes, who reside in the main in the poorer States, was due to lack of education.

The percentage rate of rejections for whites was 17 times as high in Texas as in Oregon; for Negroes, 12 times as high in Alabama as in Minnesota.

Passage of the Federal-aid bill would be like casting bread upon the waters which would come back many days hence multiplied a hundredfold in the form of a broadened basis of informed and responsible democratic citizenship on all levels, with ability to see and appreciate the America so many now only look at.

If the House fails the children of America in the matter of provision of basic equality of educational opportunity, it fails in all efforts insofar as preservation and extension of democracy and the building of real security, peace, and prosperity is concerned.

P. S.—Wire or write immediately urging favorable and early House action on H. R. 2953: The Honorable JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Jr., Speaker of the House, Congress of the United States, Washington 25, D. C.; the Honorable CHARLES A. HALLECK, majority leader of the House, Congress of the United States, Washington 25, D. C.

FEDERAL AID FOR EDUCATION

Mrs. Eugene Meyer, the vigorous and liberal wife of the Washington Post publisher and one of the most indefatigable workers for a better lot for all citizens, was clearly on sound ground when she asserted not long ago in an address at Howard University that national defense and the protection of American ideals are vitally dependent upon a minimum standard of education for all children of the Nation. A member of the President's Commission on Higher Education, which has submitted a forthright and challenging report to the Chief Executive, Mrs. Meyer flatly accused Republican leaders in the House of Representatives of responsibility for providing Federal aid to the States for delaying enactment of legislation providing Federal aid to the States for educational purposes.

The bill, H. R. 2953 (the McCowan bill), counterpart of S. 472, already passed by the Senate, would provide $300,000,000 for aid to education. As this was written, the measure was still tied up in the House Committee on Education and Labor.

A great many people of all groups, races, and classes are exerting strenuous efforts to effect positive action on the bill. Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower, now president of Columbia University, and 80 other prominent persons jointly telegraphed House Speaker MARTIN on June 6 and urged that the lower Chamber of Congress vote on the bill. What they said in their plea should have the widest dissemination. They argued:

"The world conflict between democracy and communism is intense and real. Our democracy can win the ideological battle only if we implement our ideals and become more democratic here at home.

"The cost of the program, $300,000,000, is insignificant in comparison with the total expense for national defense and the European recovery program. The Congress is mobilizing every human and material resource for any eventualities of peace or war.

It cannot afford to neglect the quality of the Nation's manpower."

How true, that is, was tragically demonstrated in the last conflict, when otherwise able and patriotic youths were found unsuited for service in our armed forces and unprepared to help in the home-front defense-industry program because of their lack of education.

The Senate passed the companion bill on April 1 last. Why are these bills important? Here are a few facts vouched for by experts:

1. Some school systems expend as much as $200 or more annually per school child as compared to sums amounting to as little as $3.70 known to be expended by a great number of poverty school districts.

2. In 1940 nearly 2,000,000 children between the ages of 5 and 17 were not enrolled in school.

3. More than 1,175,000 children were enrolled in 1940 in school systems which spent $18.50 or less per pupil.

4. Approximately 10,000,000 adult Americans have so little education as to be virtually illiterate.

5. Selective Service rejected 5,000,000 young men during recent years because of physical, mental, and educational limitations.

Federal aid would insure a minimum national standard of education for all public elementary and public secondary (high) school children (ages 5 to 17) in the United States through a stipulated expenditure per year for each public elementary and public secondary school child.

No State will receive less, under the terms of the Senate bill, than $5 per year for each child of school age and, under the House bill, not less than $3 per year for each school-age child. Not less than $50 annually would be spent on each school child under terms of the Senate bill; not less than $40 per year under the House measure.

Much of this equalization fund from Federal sources would go to the Southern States in which the Negro school population is tremendously high and where the needs are greatest.

Senator CONNALLY (Democrat, of Texas) gloated not long ago over his success in removing some of the precautionary language of the Senate bill which he said would permit the States to preserve their rights. Under the experience of the past, these rights are used to cheat the Negro of a just share of funds allocated to the States.

It would be much more desirable if the bill had strong precautions against the short-changing practice. Many observers feel that it still has adequate safeguards in this respect.

Others who are not so sure feel that if the distribution of the funds shows an abuse of constitutional rights to equal education that the courts, if the challenge is raised, will outlaw the inequalities and that the bill should be reported out in as good shape as it is possible to have it and that the best long-range strategy is to avoid insisting on air-tight amendments which would result in the entire legislative project being filibustered to death.

The States—certainly those where the bulk of Negroes live—can do with some assistance. If the Federal-aid bill is passed, all children stand a chance of a much better education.

PROVIDE EDUCATION FOR ALL

On April 1, the United States Senate passed bill S. 472 proposing annual Federal expenditures of $300,000,000 in aid of public elementary and secondary education. Companion bill H. R. 2953 has been pending in the House Committee on Education and Labor for some time.

Support of the Senate bill on Federal aid to education has been growing among Representatives, and it is believed that the bill will be enacted into law by a big majority when it comes to the floor of the House.

This newspaper supports the action of the Senate and urges Chairman FRED HARTLEY, JR., and his colleagues on the House Committee on Education and Labor to act favorably on H. R. 2953 in time that House action can be taken at this session of the Congress. Immediate passage of this measure is necessary to aid the effort to equalize educational opportunity for the children of the Nation.

The case for Federal aid to education is self-explanatory. Educational opportunity for every American child is basic for the survival and growth of democracy. The uneven distribution of the Nation's wealth and literacy makes it imperative that Federal aid to education be Nation-wide and made available to all the States, so that they may be able to carry their full educational responsibility.

Federal aid to education will contribute much toward the solution of the problem of the more than 2,000,000 United States children, aged 5 to 17, who are not enrolled in any school; increase the per capita expenditure of those school systems which spend as low as $3.50 per year; wipe out the great number of "poverty" school districts, which have given the Nation more than 10,000,000 virtually illiterate citizens, and caused 5,000,000 men to have been rejected by selective service because of educational, mental, and physical handicaps.

Federal aid to education and the welfare of the United States are indivisible. The time to act on this important matter is now, when we are sending billions abroad to strengthen the democratic nations and forces of the world. The home base should and must not be forgotten in these days of crisis.

GOP STALEMATING EDUCATION-AID BILL

WASHINGTON.—The failure of the House of Representatives to act favorably on Federal-aid-to-education legislation is a severe disappointment to a large segment of American people, according to an exclusive survey conducted last week.

More than twenty-five leading national Negro organizations and many local groups with a combined membership in excess of three and a half million adults indicated in this survey that they favor passage of Federal education aid.

PASSED BY SENATE

The bill, passed in the Senate by a 58 to 22 vote on April 1, is now stymied in the House. Advocates of the bill contend that the House leadership, represented by Speaker JOE MARTIN, (Republican, of Massachusetts) and Majority Leader CHARLES HALLECK (Republican, of Indiana) has the bill blocked and that it cannot be dislodged from the House Labor Committee and it cannot be granted a rule by the House Rules Committee until MARTIN and HALLECK give the green light.

The Senate bill was sponsored by Senator ROBERT TAFT and a bipartisan list of seven other Senators. In the House, it is sponsored by Representative EDWARD O. MCCOWEN (Republican, of Ohio).

SETS $50 MINIMUM

Under the terms of the bill, an annual Federal appropriation of $300,000,000 would be spent to improve education among the Nation's public elementary and secondary schools and would provide a minimum of $50 to be spent per child per year.

The National Education Association, which is backing the bill, points out that some school districts, notably those in which Negroes are segregated in the impoverished States of the deep South, spend as little as $3.75 annually per pupil, while some of the richer districts spend $220 annually for each pupil. Under this bill every school child is guaranteed an education expenditure of at least $50 per year. The NEA also points out that this Nation has 10,000,000 adult illiterates and a high armed services rejection rate because of illiteracy.

According to the NEA, both bills, S. 472 and H. R. 2935, provide for "fair and equitable" distribution of funds.

[From the Philadelphia Tribune of May 22, 1948]

EDUCATION AND DEFENSE

An aspect of Federal aid to education seldom considered may be gathered from the following statement in an analysis of the matter contained in a recent publication of the National Education Association: "We wish to state with all the power at our command that the first line of defense for this Nation lies now and always in the intelligence and the physical well-being of the people of this country. The future of the United States depends upon the youth of today."

All of us remember—or do we—the shock we experienced when such a large percentage of men examined in World War II under Selective Service were rejected for deficiencies most of which could have been prevented had the Nation the kind of schools needed.

Of particular interest is that almost one-third of the rejections among Negroes were for educational deficiencies since they came from the States where educational opportunities are below the national level. Even among whites the rejections from Southern States based on lack of education were many times those from Northern States.

Compared with the $15,000,000,000 which we will spend for European recovery, which among other things, is a defense measure, the cost of Federal aid to education is small. The Senate having passed the bill, the House of Representatives should follow suit, provided that the funds will be so used as to furnish equal opportunities for all the children of all the States which get aid.

Joe Bridges: Splendid American

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by me regarding the career of John Joseph Bridges, who died in the Doctors Hospital in Washington on June 16.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, on the afternoon of last Wednesday, June 16, there died in the Doctors' Hospital in Washington, after an illness of several months, an "old-timer," of the construction days of the Panama Canal. He was John Joseph Bridges, about 70 years of age.

"Joe" Bridges, as he was known to all friends and associates, lived a very active and useful life. He was born in Bedford County, Pa., at, or near, Bean's Cove, almost on the Mason and Dixon's line of historic fame. He grew up to become a railroading man and served for some time as a locomotive engineer on the B. & O. Railroad.

In 1907, he entered the service of the Isthmian Canal Commission and went to the Isthmus, where he was employed in the transportation division of the construction work of the Canal, serving most of the time as locomotive engineer on dirt trains in hauling spoil from the great cut at Culebra to the Gatun Dam on the Atlantic side, and to the Pacific side to reclaim from the sea the lands now constituting the site of Fort Amador at the Pacific entrance of the Canal. He remained in the construction service until the date of completion of the Canal, officially designated as March 31, 1914. He thereupon remained for 2 or 3 years on the Isthmus in the organization of the Canal, and then finally left that service and returned to the United States.

He was a highly skilled and efficient railroader and made his distinctive contribution to the building of the great Isthmian waterway. His work was typical of that performed by the thousands of skilled American civilian employees engaged in this, the greatest industrial enterprise of history. Through heat and storm they bore the burdens of toil and performed the indispensable tasks involved; thus, with a skill and speed unparalleled in history, the dream of the ages came to glorious fruition. Not only has our own, as well as the universal, commerce been tremendously served by the successful operation of the Panama Canal, but, also, in the two great World Wars this mighty link between the seas vastly—and perhaps indispensably—contributed to the success of the allied effort, and to the saving, perhaps, of civilization itself.

While on the Isthmus Joe Bridges was the unfailing and effective champion and representative of the skilled workers.

After leaving the Isthmian service, he returned to the States. Home again, following years of absence, he found that he had lost all seniority rights and benefits as a railroad man, in consequence of which he did but little further railroading. Thereupon, for a number of years, he made his home in Miami, Fla., and was there engaged in real-estate activities and gave considerable attention to civic affairs.

The failure of Congress to enact legislation to grant recognition and rewards to American civilians engaged in the construction of the Canal, induced in him a very keen sympathy for all those who, like himself, had suffered from the reduction in force on the Isthmus after the completion of the building of the Canal, and who, thereupon, were not covered into the permanent organization for the maintenance and operation of the Canal, nor were received into regular civil-service employments of our Government. He immediately became a strong advocate of the passage of legislation by the Congress to grant recognition and rewards to all the American civilian employees and officials who had been engaged on the Isthmus in the construction of the Canal, the same to be generally comparable with those benefits accorded by the act of March 4, 1915, to all those of the Army, Navy, and Public Health Service who had been similarly engaged for 3 years or more. He thus became a member of a committee representing these civilian workers and served in 1915 and 1916, but, although a bill for such purpose was introduced, no favorable action resulted. Then World War I came, and the efforts of this committee became altogether unavailing, and the action advocated by it faded from the public mind. However, he did not forget the justice of the cause he represented, nor the gross discrimination which had been thus practiced.

Finally, long after the close of that war, he came from Miami to Washington in the early part of 1938—as I recall—as the national representative of the Panama Canal builders' National Legislative Association, and initiated and for 6 or 7 years, led the long, difficult but finally successful fight in behalf of the survivors of this civilian body of construction employees. Though concerned for all these, he was interested especially—as just stated—in those who, like himself, had not been retained in the permanent organization, or otherwise covered into permanent employment in the Government service and who, on returning home, had to begin life over again. Although he was a man without wealth or means, he served through these arduous years without compensation for his time and efforts, receiving only shreds of contribution from old timers scattered over the country to aid him in paying for actual necessary expenses while thus engaged. His continuing and tireless efforts were finally rewarded by the passage and approval of the act of May 29, 1944, which extended the thanks of Congress to all American civilian employees engaged in the construction of the Panama Canal, for whatsoever time; and also accorded benefits or gratuities, in the form of so-called annuities, based on length of Isthmian service and compensation received therefor, to those of the special civilian groups just mentioned who had served 3 years or more on the Isthmus in the construction work of the Canal.

At the outset of this latter effort, he immediately sought my aid and advice, and these throughout I freely and gladly gave. I came fully to understand the merits of the cause thus presented and it became my privilege and, indeed, my honor to introduce in the Senate, and to fight for the enactment of, this most just and long-delayed legislation. Accordingly, through several sessions, I introduced and reintroduced the required measure. Concurrently, in the House, Congressman J. HARDIN PETERSON, like myself, of Florida, introduced in that body identical measures. Hence, he led the fight in the House, as I led the fight in the Senate. While these measures, after full hearings, were favorably reported several times by the committees of the respective Houses, a long period was required to bring about the enactment. The chief stumbling blocks were the length of time which had elapsed since the completion of the canal, and the cost which such legislation would entail as estimated by the governmental departments. Finally these estimates, upon more exhaustive investigation, were substantially reduced, with the result that departmental approval followed and enactment came. The bill introduced by me in the Seventy-eighth Congress, S. 633, passed the Senate on May 15, 1944, and the House on May 22, 1944; the identical companion bill in the House, sponsored by Congressman PETERSON, begin H. R. 1117. The President's approval followed and the legislation came to be the act of May 29, 1944.

This was as far as the Congress, at the time, was willing to go in that enactment; but at the present session, H. R. 2273 has been passed to broaden the base of these annuity benefits so as to include those of 3 years' canal-construction service who were employed in the permanent organization of the Panama Canal or in the civil-service branches in the United States, with contributory payments for regular civil-service retirement benefits. Certain benefits had already been granted some of these, but all will now come under the act of May 29, 1944, as amended; that is to say, all survivors.

Except for the work that Joe Bridges did for the enactment of the basic measure, the recently enacted broadening amendment could never have become a law. Hence all who have or who may become beneficiaries under these enactments owe an everlasting debt of gratitude to this faithful, sturdy, and indomitable man who now sleeps in his native soil in the mountain foothills of Bedford County, Pa. His courage and persistence, in the face of obstacles that seemed altogether overwhelming, were remarkable. His zeal was truly inspirational. He seemed never to know the word "fail." His cause was, indeed, just, and slowly, but surely, Congress—in the midst of multiplied activities and current demands—came to recognize this fact and enacted the indicated legislation, thus removing the gross discrimination practiced, as between the special services groups and the American civilians, just after the completion of the canal. His own annuity benefits were of modest character, but he was consumed with a desire to serve all those he believed to have had practiced against them the suggested discrimination. He was a fine, upstanding American, and typical of the best fiber of American life.

He left surviving him a son, two daughters, and several grandchildren.

I came to know him well and learned to admire him for his worth. He was my friend and I was his. I am very grateful that in some measure I was able to aid in bringing about the enactment of the exceedingly just, but long-delayed, legislation now described. He did not long survive to enjoy the benefits of this legislation. This is, indeed, tragic; but such is life. I join with old-timers and his many friends throughout the country and on the Isthmus of Panama in mourning his death.

Permit me to conclude with the following lines, written not so long ago, by another old-timer, touching the Panama Canal and its builders:

"The mountains moved, and the waters rose;
And Faith, at last, fulfilled her Dream:
Lake, Lock, and Channel—the whole World knows—
Attest the worth of a Hope Supreme!
The ships now shuttle from Shore to Shore:
Up, up, and up—and thence straight on;
Then three times downward—and on, once more—
Into the Sunset or the Dawn!

"All were as one; and They strove and wrought
To shape the Passage to the Ind.
In terms of life it was dearly bought;
In money, cheap. The Ranks are thinned
By Time and Death; but the Deed They did
Excels all others of like and kind;
Its strength and virtue cannot be hid:
It lives—all tongues and lands to bind!"

Record of the Republican Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Muddled, Do-Nothing Record of the Republican Congress," by Sam Tucker, from the Decatur (Ill.) Herald of June 15, 1948.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MUDDLED, DO-NOTHING RECORD OF THE REPUBLICAN CONGRESS—SPENDING MOUNTS, MAJOR ITEMS OF LEGISLATION BLOCKED BY PARLIAMENTARY DODGING

(By Sam Tucker)

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Just as a refresher, it should be recalled that the Eightieth Congress which is now muddling toward an adjournment on June 19 with most of its important work undone, is the same Congress that began by promising a $6,000,000,000 reduction in Government expense, a wholesale dismissal of surplus pay-rollers and a return to sound, efficient government on all fronts.

Every promise is unfulfilled. Even without counting foreign aid, the promised economics are not realized. Government employees are being added, not subtracted; right now at the rate of about 650 a day net.

By jamming through a tax reduction bill before making economies in expenditures, the Congress has insured a deficit in the year ahead and necessity for new taxes (after election).

That's not the whole story of incapacity and mischief. Against the advice of every expert witness, disregarding the public will as shown in every poll, and ignoring the grave warnings of the men charged with responsibility for defending the country, the majority party in this Congress has refused to provide an adequate military defense by either selective service or universal military training.

After authorizing United States participation in the European recovery program, the House majority tried to sabotage the plan by refusing the funds that had been promised—thus raising in every country of Europe the suspicion that the word of the United States cannot be trusted.

Leaders of both parties agreed at the beginning of this Congress that housing constitutes one of the most urgent problems before the country. The Senate passed a bill designed to provide half a million family units.

Republican leaders in the House have blocked it, calling the proposal "socialistic"—curious Republican judgment upon Senator ROBERT A. TAFT, the author. The net result, again, is nothing done.

A wave of consumer protest from the country over demanded an end of the discriminatory taxes upon oleomargarine. Members of the House heard this rising revolt and voted 2-to-1 for repeal; a little handful of cow-State Senators has blocked all action on that.

Federal aid for education, to eliminate the tragic inequalities of opportunity as between different neighborhoods in the country, also was supported by Senator TAFT, the chosen leader of the Republican policy committee, Republican representatives refused to follow him and have killed it by inaction.

Now, in the final week of a session, the lights burn in Capitol Halls far into the night while the Members argue over—the great reforms that were promised last election season? Oh, no; over the routine, departmental appropriation bills that should have been completed last February, at the latest in March.

In this frantic, last-minute rush with little time to consider anything, little opportunity left for amendment, Congress is trying to do all at once the work it should have done last winter.

President Truman has political incentives for criticism of Congress, and because of his own obvious blunders his judgments are discounted. To take the matter out of the realm of party politics entirely, one needs only consider the indictment of Republicans by Republicans.

A Republican majority in the Armed Services Committee approved months ago and asked for open consideration of the universal service bill as a permanent policy of national strength. Representative LEO ALLEN, of Illinois, and four like-minded Republicans of the dictatorial Rules Committee have decided by themselves that the Congress shall not even have a chance to vote on the matter.

Senator TAFT, the ostensible leader, is demanding housing, aid for education, a reasonable public health program. JESSE WOLCOTT, Republican chairman of the House Committee on Banking and Currency, says all that is "socialism," and he has blocked it.

Senator VANDENBERG, wise elder stateman and demonstrably the least partisan patriot in the Congress, pleads for fulfillment of promises in European recovery; Republican JOHN TABER of the House says it shall not be done, and is able to obstruct it.

Republican Senator THYE, of Minnesota, says the margarine tariff shall stay; Republican Senator BROOKS is recorded against it, along with a two-thirds majority of the House.

Congressional farm representatives of both parties wanted to continue reciprocal trade agreements; Republican Representative BERTRAND GEARHART, of California, could, and did kill them, with the help of a handful of others who still think in terms of 1900 tariff walls.

In the face of such internal divisions and conflicts within the majority party itself, leading in most cases to total inability to act and so to the disgraceful log-jam of vital legislation in the last days of the session, it is proper to ask, what is a Republican? What is Republican policy?

Is the true spokesman VANDENBERG or TABER? JESSE WOLCOTT or TAFT? LEO ALLEN, of Illinois, or TOM MARTIN, of Iowa? ALEXANDER WILEY, of Wisconsin, or ALEXANDER SMITH, of New Jersey? They stand in direct opposition, and with such stubborn insistence that the result is no action at all.

Aided and abetted by such sly friends of reaction as Speaker JOE MARTIN, they have prevented even a vote upon the measures of most tremendous consequence for national welfare.

They will not submit their case to a majority decision, to be voted up or voted down, in the democratic tradition. Their method is parliamentary dodging, to evade responsibility and deny opportunity for a vote.

By reason of glacial movement in the vast, unwieldly population, the Republican Party seems certain to win complete control of the Government next January. By reason of their own unreconcilable differences, it appears, equally certain that they will present the country, not with leadership, not with a program, but with a dog fight.

After 16 years of vituperation against the "New Deal," they cannot agree among themselves upon the repeal of one key law of that loosely defined program.

Henry Clay

OF

HON. JOHN SHERMAN COOPER

OF KENTUCKY

Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a biographical sketch of Henry Clay written by Mr. David B. G. Rose, of Louisville, Ky. In a recent competition on the Dr. I. Q. radio program, Mr. Rose received the winning award of $465 for this sketch.

Mr. Rose is one of our oustanding Kentucky citizens. He has been an industrial and civic leader in his city and State for years; he has served in public posts with the finest zeal and efficiency. He recently completed a term as State superintendent of printing for Kentucky, and in that position he saved the taxpayers of the State large sums of money and has earned their enduring gratitude. I consider Mr. Rose's sketch as being an able and concise outline of the history of the great American commoner, who, for so many years, by his eloquence and statesmanship, contributed in outstanding manner to the maintenance of the American Union; and who, also, as a great advocate of Latin-American independence, led his country to recognize and give assistance to aid the aspirations and efforts of those countries for freedom.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HENRY CLAY

(By David B. G. Rose, of Louisville, Ky.)

Among the greatest, if not the greatest, of all American statesmen since the establishment of the Union.

Born in Virginia in 1777 of humble parentage, was only 4 years of age when his father died.

Was called the Mill Boy of the Slashes.

Was apprentice to a pharmacist at the age of 14.

Through the influence of a friend, he secured a clerkship in the high court of the Virginia chancery when only 16 years of age.

Moved to Kentucky at the age of 20 to engage in the practice of law.

Was unable to pay his weekly board.

In his homespun garments and his awkward manners was ridiculed and made fun of by the boys of the time.

His studious habits and diligence in his efforts soon won the favorable opinion of those who had once made fun of him in his earlier days.

He married at the age of 22.

At the very beginning of his practice as a lawyer, he became the champion of the downtrodden, and especially of the free institutions of the young Republic.

The attempted passage of the alien and sedition laws, which he believed were contrary to the Constitution and Bill of Rights, had his unyielding opposition, and he was able to bring about their defeat.

He was elected to the Kentucky State Legislature when 23 years of age.

He was appointed to the United States Senate at the age of 29. He advocated the establishment of the United States Bank. He was elected to the House of Representatives and was made Speaker at the very beginning of his first term—the first time in history that the Speaker was elected during his first term in Congress.

He served in the Senate of the United States for 35 years.

He stood first and foremost among the statesmen of the country in demanding that the United States make no compromise with England, whereupon the War of 1812 ensued. He was sent as an Ambassador to make the treaty with England. In making the treaty, he insisted upon the establishing of free trade and sailors' rights upon the high seas.

He was termed the great "Pacificator" by the people throughout the country due to his persistent efforts to bring to a successful conclusion the Missouri Compromise, which was first presented to the Nation in 1818, Missouri having been refused admission to the Union because of its unwillingness to agree to the abolition of slavery, the forerunner of the effort to establish the "law" of State Rights.

His purpose in advocating the Missouri Compromise was to prevent the possibility of a war between certain States and the Federal Government, an ever-arising question that aroused the southern, and some of the western States as to State rights, as it concerned the question of slavery.

He was in dead earnest and continually active in his efforts to prevent the war between the States.

When the Indians were deprived of their property by the then President of the United States, he took up the battle for justice to the Indians.

He left Congress in 1820, but in response to the demands of his constituents, returned in 1821, in order to continue his fight for the Missouri Compromise, which at that time all but threatened the Nation with civil war.

Long before he arrived at the age the Constitution permits a person to be elected to the Presidency, this super statesman was considered the one man of the Nation for that great office.

The financiers insidiously and constantly opposed the establishment of a United States bank. He, however, succeeded in its establishment, but not for long.

He first entered the Senate in 1806 and resigned in 1842.

On his visit to England, following the War of 1812, where he was sent as an ambassador, Macaulay said of him, "His mind was a vast magazine, admirably arranged; everything was there and everything in its place."

He was reelected to Congress in 1815 while abroad.

The United States engaged in war with England in 1812, then the most powerful nation on earth. The United States was successful beyond all expectation. She, single-handed, without the alliance of any other nation, became the victor.

He championed the freedom of the South American countries as against the continuing control by the nations across the sea; and was the friend and adviser of Simon Bolivar, the South American liberator.

He was the one great force by which the Nation was to continue as a unity. For "States' rights"—yes, but always within the Constitution; the individual States within their respective rights, and only as inseparable parts of the United States as a whole.

He refused an appointment as Ambassador to Russia, and declined appointment to a post in the Cabinet of President Monroe, but later served as Secretary of State in the Cabinet of President John Quincy Adams. This service, because of the political quarrels of the time, caused him to be bitterly denounced by his opponents and brought about a bloodless duel between himself and a radical leader of the opposition. His preferred service was in the Halls of Congress where he believed he could be of the greatest benefit to his country.

After retiring from the Senate in 1842, he was chosen to run for the Presidency in 1844 at the Baltimore convention. For many years he was the national leader of his party, and although three times its candidate for President, never was elected.

Because of his many activities and his advocacy of important questions before the Nation during his more than 40 years of active public life, his loyalty to the country and its principles, he had made many enemies among the rich and the powerful, but he never wavered or compromised in his efforts to seek justice for the oppressed for liberty and the protection of his country.

He was defeated for the Presidency, due in no little measure to his championship of justice, right, and truth. He gave utterance at the time to that famous phrase, "I had rather be right than be President."

In 54 years of his engagement as a lawyer, it was said that he never lost a case; however, on one occasion he defended one, proved to be afterwards an innocent man, who was accused and hanged for murder. Confession was afterwards made by the murderer of his guilt.

He died on the 29th of June 1852.

The Federal Price-Support Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OWEN BREWSTER

OF MAINE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "A Word of Appreciation," appearing in the Maine Potato Growers News for June 1948.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A WORD OF APPRECIATION

As a result of the efficient administration of the Federal price-support program during the past season, our market has been at support or just slightly above throughout the entire season. In the opinion of the writer, the handling of this price-support program so as to maintain prices at support, and at the same time avoid the creating of a fictitious shortage, has been one of the cleverest pieces of administration that we have seen in a long time.

Any time that any Government administrators make mistakes they get panned good and plenty, which is as it should be in a democracy. However, too often when they do a good job, it is taken for granted. We certainly hope that such will not be the case with reference to the administration of price support on potatoes this year. We believe that our growers in Maine at least should express to the county PMA committee, to the State PMA committee, and to the administrators in Washington their congratulations on an extremely successful administration and their appreciation for the very capable manner in which the price-support program has been handled.

To those of us who may be arm-chair generals, it is easy to sit back and tell how such a program can and should be administered. However, just stop and think a minute. If the Government had not taken enough potatoes off the market in the form of export, diversion, and so forth, prices would have sagged below support. On the other hand, if they had taken a few too many potatoes off the market, prices might have skyrocketed at the tail-end of the year, with a resulting justified condemnation on the part of consumers and taxpayers. To maintain a proper balance under these conditions and be able to take off the market just enough potatoes and yet not too many was an extremely difficult accomplishment.

We do not doubt but what if the Federal Government had taken the recommendation of some of us in the industry at some times during the past year, they would have taken too many potatoes off the market at the detriment of everyone. Therefore, we ask that our grower-members do two things. One, that they recognize the extreme difficulty of maintaining a program that will hold this potato market at a constant level such as has been done this past year. Secondly, that they realize the extremely constructive job that has been done by PMA and the various Government administrators, and when opportunity presents itself, express to those people our appreciation for a job well done. We pan them enough when we think they are wrong. Let us give them credit when they are right.

National Literacy Education

OF

HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE

OF WEST VIRGINIA

Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD several editorials on the problem of adult illiteracy in the United States, with special reference to the bill entitled "National Literacy Education Act" introduced by Senators WAYNE MORSE, WARREN G. MAGNUSON, and myself.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Fairmont (W. Va.) Times of Monday June 7, 1948]

KILGORE PROPOSES

Last week Senator HARLEY M. KILGORE introduced in the United States Senate a measure titled the National Literary Education Act of 1948. It probably will be known as the Kilgore-Magnuson-Morse Education Act because Senator KILGORE is acting in conjunction with Senator WARREN G. MAGNUSON, of Washington, and Senator WAYNE MORSE, of Oregon.

The measure would make available $125,000,000 of Federal funds to be spent over the next 10 years for adult education. According to the 1940 census, there were 10,000,000 adults in the United States who could not read and write sufficiently well to use such skills.

Senator KILGORE'S argument for the measure is worthy of your study. He said:

"The man who does not understand is always a dangerous man. He cannot go along with his social group, because he cannot grasp their motives or their goal. He cannot go along with his country, because he fails to grasp his country's aims. The 10,000,000 functional illiterates in America today cannot read the Declaration of Independence or the Constitution of the United States. They will not get the significance of what they hear on the radio—their only contact with national and world affairs. It is primarily to this group of illiterates that international communism has directed, on a level which can be understood, its floods of propaganda, including among other things, distorted facts about America. Talk about 'democracy' and 'our way of life' is largely unintelligible to illiterates. They cannot understand democracy just by hearing about it. They cannot understand democracy even by living in it. It takes the written word to make the past, the present, and the future of democracy a vital and realistic truth. Our people must, down to the last man and woman, be able to understand fully the meaning of democracy if this Nation of free and independent people is to survive. Each individual must be equipped to use that fundamental tool, the written word."

In order to make a concerted frontal attack upon the problem of adult illiteracy, a national program is needed. Such a program is proposed in the attached draft of a bill, "To assist the States in the removal of adult illiteracy by the development and maintenance of removal of special programs of basic elementary education for adults." This bill provides for a cooperative program of action as between the Office of Education,

Federal Security Agency, and the State departments of education in the several States. It authorizes an appropriation of $5,000,000 for fiscal 1949; rising to $10,000,000 for fiscal 1950; $15,000,000 in each fiscal year from 1951 through fiscal 1957; and decreasing to $5,000,000 in 1958–59 when the program of Federal aid would terminate.

"Each State on which a State application had been received and approved by the Commissioner would be entitled to an allotment of Federal funds in the proportion that the number of adults in the State who had not completed the fifth grade of school, as reported by the Bureau of the Census, bears to the number of such adults in all of the States. The funds so allotted would be used under the direction and supervision of State departments of education for the purpose of stimulating the organization of classes for adults designed to develop the ability to read, write, speak and understand the English language, to perform elementary arithmetical computations, and to understand the main features of our constitutional republican form of government and of our American way of life. Funds might be used by the States in stimulation and support of the organization and conduct of classes of adult illiterates, for the training of teachers and supervisors for such classes, and for the fostering of research, experimentation and demonstration in educational institutions of improved methods and materials for use in such classes."

EDUCATION ACT

Senator KILGORE is sponsoring a bill with Senator MAGNUSON, Democrat of Washington, entitled "National Literacy Education Act of 1948," a bill in the words of the energetic West Virginia lawmaker, "to assist the States in the removal of adult illiteracy by the development and maintenance of special programs of basic elementary education for adults and for other purposes."

The measure has no chance of passage at this session of Congress, but the facts which it sets forth are certainly worthy of study and remedial action is clearly needed. It sets a pattern for the future. Senator KILGORE declares that his measure offers a constructive, inexpensive solution to a problem that can only be described as a national disgrace.

"The extent of adult illiteracy in the United States is shocking," the Senator says, and he gives these facts to back up his statement:

"The 1940 census disclosed that there were more than 10,000,000 adults in the United States, 25 years of age and over, who were functionally illiterate, i. e., (1) who could not read and write at all, or (2) whose reading and writing ability was insufficient to be of practical use.

"The statement becomes more meaningful when made to read that there are more than 10,000,000 people who cannot read the newspapers, who cannot read printed directions of any kind, or who cannot pass the simplest literacy tests.

"The facts about illiteracy can be stated in still another way. One of every seven adults in the United States, 25 years of age and over, can read only with difficulty a label which says: 'Poison—for external use only.' One in every seven adults in the United States, 25 years of age and over, probably cannot read the word 'freedom' or spell the word 'peace.'

"During World War II, the Selective Service System found that 350,000 total illiterates made their mark with an X; 350,000 men, between the ages of 21 and 45, willing and ready to serve their country, actually sat down beside recording officers and had the fact legally certified that they were unable to sign for themselves. Of this number, 130,000 were white and 220,000 were Negroes.

"The Selective Service System also estimated that of 433,000 men liable to rejection because of functional illiteracy, at least 150,000 were physically able to serve in the Army, a loss of approximately 15 divisions."

"It is obvious then, that to make a frontal attack on the problem of adult illiteracy, a national program is needed, and such a program is proposed in the Kilgore bill.

"The measure would, in the words of the Senator, authorize 'an appropriation of $5,000,000 for fiscal 1949; rising to $10,000,000 for fiscal 1950; $15,000,000 in each fiscal year from 1951 through fiscal 1957; and decreasing to $5,000,000 in 1958–59, when the program of Federal aid would terminate.

"Each State on which a State application had been received and approved by the Commissioner would be entitled to an enrollment of Federal funds in the proportion that the number of adults in the State who had not completed the fifth grade of school, as reported by the Bureau of the Census, bears to the number of such adults in all of the States.

"The fund so allotted would be used under the direction or supervision of State departments of education for the purpose of stimulating the organization of classes for adults designed to develop the ability to read, write, speak and understand the English language, to perform elementary arithmetical computations, and to understand the main features of our constitutional republican form of government and of our American way of life.

"It should be noted that the plan does not contemplate a continuing program of Federal support or aid to the States for adult education, but rather a temporary 10-year program.

"Meanwhile," Senator KILGORE concludes, "it is urgently desirable that such efforts be undertaken to eliminate, insofar as possible, the present backlog of educational illiteracy resulting from previous educational neglect and underprivilege.

"Only by so doing, can we hope to develop to the full our manpower potential for peace or for war; only by so doing, can we remove the drag on the body politic and our economy, resulting from widespread illiteracy; only by so doing, can we hope to present to all nations of the world an example of democracy in action which will be worthy of their emulation."

THE BLOT OF ILLITERACY

Senator HARLEY KILGORE of West Virginia is thoroughly sound in his argument that this country's 10,000,000 illiterate adults constitute a problem which must be faced by the Federal Government. It is the same argument which applies in behalf of current efforts to provide Federal funds for improving the schools for children in backward States. Citizens who cannot read and write are a drag on our society at the national level as well as at the levels of the States and communities. Since experience has shown that the situation is not easily corrected when left to the States and communities, it behooves the Federal Government to interest itself.

Senator KILGORE proposed a Federal expenditure of $125,000,000 over a 10-year period in cooperation with the States in an effort to provide rudimentary learning for men and women who did not get it at the normal school age.

During the last war it was learned how expensive illiteracy can be. The armed services were required to reject approximately 659,392 men for educational deficiency. Since it was difficult to fit many of these into industry and agriculture at places where they were most needed, they represented an immense waste of manpower in time of national crisis.

After June 1, 1943, the Army undertook to train illiterate inductees in special schools. The cost of this training, according to a Senate committee report, was from $300 to $600 a man. If the average for the 302,838 who passed through these schools was $450, the total cost was approximately $137,077,100, or some $12,000,000 more than Senator KILGORE proposed to spend on a 10-year peacetime adult-education program.

But his proposal must be viewed as something besides the preparation of citizens to take their proper places in time of national emergency. It is much more than that, and so is the bigger program for Federal aid at the school-age level. Both plans envision the responsibility of the Federal Government for raising the general standards of citizenship and of extending the blessings of education to persons denied it under present circumstances.

Statistics showing that one out of every seven adults must be classed as illiterate are reason enough for trying a new approach. And the only approach that offers hope of real improvement is at the Federal level.

[From the Roane County (W. Va.) Reporter of June 10, 1948]

EDUCATIONAL NEEDS

The National Parent and Teacher Congress at its annual meeting in Cleveland, Ohio, endorsed several educational aims to improve the Nation's school system. The organization's program concerns itself chiefly with improved operation of schools.

Senator HARLEY M. KILGORE, in conjunction with Senators WARREN G. MAGNUSON and WAYNE MORSE, seeks to do something about the problem of improving the educational status of older people in the country who never had an opportunity to attend school.

The extent of adult illiteracy in the United States is appalling. Senator KILGORE's figures indicate more than 10,000,000 adults, 25 years of age or over, who cannot pass the simplest literacy test. This means that one of seven adults in the country can neither read nor write.

Selective service during World War II discovered 350,000 men could only make an "X" mark; at least 150,000 of them being otherwise physically able to join the armed forces. Illiteracy alone cost the country 15 divisions of fighting troops.

The surprising fact is that 4,200,000 of the Nation's illiterates are native-born whites. These people may have an exceptional native intelligence, but because they can neither read nor write, they remain only primitive people in a complex, modern civilization. To know there are three times as many illiterates as there are college graduates is shameful in such a land of opportunity.

Result of this investigation led to the introduction of the National Literacy Education Act of 1948. This proposes a matching Federal-State aid program for the next 10 years to reduce the Nation's illiteracy total through State-sponsored adult educational programs.

Senator KILGORE declares: "The man who does not understand is always the dangerous man. He cannot go along with his social group, because he cannot grasp their motives and goals. He cannot go along with his country, because he fails to grasp his country's aims. It is primarily to this group of illiterates that international communism has directed, on a level which can be understood, its flood of propaganda, including distorted facts about America."

One doesn't understand democracy just by hearing about it; nor does one understand by living it. It takes the written word to make the past, present, and future of democracy a vital and living truth.

Our people must, down to the last man and woman, be able to fully understand the meaning of democracy if this Nation of free and independent people is to survive. It requires the written word to bring full appreciation of opportunities.

Here is a pressing and serious problem. Roane County suffers because of this unfortunate condition. Voters' registration cards indicate the situation. Unless our people can understand, we still are not offering a full life to individuals of our country.

The Mundt Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a telegram regarding the Mundt bill which I have received from the dean of my law school. I think the telegram gives one of the most succinct and clear statements regarding that bill that I have ever read.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator WARREN G. MAGNUSON,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

I congratulate you on your public statement on the Mundt bill quoted in the Seattle Times today. While I may not follow you to the extent of saying that the bill would be unconstitutional because I fear the courts at this juncture might hold otherwise on the particular bill, I do deem the bill highly un-American. I trust we have not yet reached the time when we must legislatively suppress ideas contrary to our own. Not only do I deem such course un-American but I believe it is bad also for practical reason, because it will in most cases render impossible the change of such ideas by proper educational and persuasive methods. While I personally generally vote the Republican ticket and have no sympathy for communism, I equally have no sympathy for totalitarian methods of suppressing contrary thought and opinion, and I think that, short of overt acts of force, the right of minorities to think on government and politics as they please must be defended by us with unceasing vigilance. And if the minorities become majorities, we must recognize their right to change the Government by peaceful methods if they can. That is our history and tradition.

ALFRED J. SCHWEPPE.

What UNESCO Can Do in These Troubled Times

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. MURRAY
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, every sane person guided by moral impulses wants peace, and will actively support the means for maintaining peace. I have given much thought to furthering a program looking to closer cultural ties between and among all nations. I am proud to have sponsored the first piece of legislation which laid the foundation for United States participation in UNESCO. I have closely studied the operation of UNESCO. In my studies I have met many fine scholars who believe in the purpose of UNESCO, men and women who stand ready to serve through UNESCO, and who serve often at a great sacrifice.

One such scholar is Dr. Howard Wilson, formerly of the Harvard faculty, now serving with the Carnegie endowment for international peace. Dr. Wilson is a critical analyst. He is a scholar. I feel that his frank analysis of "What can UNESCO do in these troubled times" is a study which should be preserved, and I therefore ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT UNESCO CAN DO IN THESE TROUBLED TIMES
(By Howard E. Wilson)

You're laboring under three handicaps this evening. The first is the excellent weather which really attracts all of us outside, I think; the second is the fact that you have two speakers on this evening's program; and the third is the fact that the second speaker's subject is extremely complex and he doesn't know quite how to organize it.

I feel just a little like a famous dean at Harvard felt on one occasion. Dean LeBaron Briggs was acting president of Radcliffe College. At commencement time he was to preside over the very dignified ceremonial of that commencement. Commencement was held out of doors; the platform had been erected for it; but somebody had miscalculated, and on the June morning when commencement came, the platform was directly in the sun, and the sun was hot that morning. Somebody else had miscalculated, because the chairs on the platform had been recently varnished. Dean Briggs and all the other notables present sat on those chairs in their very heavy silken academic robes. The dean knew that he was getting closer to that chair, and the chair closer to him than he wanted; he kept squirming around, trying to keep himself reasonably free. But he didn't succeed for when at the climax of the ceremony he had to rise and start to the front of the platform, the chair came with him for several feet. That didn't phase the good dean. He waited until the laughter had died down and then said, "Ladies and gentlemen, I'm sorry I cannot come before you with a plain unvarnished tale."

The tale I want to tell this evening has a little varnish on it; it's sticky in spots, and it's extremely complex. I shall have to ask your forbearance in telling the story in as simple a fashion as I can, but it still won't be too simple.

I'd like to emphasize at the outset the point of view from which I speak. I'm speaking here entirely as a private individual. I'm not following a State Department line in respect to UNESCO, although I have been a servant of the State Department in respect to certain of UNESCO's activities, just as Joe Landis has. He and I were both in the United States delegation to the Second General Conference of UNESCO which was held in Mexico City last fall. The General Conference is an annual meeting, the controlling body of UNESCO. Neither am I speaking from the point of view of UNESCO itself, although for a year and another summer I was an employee of the UNESCO staff. I'm speaking as an individual, free to praise where I feel praise is due and to be critical when criticism is desirable. I'm going to tell you the story of UNESCO as frankly as I possibly can. I'd like to tell it in a human way, because I think it is altogether too easy for us to think of international problems, and particularly of international institutions, as something quite remote, as something impersonal, vague, and general.

UNESCO is a body of people, and it has all of the mix-ups in it that there are in the personalities and the backgrounds and the petty quarrels and the high ideals of those individual people. You'll pardon me if I personalize the story quite a little as we go along in order to demonstrate some of the human factors in the rise of an international institution of this sort.

UNESCO was established in 1945 at a conference in London attended by the delegates of about 45 different nations. It was established independently, although it even then bore the name United Nations. It was not from the outset a little bureau tucked away in the vast secretariat at Lake Success. By definite plans it and the other specialized agencies have been created independently, created independently in this case in order that something like the international equivalent of academic freedom can be maintained. UNESCO exists with its own constitution in its own right; but it has always existed under the moral prestige of the United Nations—the great over-all organization—and from the very outset it entered into contractual relations with the United Nations, making UNESCO one of the specialized agencies.

As indicated a few minutes ago, there are 10 of these specialized agencies. Each of them works in a different field, although those fields overlap somewhat. Each of them has in general the task of preventing war rather than remedying conflict after it has come. Each of these organizations is a long-range organization, having some matters of immediate consequence; but each believes that its good work is cumulative as the years go by. I think that's preeminently true of UNESCO.

Now immediately after its constitution was written in a short international conference of 16 days in November 1945, a Preparatory Commission was created. They always do that in these international organizations. They work up a certain momentum when the constitution is drafted. If they have to go back and sit down and do nothing, until all the nations get around to ratifying that constitution, that momentum would be lost; so they create preparatory commissions. UNESCO had one. Each nation had one member on the preparatory commission. At this conference, Sir Alfred Zimmern, noted British scholar, again made a rich contribution. A very important role was given to the brilliant scientist, Julian Huxley. I've seen him sit down with historians, and biologists, and artists, and politicians, and every kind of group and talk with those people in terms of their own language. He knows a vast deal. But Julian Huxley also has some weak spots. He isn't a well-organized individual. I should say before going ahead that very early it was decided that Mr. Huxley should have two deputies. Sir Alfred had had only one, but that one had been an American; and France was a little disconcerted over that, thought that France should be honored with a deputy, so it was decided that both United States and France could have deputies to assist the British Julian Huxley. I was sent over as the American deputy; and France sent Jean Thomas, a very distinguished professor of literature who had a great career in the resistance. Thomas spoke no English and I spoke no French, but we were working closely together in the same organization. A lot of people said, "Aha, within this secretariat there will be two cliques—an English-speaking and a French-speaking clique—you just see; that will be the great rivalry in this organization; it will go to pot on that."

Well, Thomas and I were able to get together and solve our problems very easily, because he got into his office a tall, handsome young man who spoke both French and English extremely well, and in whom Thomas had complete confidence; and I got into my office a very beautiful blonde who spoke both French and English, and in whom I had complete confidence; and after that each knew what was going on in the office of the other all of the time.

Now Thomas and I were working with Huxley, but as I said Huxley was sometimes a little disorganized. Huxley has the habit, an excellent habit in some respects, of taking notes on everything that is said during the day. He takes down all the suggestions, all the ideas that come to him. He starts out with a big sheet of paper in the morning, and he writes in a little corner of it and tears that off and puts it in his pocket; and by the end of the day he has a pocketful of little notes, most of which have been torn in two a couple of times, because he had to have more paper. Each morning at 10 o'clock Huxley, and Thomas, and I would get together to talk over what had happened the day before and what we wanted to get done that day. At those conferences Mr. Huxley would empty all of the notes on the desk and undo his dispatch case which also contained a lot of little scraps of paper, and the conference would consist of picking out those pieces of paper more or less as we select dominoes from the bone yard. He'd select one and try to figure out what he had written on it, and we'd talk about that. It wasn't exactly as systematic as one might be, and that's a defect in Huxley; but he had compensating qualities of great note. But the human factor of the Director General is always a factor in international relations. The quality of the man Trygve Lie determines in part the success of the United Nations. The individual capacities and the idiosyncrasies of every assistant of Trygve Lie have their effect on this total United Nations. These are not impersonal organizations. They are made up of people; often they are just as baffled as you and I.

Well, during those early days in the Preparatory Commission we tried to figure out what UNESCO might do. UNESCO had certain general objectives stated in its constitution. It said, "Since wars begin in the minds of men, it is in the minds of men that the defenses of peace must be constructed." That is a beautiful expression—I wish it had never been written. It was first used in a sort of modified form by Clement Attlee in a speech at a conference. It caught people's imagination, and if you read through the records of that conference about half a dozen other people took up the expression and played on it and modified it a little until that great master of words, Archibald MacLeish, came along and put it in its present form. You might say that the expression is by MacLeish out of Attlee if you are a racing person.

Actually, what does the expression mean? There are a lot of people who say that wars begin in the stomachs of people, and even more who say that wars begin in the hearts of people. If you think of mind as a purely international matter, then this great statement doesn't mean much. You have to take mind in its broadest possible connotation—the total man—if you want to get anything from that broad generality. But that broad generality isn't enough to run an organization on. How do you put that to work? How do you begin to safeguard peace or promote the general security? You have to have a program, and the job of the Preparatory Commission is to try to devise a program for UNESCO.

Well, we had thousands of suggestions as to what UNESCO ought to do. They came to us from governments, from organizations, from individuals all over the world. The most frequent suggestion was that we should establish a world university. Very few people seemed to have thought how much money it takes to establish a world university, or very few people have decided just where you can have that university located in order to accentuate its worldness as distinct from its nationals. I must confess, too, that a great many suggestions for a world university that came in were accompanied by official requests for positions on the faculty. But a lot of these suggestions came in, and it was that secretariat's job to sort them out, to consult with every specialist we could find to try to figure out what would be the best thing—the feasible thing—for UNESCO to do. We said at the outset, "We want things which will mark out paths for UNESCO's future growth; we want things on which there's a reasonable chance of being successful, because courage is the memory of past successes; nothing succeeds like success. Let's get this organization off to a successful start and then it will grow." But in the end we selected about 160 projects that we thought could be achieved.

When the first General Conference met in Paris it recognized that that was too dispersed a program. No new organization could attempt that many things in its first year, so they cut it down somewhat. But they still didn't cut it down enough; and in the first year of UNESCO's existence, permanent existence 1947, there were so many jobs to do on its books, and it had so much trouble deciding which ones were most important that it didn't actually achieve much of anything. Let's be frank about it. In 1947 UNESCO was getting organized. It was beset by many political problems, and it didn't do a very good job on what it set out to do.

The second General Conference which Mr. Landis and I attended in Mexico City last fall, I think, was much better than the first General Conference. It rewrote the program of UNESCO, too. It cut it down from 140 projects to about 70 different significant projects, and it determined exactly how much money would go for each project. It laid out the rules of the game. It decided what could be done and what couldn't be done much more clearly than that first General Conference. A lot of us who had begun to lose hope in 1947 had to realize that you can't judge one of these international organizations by what it is at a given moment. You have to look at it in perspective. You have to look at it in terms of the history which the preceding speaker emphasized, and UNESCO now is infinitely better than it was a year ago.

I want to talk a little about certain of the organizational problems that it faced. UNESCO, when we first came together—that is Huxley and Thomas and I came together—in February 1946, had about 20 people in its secretariat. They were housed in one unheated flat in London in the middle of winter—a London winter. It was cold; we worked with our overcoats on. Even though there were only 20 of us, we didn't have enough desks and chairs to go around, and there were never quite as many typewriters as there were secretaries. The problem of getting equipment together and of hiring a staff plagued us from the outset while we were trying to frame a program.

By June of that year we had a staff of 125 people and had been moved into two old houses down near Belgrave Square. By September we were to move to Paris which is the permanent headquarters of UNESCO. Then we had a staff of 225 people and still not enough typewriters and not enough desks. We moved to Paris—a very difficult move with that many people and that many documents because we had accumulated a lot of documents by that time and not wanting to lose any time.

The French Government put at our disposal an old hotel which had been a fashionable hotel about 1900 and which had been the headquarters of the German Gestapo. Julian Huxley's office was the office which had previously been occupied, and after the Germans went out it had been occupied as the commanding headquarters of the American occupying forces. The French, after they had had a few drinks, would tell you they didn't know which group had done more damage to the building. It was a little hard to tell, but when we went in, the building was stripped. There were a few strips of carpets, a few old desks, but not enough equipment to set up offices. We had to borrow, beg, and steal anywhere we could to get the equipment. Moreover in Paris with that staff of 225 people, most of whom were non-French, we had the problem of food and the problem of lodging. To find even hotel rooms at a reasonable price was almost impossible for that large a staff. We had to start our own restaurant. Fortunately we could do it, because there was a kitchen in the hotel. We had a restaurateur who tried to run it for us. I happened to have the responsibility for seeing that he got along, and I never could tell when that man was playing the black market and when he wasn't. It was very difficult to run that restaurant or to get enough spoons and forks and knives to use, or to get enough food. We had a treaty negotiated with the French Government by which we could bring in food free of duty, but where did you get the food? We placed large orders in the United States and then the ship strike came, and we sat there hungry for some weeks. Then we tried to get food down from Denmark, and the truck had difficulty getting across. But finally all of that began to work. By the time of the first General Conference in November 1946, there were 500 people on the staff.

Now it is mostly about those people that I'd like to talk. They came from all over the world. We had to have geographic representation in that staff. That was excellent but difficult. Thomas knew the people in France, I knew some people in the United States, Huxley knew the people in Great Britain. We didn't know who the really qualified people were in India, and China, and the Philippines, and Brazil. We had to hire sight unseen over and over again, and we got some duds; there's no doubt about it. And since then UNESCO's got some duds. It always will. Lake Success has a lot of duds, because the problem of recruiting qualified personnel, keeping in mind geographic representation, is a problem that nobody has found an easy answer to yet.

Suppose you got good people and got them together in that house in Paris. You'd walk down the corridor and meet a person. You'd say hello to him, and he would answer you in some language you might not know at all. Presumably everybody could speak either French or English, but it was sometimes difficult to tell which he was speaking. I remember we had one Mexican woman in the education staff—a marvelous, motherly woman—who had an excellent career in Mexico, came to us on the highest recommendations; but she just didn't work out with us because none of us could ever tell whether she was speaking Spanish, or French, or English. It was the craziest mixture you ever heard. The head of the education section, Dr. Kuo, Chinese, former minister of education of one of the provinces, was interviewed by Mr. Huxley and me very early in the game, and Huxley said to him during the interview, "Mr. Kuo, do you speak French?" (This interview was in English, in London.) "Do you speak French?" Dr. Kuo hesitated a minute and said, "Yes, Mr. Huxley, but my French is a little lusty," which was true.

The problem of language, just ordinary communication isn't just a question of getting one language into another language. It's a question of delicate shades of meaning. Let me give you an illustration that happened this last summer. I was at Sevres, near Paris, last summer running a seminar for UNESCO. We had about 80 people there from countries all over the world as participants. They were key teachers, key educators in their country. We had a staff of about 15 people. The first day I was trying to introduce the staff to the participants. On the staff there was a very distinguished French woman, a former inspectress general, headed the house in which our place was housed. I didn't know quite what to call her, for she'd been brought in to run the social side of the seminar, but I hit on the title of dean. I thought that was an excellent way out, so I referred to Madame as dean. Now I spoke in English, but a man sat beside me and repeated everything I had said in French, because full half of the participants understood no English. Madame, the dean, didn't understand much English. He knew what the word meant; but he didn't know the delicate shade of meaning that we attach to the deanship in our educational system, so he translated "dean" by a word which I understand it, means the eldest; and it took me 3 days to overcome that difficulty. You get that sort of little difficulty all the time. And then you come to more fundamental difficulties in an international staff of people who have just different mores, different customs, different habits.

In that seminar at lunch table one day (we were all housed in the same general place and ate together) an American woman, member of the seminar, congratulated an Indian woman on the beautiful gown she was wearing. It was an utterly lovely thing. The Indian woman immediately froze up, became very haughty; and the American woman, thinking she hadn't been understood repeated the compliment which made it all the worse, because in that particular woman's group in India it is bad manners to comment on anybody's clothes. The American woman had meant to be polite. She had evidenced what was from the Indian woman's point of view bad manners. It got worse, because at that table there was another Indian who was a follower of Gandhi; and he immediately got after the Indian woman for wearing silks and satins when she ought to be, as a good Indian, wearing cotton. Again it took several days before we could quiet those people down and keep them all in the seminar together.

There are religious difficulties—people without any religion, people of all the religions of the world—and religion is something deeply felt in the hearts of most people. The convictions one carries of a religious sort don't tolerate opposition as a rule. To get various religious groups cooperating without indulging in theological dispute is no easy task.

Then beyond that, in an organization such as UNESCO, you have the problem of the different subject fields. UNESCO covers the fields of education, science, and culture. Now I don't know myself what any one of those words mean. They're all so broad, and they overlap so badly that it's a pretty difficult task to tell what the field is that UNESCO's actually going to operate in, but certainly it's big. There are many fields of education, many sciences, many phases of culture.

In the UNESCO secretariat the head of the science section has been a man named Joseph Needham. He's a distinguished biologist from Cambridge, a very great man and excellent for UNESCO for two reasons. He is a profound scientist, respected as a scientist by his colleagues all over the world; and he knows international organization among the scientists as nobody else does whom I've ever met. That combination is rare. We need people like that in every other subject field, and we haven't been able to find them. Joe Needham headed the science section, was completely loyal to science—that was his job. He's a man without any sense of humor, a great big, hulking individual who works 20 hours a day all of the time. He looks sort of antisocial; his friends describe him as looking like an unmade bed, and that's an excellent description. But Joe Needham, while he would work his head off for science, wouldn't coordinate for 2 minutes with the head of the education section, or with the heads of any of the other sections. You know what the college presidents think about the departmental squabbles in the college. They are accentuated when you get into an organization like UNESCO. And we had these great difficulties of getting the literary people to work with the artists. For a long while the musicians, and the painters, and the writers just wouldn't speak to one another in the organization, but we got them grouped even in one section, and so on.

Now what I'm trying to say is that building up an organization to do a job is tough. It's tough, because you have people to work with; and it's tough, because in every person who has quality there are also to be found defects. You've got to be patient—patient with people and patient with the institutions that they're running.

Now let me conclude with one little more direct reference to what UNESCO can do. I can be critical of UNESCO and say that it hasn't achieved very much as yet. I can look at its program and say it's still trying to do too many things. It's like the man who mounted a horse and rode off in all directions. But, nevertheless, I can still say also that from my point of view UNESCO is the brightest star in the whole constellation of the United Nations. It is the thing that will provide the lubrication that make the political and economic agencies work. The United Nations is simply a political organization predicated upon understanding among people. Unless you have that understanding among people a little framework of political action centered at Lake Success will never be successful. It's true of every other agency. International understanding, comprehension, patience, tolerance are essential. Essential also for the preservation of the peace is the creation of conditions of civilized living. The kind of situation that exists in a war devastated area, or in an American slum, or in a backward region of the world—backward in any sense—simply does not conduce to peace, to security, to the kind of a world in which we want to live. The job of humanity is to spread the benefits of civilized existence in order to retain that civilized existence itself. We have to lighten the dark spots in the field of science and in all the other cultural and educational fields. We have to get people who understand one another sympathetically.

Now the program of UNESCO is in general directed toward that aim. It's a program which includes, as I've said, work in the natural sciences. Some of that work in natural sciences seems to me to be of interest only to the scientists, and I am not a scientist; but much of that work I know to be of profound consequence to the creation of these conditions of civilized living. For a long while I thought it utterly ridiculous for UNESCO to spend money on a scientific exploration of the Amazon valley. I don't think so any longer. The scientists have convinced me of that. By the adequate study and exploitation of those natural resources we may enrich living and provide a new area where some of these caged, displaced persons may themselves live. There is much in the science program of great consequence.

There's a vast program in the mass media fields—radio, film, and press. I think I disagree a little with the preceding speaker and say that for my money, even though I'm a teacher, these three fields of adult education are of more consequence even than the schools right now, because what happens for the next 50 years will be determined in the next 5 years; and the people who are being reached by information are being reached through adult education. These nerve centers of mass communication are of the utmost consequence to the forming of an immediate public opinion to act in the emergencies that are already upon us.

I certainly would not tear down a single school building—don't misunderstand me—neither would I reduce by a single cent the public money to be spent on the schools. I know that in the long run we have to educate the citizenry through the schools, so that they'll understand and not always be buffaloed by the agencies of adult education. But at the moment I think we in education must strengthen the hand in every way we can of the wise people who are working in the media of mass communications. UNESCO has a program in that field.

It has a large program in libraries. We are so familiar with public libraries here that we don't think much about them. They're unique with us. If you could spread the concept of the practice of public libraries all over the world, it would do a lot of good, provided we could get some books in them. We'll have to help them at that too. But UNESCO has a program in respect to public libraries.

It has a program in respect to the development of museums, living museums, museums which are themselves cultural, educational forces in the community. It has a program in social sciences, the most significant part of that program is a study of the tensions which are inimical to peace, the study of tensions within an individual or in the social group which lead dangerously toward war. UNESCO has a group of the finest social psychologists you can find in the world at work on studying this task, and it's one of the most profound and significant long-range enterprises on which any group of intelligent people could engage. UNESCO has a program of work for the artists, a program of work for the literary people, a program in the humanities.

It also has a program in education. I can describe only two or three parts of that. The head of the education section has been Dr. Kuo, Chinese. He has recently been moved to another post in the secretariat as advisor to the Director General on all matters as an affecting Asia. In his place, as head of the section, has come Mr. Beebe, head of the education section of New Zealand. I had dinner with Mr. Beebe a week ago tonight while he was on his way to Paris to take up his duties. He's modest, he's able, he's extremely intelligent. He's much impressed by the American school systems, and he has visited them many, many times. He'd like to see many of these things that are commonplace here carried out in other parts of the world. I hope that with our aid he can do it.

UNESCO has in its educational program work at the university level. It's attempting to get for the first time in history an international association of universities, just that simple little thing. It's attempting at that university level to promote the interchange of persons; it's attempting to try to get research agencies in different universities over the world cooperating in research. This international cooperation of research, or of teaching, or of interchange is of great consequence. UNESCO is working at the theme of adult education. An excellent young Dane, Mr. Ravenholt, has charge of that work. There will be a conference on adult education held in Europe this summer under UNESCO's auspices.

UNESCO's trying to improve and revise textbooks. I agree with the preceding speaker. Books are not of as much importance as persons; but they are still of considerable importance, and they can still be improved. I suspect that when we examine our own shortcomings what we've taught in our textbooks about the merits of isolation is one reason why there are still remnants of isolation in this country. UNESCO has taken Jim Quillen, a professor at Stanford University in the social studies field, an expert in textbook revision, to head up its work in that project for the next 18 months.

Well, one could go on and on. There are seven top priorities in education that UNESCO has pledged itself to undertake in 1948. All of us who are working for UNESCO believe that it has achieved considerable success on those tasks, not as much as many of us hoped, but just as much as any of us had the right to expect.

Now in the end I want to emphasize this. UNESCO is not just this little group of people off in Paris that I've talked about. It isn't just those who have worked for it at one time or another, or who correspond with it, or who try to influence it by correspondence. UNESCO is above all else a people's possession. That's its great merit. It belongs to the mass of humanity. This troubled mass of people—black and white and yellow—all over the world is beginning to find itself and to shape that wave of the future about which Mrs. Lindbergh talked a long while ago. UNESCO belongs to these people. Its program is not going to be just highbrow. Its program is directed at daily welfare—at the welfare of the common man. And if that program is to succeed, it will be because all of us work at UNESCO's task. Every individual citizen is himself a part of UNESCO; and it's the responsibility of him and of this organization—the organization which has called this meeting, the American Federation of Teachers—and of every organization in the land to call the plays for UNESCO, to give the wisdom to UNESCO as often as it is that UNESCO will call the plays for us. We're all in the boat of the future. That boat may be wrecked. If it isn't wrecked, it will be because of our joint intelligence. Thank you.

Springtime in the Mammoth Cave National Park Region

OF

HON. JOHN SHERMAN COOPER

OF KENTUCKY

Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a poem entitled "Springtime in the Mammoth Cave National Park Region," written by former Congressman Maurice H. Thatcher, of Kentucky. Mr. Thatcher grew up in this section of Kentucky, and became fully familiar with the scenes and aspects depicted in the poem. Later, when he came to be the Representative in Congress of the Louisville district he led the successful fight to bring about the enactment of legislation necessary for the creation of the Mammoth Cave National Park, and was the author of the enabling act under which this great scientific and recreational area became a member of the Nation's family of national parks.

Kentucky is thus a national-park State, and has, in addition, many State parks of great scenic and historic interest. With the building of adequate highways, the State is becoming more and more a magnet for tourists. Outstanding among many attractions of great interest and beauty is the Mammoth Cave area, with its beautiful terrain, its navigable streams, its unmatched caverns, its virgin forests, and its wealth of story and legend.

In this connection I express the hope that before long there will be constructed from the Great Smoky Mountains National Park, by way of historic Cumberland Gap and Cumberland Falls, to the Mammoth Cave National Park, a great parkway, similar to that now in process of construction between the Shenandoah National Park and the Great Smoky Mountains National Park.

There being no objection, the poem was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPRINGTIME IN THE MAMMOTH CAVE NATIONAL PARK REGION

(By Maurice H. Thatcher)

O'er earth the wands of resurrection sweep,
And Nature rouses from her wintry sleep.
The smoke from clearing-fire and planting-bed;
The honking wild geese, in V-squadrons spread
Against the warming sky, upon their flight
From southern lands unto the northern light;
The happy bluebird and the robin gay;
The tonic mildness of the growing day;
The varied glory of the sunset dyes;
The wondrous azure of the evening skies—
All, all proclaim that Winter's on the wing,
And all announce the near advent of Spring.
And then a pleasing miracle behold,
As hyacinths and jonquils deck the cold,
And join with violet and crocus bloom
To lighten Winter's pale and empty tomb!
The trumps of March now blow themselves to rest,
And soon the world with April's sun is blest;
And April's sprinkling pot with gentle showers,
Touches to life the forests, meads, and flowers.
In field and wood the untamed blossoms show,
And freshened streams in unchecked ardor flow.
Their lavish heaps of snow the dogwoods spill,
And red-buds gleam from ev'ry copse and hill.
Swift comes the leaf, and bush and tree are clad
In verdancy. All living things are glad.
The cat lies blinking in the friendly sun,
And Rover runs and barks in doggish fun.
The prophet groundhog, heedless of his role,
For Spring-time warmth, comes forth from ledge and hole.
The kindling air sets all the insects free;
The squirrel barks from crotch of yonder tree.
Thru deadened weed and sedge bobs Cottontail,
While Brer Fox spins his curving, pungent trail.
The reptile things, roused from their torpid sleep,
Begin once more to squirm and crawl and creep.
In scattered fields green with the growing wheat,
The raucous crows in convocations meet.
The martin, jay, bull-bat and cardinal,
With other birds, join in the carnival.
The vocalists of orchard, wood, and sky,
Reveal the joy which in their breasts must lie.
The feathered host, from owl to chick and wren,
Proceed to feed and mate and breed again.
The flow'ring shrub, the peach, the plum and pear,
Apple and cherry, blow, in turn; the air
Is all surcharged with Nature's own perfume,
Which floats pervasively from wealths of bloom.
The bee returns unto a round of toil,
Bringing to hive the precious nectar-spoil.
Earth's scavengers soar thru the vaulted blue,
Striving, with telescopic eyes to view
Base quarries far below. High, from above,
The ruthless hawk swoops down and rends the dove.
Nature's a realist: not overmuch
Is she disturbed by ways or means. Her touch—
Tho that of artist, when she would adorn—
Is also stark and cruel, jungle-born.

OUTSIDE THE PARK

Spring opes the door and lets the children out
To romp and play with lusty laugh and shout.
The older youth, befitting well their age,
In sober, useful labors now engage.
The chesty, waddling ducks and braggart geese,
The chickens, turkeys, porkers, find release,
From Winter's cold most welcome, and unite
In noisy declamation from morn till night.
The baby lambs have learned to bound and skip;
The herds go forth the blades and buds to nip.
The farmer enters on the season's toil;
His eager plow upturns the waking soil;
The hour is ripe, and planting time begins:
In hope he looks to bulging barns and bins,
The oats are sown, the last fat hogs are killed;
The garden made, some corn is dropped or drilled.
Striving to do his endless chores and tasks,
A kindly year is all the farmer asks.
Long hours are his: there's very much to do;
The housewife bears a heavy burden, too.
And Beck, the mule, performs her duties well,
But stops dead-still at note of horn or bell,
And will not budge, the heavy plow to pull,
Until, again, her famished void is full;
And Dick, the horse, joins in the hunger strike,
And stops and neighs to show his strong dislike
Of overwork at eating-time. By rule
Man strives to live: no less, the horse and mule.

WITHIN THE PARK

Within the Park, thruout its bold terrain,
All things reveal that Spring is come again.
On canyon walls which bind the noble streams,
The vernal touch the Winter's blight redeems.
And here the dogwoods riot; rose-buds, too;
And varied flowers, wild, bless ev'ry view.
Oaks, elms, and poplars, beeches, sycamores,
And chestnuts—crowding hillsides, heights, and shores—
Now don their jade-like robes and em'rald gowns,
And to the skies lift up their leafy crowns.
The cedar's verdure, and the paler green
Of trees deciduous, accent the scene.
Ravine and cliff, and stretching, luring vale,
Yield rest and peace, tho all things else should fail.

Here beauty dwells in tranquil solitudes,
Bright with the charms of Nature's gentler moods.
The landscapes rich, the pleasant, healing sun,
Give life and hope and balm to ev'ry one
Who hither comes: while, in the underground,
The wonders of the cavern world abound.
In cabin and in hostelry the guest
May find his food and comfort e'en the best.
Kentucky's spirit gives him welcome greeting:
Once he is here, oft he will be repeating.
Come hither, friends, while yet the Year is young,
And see all that for which my song is sung.
Come hither, friends, and bring your friends with you;
And for yourselves learn that my song is true.
Enough, enough, ere yet the half be told,
Spring may be wrapped in Summer's ardent fold!

Restore Good Government

OF
HON. JOHN SANBORN
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. SANBORN. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago I was honored to have you appear on one of my regular weekly programs which is released to my constituents in the Second District of Idaho. I ask permission to have this program printed in the RECORD to satify the demand for copies. The response from Idaho indicates appreciation of the efforts of yourself to restore good government.

The program follows:

ANNOUNCER. Greetings, ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, we are pleased to present to you at this time a discussion of vital questions of the day between the Honorable JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Jr., Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, and Representative JOHN SANBORN, Republican Congressman from the Second District of Idaho. I am going to turn the microphone over to Mr. SANBORN, who will proceed to question Speaker JOE MARTIN.

Mr. SANBORN. Fellow Americans, I had a little trouble getting Speaker of the House JOE MARTIN to let me interview him. It wasn't because he didn't want to be interviewed. It was because he found it difficult to get the time. JOE MARTIN is one of the busiest men in the United States today. That's because he is so important, both in the Congress and in political life generally. As Speaker of the House, he has the tremendous task of presiding over every session of the House and overseeing the legislation program, with all its varied facets. Also, as a former chairman of the Republican National Committee, he naturally is called upon to speak on many occasions to many groups. And, as Congressman from Massachusetts, he has to do the same job every one of us Congressmen has to do in seeing to it that our people are well-represented. JOE MARTIN is one of the most important men in the Republican Party today.

He is noted as a student of government, as a conciliator who knows how to get things going. His whole life has been spent in studying the Government and working in Government, when he wasn't running a newspaper in North Attleboro, of course. He is prominently mentioned as the leading dark horse contender for the Republican nomination, and he will serve as permanent chairman of the convention in Philadelphia next month. Speaker MARTIN, forgive me for talking all this time, but I'll just start now by popping questions.

Speaker MARTIN. Go right ahead, John. I don't pretend to know it all, but I'll answer any question I am able to answer.

Mr. SANBORN. First, Mr. Speaker, would you tell the radio audience what you think is the outstanding accomplishment of this Republican Eightieth Congress?

Speaker MARTIN. John, it is now known that the Republican Eightieth Congress has one star in its crown and should be cited by all true Americans for an act of great courage. That is, this Republican Congress has changed the trend in America. For 16 long years, we were headed toward more and more control, higher and higher taxes, greater and greater confusion. In Europe they called it fascism. Here at home, we knew it as the New Deal. We halted that trend toward a superstate. In fact, we reversed that trend. We took a new road. We began again to walk in paths of freedom. That is certainly the most significant development of this period.

Mr. SANBORN. Yes; I agree with you, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure that every thoughtful American agrees with you. But what about specific accomplishments? We hear it said by the left-over New Dealers so often that the Republicans have had no program that sometimes our own people swallow such reasoning.

Speaker MARTIN. Of course, that is a deception created by the New Deal propagandists. Let's see about the program. We reversed the trend of our Government which for 16 years has headed toward regimentation, State socialism, and bankruptcy. We balanced the budget for the first time in 16 years. We reduced the spending last year, and we are continuing our fight for efficiency and economy in Government. We intend to give the people a sound and solvent country. We promised to reduce the taxes of the people. We have done that despite three Presidential vetoes. That legislation released 7,400,000 little wage earners from paying any tax. We have provided the funds and the legislation to bring up our military strength so that we can have peace and security. For that purpose, we demanded complete supremacy in the air, and successfully won the fight for a 70-group air force. That was primarily a Republican victory over the Administration. We promised in 1946 to drive the Communists and the fellow travelers out of their smug berths in the Government where they were undermining our American system. We have been blocked by the bureaucracy whenever they could do so. We have had no cooperation in this fight from the Administration. But we have made progress. It is no longer popular to be known as a fellow traveler or a Communist. We have driven some out of the Government. We will keep this fight going until the last Communist is off the pay roll. With a Republican President, and a Republican Congress, the job can, and will be done. We have kept faith with the humane instincts of all Americans and have cooperated in aiding the people of other countries emerge from the wreckage of a disastrous World War.

Mr. SANBORN. I thought that would be your reply. We who are in Congress know what a wide variety of measures we have to act upon, measures the people frequently never even read about. We have gotten plenty of publicity for our 70-group air force measure, which is very popular with all Americans, and for our stock-piling legislation and our rubber legislation. But many Americans don't realize what a complicated task we have had to undertake. The New Deal really left us a snafu in fiscal affairs and it will be years before we can straighten the Government out again.

By the way, Mr. Speaker, out in your eastern country, there is plenty of rainfall, and folks there may not realize how vital conservation of our water resources is to us westerners. I know you are aware of this situation, but would you be willing to tell us something about Republican policy on this vital question?

Speaker MARTIN. Yes, John, I would. To begin with, let me point out that historically, the Republican Party was the first to recognize the need for reclamation projects. This goes back to the administration of Theodore Roosevelt. Ever since that time, the Republican policy has been to foster such projects. During the first session of this Congress, we voted generous appropriations for reclamation, flood-control projects, and farm benefits, larger sums than in previous Congresses. We propose to have a well-planned and well-integrated continuing program along these lines. I was glad the Public Lands Committee, of which you are a valued member, could make an inspection of your problems last summer in order to acquire first-hand information. This has been a useful service. I am convinced it will prove beneficial to your section in the years ahead. As you know, I have always been sympathetic to your program.

Mr. SANBORN. One more question, Mr. Speaker. What do you think of the diplomatic debacle recently brought on between the United States and Russia because of the bungling State Department?

Speaker MARTIN, John, you hit the nail on the head when you called it the bungling State Department. We are said to have a bipartisan foreign policy, but we are not consulted and it has been administered by New Dealers. They have made a series of tragic errors, since VE-day, which have lost for us the peace, although the war had been so gallantly won at such great price to our American soldiers.

The people see this now. They are going to restore sanity and efficiency to our Government. We are going to have a Republican President and a Republican Congress. With God's help, we can then build, on the wreckage of the war and the New Deal, a just and durable peace and a firm economy at home. And may I say to you good people of Idaho, you are fortunate in having such a splendid Congressman as JOHN SANBORN. In one brief term he has demonstrated his fine ability and has won many friends because of his patriotic service. He is one of the fine group of American Congressmen who are keeping us on the American track.

ANNOUNCER. Ladies and gentlemen, you have just heard the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, the Honorable JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Jr., a Republican of Massachusetts. He was interviewed by Representative JOHN SANBORN, a Republican Congressman from Idaho.

Summary of Major Legislation Enacted by Previous Republican Administrations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT A. TAFT
OF OHIO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a summary of major legislation enacted by previous Republican administrations. The estimated cost of printing the summary is $301.75.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

SUMMARY OF MAJOR LEGISLATION ENACTED BY REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATIONS—MARCH 4, 1897, TO MARCH 4, 1913, FIFTY-FIFTH TO SIXTY-SECOND CONGRESSES, MAY 9, 1919, TO MARCH 3, 1933, SIXTY-SIXTH TO SEVENTY-SECOND CONGRESSES

(Also, a statement of Republican enactments prior to the year 1897—For the 1897–1913 and 1919–33 periods 8,519 public laws were enacted)

The Republican Party was in control of the Senate and the House of Representatives during the Sixty-sixth Congress (May 19, 1919–March 3, 1921), and the President (Mr. Wilson) was a Democrat.

The House of Representatives was controlled by the Democratic Party, the Senate by the Republican Party during the Seventy-second Congress (December 7, 1931–March 3, 1933), and the President (Mr. Hoover) was a Republican.

From March 4, 1861 to 1897, Republican administrations initiated new fields of legislation, and laid the ground work for the major legislation of this century.

In the field of civil rights, the Emancipation Proclamation and the emancipation proclamation acts preceded the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth constitutional amendments, which excluded slavery, extended equal protection to all citizens, provided that privileges and immunities of the individual citizen should not be abridged by any State, and that the rights of citizens should not be abridged because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Legislation was enacted to enforce these civil-rights amendments, the abolition of slavery acts, amnesty proclamations, removal of disability acts, civil rights enforcement acts, and the Election Interference Prohibition Act.

In the field of agriculture and conservation Republican administrations enacted the agricultural colleges acts, homestead acts, and the meat inspection acts, and such major conservation legislation as the first forest conservation acts, forest reserve acts, irrigation acts, rivers and harbors acts, and the timber culture acts.

In the field of Government organization the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Justice were established.

Expanding interests of labor and industry were provided by the antitrust acts, Reciprocal Trade Act, eight-hour acts, interstate commerce acts, mines and mining acts, the shipping acts, which removed disabilities and encouraged the growth of the American merchant marine, the trade-mark acts, and the Union Pacific Railroad charter.

The social and economic security of the individual citizen was provided for in the antinarcotic acts, education and care of the blind acts, epidemic and diseases acts, pure food and drug acts, and the reconstruction acts.

Soldiers and veterans were aided by the dependent pensions acts, disability pension acts, and the soldiers and sailors homestead acts.

Five-Cent Fare in New York City

OF

HON. VITO MARCANTONIO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend by remarks, I am

inserting the following radio speech delivered by me over radio station WNBC, New York, April 22, 1948:

The mayor, in announcing the increase of the subway fare from 5 to 10 cents and of the busses and trolley fare from 5 to 7 cents, stated and I now quote him: "Next year the city will have to pay over $51,000,000 to make good transit operating deficits." Then he stated, "This is the problem. Shall we continue to pay transit operation deficits out of the city treasury or should we raise the fare and make these funds available toward improving the conditions of our hospitals and so forth."

The facts of the situation reveal that this is not the problem. Improved city services, wage increases for city employees as well as for transit employees are not dependent on an increase in fare. The choice is definitely not one between sacrifice of salary increases and city services or increasing the fare. This is not the true alternative. Let us look at the facts. It is true that the transit operating deficit is over $51,000,000. However, what you have not been told is that there is available for wage increases of transit and other city employees and for other city services at least $90,000,000. Now, how does this come about. The revenue for the next fiscal year has been underestimated by $65,000,000. There exists also about $25,000,000 in unused taxes, so that right here we have a sum of at least $90,000,000. The wage increases requested by transit workers would cost the city less than $26,000,000.

The increase for other city employees announced by the mayor last December would amount to $45,000,000. So, as a matter of plain arithmetic, $45,000,000 plus $26,000,000 total $71,000,000. Subtract $71,000,000 from $90,000,000, and we have a sum of $19,000,000 left which can be used for other necessary city services, hospitals, health, and sanitation. Here are cold figures which the mayor or any other advocate of an increased fare cannot in all honesty dismiss. Therefore, when the mayor posed the question the other night—and I again quote him—"Shall we continue to pay transit operating deficits and be unable to give deserved and just pay increases to underpaid city employees or shall we raise the fare and provide for such increases?" the mayor was not stating to the people of the city of New York the city's exact financial situation. I submit that it is an imposition on the people of our city to make them believe that the problem is, as the mayor stated it, of choosing between a fare increase or no wage increases. In the light of the facts, in the light of the figures which neither the mayor nor the press have given you, you now know that the problem is not either no wage increase or fare increase. One is most definitely not tied up with the other.

What is the real problem? We find evidence of the real problem in what the mayor himself stated the other night, and I now quote him—and please follow this closely, for this is the heart of the real issue:

"The Republicans believe that the little fellow should carry the load. This is what Governor Dewey said when he approved the bill. Objection has been made that the bill would make it possible to increase the fare to such an extent as to relieve real estate of part of its existing tax burden. This is a matter which will be wholly within the control of the board of transportation and the mayor, where it belongs."

Yes, this is it. The real question is, Shall transit deficit be financed by real estate and other entrenched interests, such as banking, or shall the burden be placed on you, the people, who can least afford to carry it?

Mind you, the mayor himself in his speech the other night admitted that the law was amended, and I quote him, "to impower the board of transportation on the mayor's approval to raise the fare to any amount not merely to cover the operating costs but to cover the debt service as well, thereby giving the big real-estate interests the hope that some day the rider may yet be made to pay the purchase price of the city's transit system.

This is the mayor's language. He confesses that this is the object of the law and yet what has he done about it. Let us see. The law was not mandatory. The transit law amendment passed by the legislature in March does not compel the mayor to avail himself of it. It leaves the responsibility with the board of transportation and the mayor. It leaves it up to them, up to him in particular to either use it or not use it. And what did he do? He used it. He used it to double your fare even though, as he himself stated it was enacted so that it may make you, the subway rider, yet pay the purchase price of the city's transit system. You know, my friends, the 5-cent fare has made New York a great city, and to protect the 5-cent fare the legislature back in 1944 provided that the people should have the choice in the matter of raising the fare. The law provided for a referendum by the people. Now the fare has been raised by the mayor without a referendum. Again let us see what the mayor himself said about this the other night. I again quote him, "that matter" referring to the fare increase "belongs to the people and should not be taken away from them. Governor Dewey and the Republican legislature should not have made it possible for any mayor or board to unload on the rider the present real-estate obligation." What a situation. Here the mayor tells us what the question of a fare increase is—a question that belong to the people to pass upon. He then tells you that the Governor and the legislature should not ask him to increase the fare and thereby take the question away from the people. In fact on March 12 after the legislature amended the transit law he stated, and again I quote him, "It is not likely that I will raise the fare during my administration." Remember, the legislature did not say that he must do it and still on April 20 the mayor does increase the fare. Is it not obvious to you that you have been taken for a ride? This time it is a 10-cent-fare ride.

Let us look into this confusion which is enveloping this fare issue and look and seek some more truth. Who asked that the law guaranteeing the referendum be amended so as to take the decision away from the people? I didn't. You didn't. It was the mayor himself. You remember his package plan, don't you? You remember that last December there was an item in his package plan which called for the amendment of the transit law to take away from you the people the right of referendum on any increase in fare to meet operating costs and to place that decision with the board of transportation. Now that the Republican legislature amended the law, repealed the referendum, and provided that the right of increase should be for all purposes and added that it had to be done with the approval of the mayor what do we find? He complains, he protests, he protested loudly in the first part of his speech last Tuesday. He says and I now quote him again: "This is a dangerous piece of legislation," and then in the same speech he does what he himself said would relieve big real-estate interests of their responsibility—he doubles the fare.

If the proponents of the fare increase, Republicans and Democrats believe that their cause is good why have they done so much to deprive the people of an opportunity to vote on it, as the law provided? Why have they done so much to take this issue from the people where it properly belongs? Why not ask that the law be amended again to enable the people to have a referendum on this fare issue, as it was provided by law before the law was amended? Why substitute for the people's will the undemocratic decision of one person or three persons? Now let us see what all this means to you. It means a wage cut of $2 a week to your family. For more than 50 percent of the city's union members it means wiping out one-half or more than one-half of wage increases won during the past year.

It means for the average New York City family an addition of $30 per year to an already high cost of living. It is about half of your annual milk bill. Consider what this fare increase will do to medical and dental care for your children. One hundred dollars per year is the amount that most of the New York families will pay to relieve the real-estate and banking interests of their responsibility.

Transit is a public service like the fire, police, and sanitation departments. It must be financed by the democratic and sound principle of taxation of placing the burden on those who can best afford it and not on those who can least afford to carry it. Remember, only in 1946 a sales tax was imposed upon you amounting to $70,000,000 and you were then told that it was either the sales tax or a fare increase and the people of the city took it in order to avoid the fare increase. Now a sales tax of 5 cents is placed on your subway ride. For what? For whom? To permit the real-estate interests who can bear the burden of escaping their responsibility. To permit the bankers to whom the city is paying $222,000,000 a year to escape their responsibility.

Against all this I pledge you that in the tradition of Fiorella H. LaGuardia, New York City's American Labor Party mayor, and whom the people of the city of New York so sorely miss, the American Labor Party will continue the fight. No amount of confusion, no amount of distortion, and no amount of vituperation will divert us from this task in the defense of the little people of our city.

Sound Money: A Curb on War—A Sound Monetary System Will Do More to Bring About World Peace, European Recovery, and Economic Stability Than All the League of Nations, United Nations, and European Recovery Programs That Ever Can Be Formulated

OF

HON. JOHN SANBORN

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. SANBORN. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill for the restoration of a sound monetary system in the United States. I believe it is the most important piece of legislation before the Congress and that it should be given priority over all other legislation. For until we have sound money we cannot have a sound economy; and until we have a sound economy there can be no peace nor economic recovery anywhere in the world, regardless of how many billions of dollars of the American taxpayers' money is thrown away in a futile effort to stabilize the economy of other nations.

Sound money in the United States means sound money throughout the world, since the value of money in all other countries is measured in American dollars. Two world wars and numerous depressions can be charged directly or indirectly to an unsound monetary system; for every war is, in essence, an economic war; and if we would prevent wars and depressions, we must first eliminate the causes of wars and depressions.

History shows that an unsound monetary system is more fruitful of human misery than war, pestilence, and famine; and has brought more injustice than all the bad laws ever enacted. Until we first adopt a sound monetary system, all of our present frenzied efforts for peace and world stability are just so much sound and fury signifying nothing. Unless money is sound and dependable, nothing is sound and dependable.

How futile to talk of balancing the budget, of appropriating money for European recovery, and stabilizing prices and wages when no single member of the administration or the Congress knows what the value of the dollar will be six short months from today. How stupid to talk of combatting communism while supplying Communists the tools with which they work and the vehicles on which they ride to power—a debauched currency and a regimented economy. Karl Marx taught and Lenin demonstrated that the surest way to overturn the social order is to debauch the currency, because this enlists all economic laws on the side of destruction in a way that not one man in a million will see.

Under the tutelage of Prof. Harold Laski and the late Lord John Maynard Keynes, pseudo economists from the Socialist London School of Economics, the New Deal administration has so faithfully followed the Marxist formula that our dollar and all fixed-dollar-value securities, including savings, pensions, and life insurance, have lost 63 percent of their value since 1934. That means the 1948 dollar has a purchasing power equal to only 37 cents 14 years ago.

If we fail to stabilize the currency now, and blindly appropriate the billions proposed to be spent under the European recovery program, we can expect the purchasing power of the dollar to fall still further, probably equal in value to 25 cents prior to 1934. Such a policy will inevitably bring economic collapse and world-wide depression, much more disastrous than that of 1929, because we have much farther to fall.

UNBRIDLED ANARCHY WILL FOLLOW ANOTHER MAJOR DEPRESSION

The United States is the last hope of a war-weary world to lead it out of the confusion and chaos that exists today, but we can lead only if we remain economically strong. A depression in the United States means unbridled anarchy in the rest of the world—a return to the Dark Ages—and yet we are being stampeded into pursuing a course that will make a depression inevitable.

During the past few months, the American people have been subjected to the most outrageous, unconscionable, and powerful propaganda the world has ever known to frighten our people and stampede the Congress into voting billions and billions of dollars for European recovery. When conscientious Members of Congress hesitated about giving away these billions of the taxpayers' money, all the stops were pulled wide open. Administration alarmists began seeing Soviet submarines off our shores, pictured the imminent possibility of Russian planes dropping atomic bombs on our cities, and solemnly warned us that unless we bought the friendship of 16 European nations with $17,000,000,000, western Europe would go Communist and the United States would be on the way to Hades in a hand basket.

Is it not more than passing strange that the State Department and the administration that demanded $17,000,000,000 to stop communism in Europe had denied aid to the Chinese Nationalist Government because Chiang Kai-shek had to take Communists into his government where they could bore from within and take over, just as they did so recently in Czechoslovakia?

AMERICA'S STAKE IN EUROPE AND ASIA

In formulating our foreign policy, the first consideration should be the security of the United States. Is our security enhanced by abandoning the Chinese Nationalist Government while levying billions of dollars in taxes on American free enterprise to support European socialism which is committed to the destruction of free enterprise? Socialist European governments permit only one kind of democracy—the democracy of regimented mediocrity—which differs not in kind but only in degree from Russian authoritarianism. Regardless of how many billions of dollars we pour into Europe, it is futile to hope for Europe's economic recovery under Socialist regimes; for recovery can come only through increased production, and everywhere that socialism has been tried, it has succeeded only in retarding production.

Europe has nothing that we need or want; our sole interest in Europe should be that of a good samaritan to furnish emergency relief until the nations can put their own houses in order. But the situation is entirely different in Asia; we must have the raw rubber, tin, and bauxite of the Dutch East Indies to keep our economy going, and the only thing that stands between Russia and the East Indies is Chiang Kai-shek's army. If we permit him to be defeated, Russia can seize not only these resources so essential to our economy, and menace Australia, but will be able to concentrate all her armed forces for a drive on the European front.

Now, if the administration's military advisers have even a remote idea that the United States will have to fight Russia, the first rudiments of military strategy would be to force Russia to fight on two fronts by building up the fighting power of the Chinese Nationalist Government, which has been consistently fighting communism for 20 years.

EUROPEAN RECOVERY PROGRAM PREGNANT WITH DISASTER

The European recovery program is probably more pregnant with disaster than any other piece of legislation ever approved by the Congress, not merely because of the billions of dollars already authorized for it, but because of the chain of expenditures that will follow in its wake. The war hysteria, apparently deemed necessary to secure the passage of this legislation, is responsible for proposals to double expenditures for national defense. A revival of lend-lease to arm and equip the western European bloc will require more billions of dollars; and since we seem to have billions of dollars to throw away in Europe, we can expect every pressure group in the country to descend on the Congress, demanding appropriations for their pet schemes. Many such pressure groups are already in Washington.

At the close of World War II, the American people were in a mood to get down to work, tighten their belts, rebuild our domestic economy, and reduce our mammoth debt. But now they are in a mood not unlike that of the wife of a man I once knew. This couple had mutually agreed to work hard, economize, put off buying new clothes and a new car until they had paid off the mortgage on the old homestead. But when the wife discovered that her husband had bought a fur coat and a new automobile for a dizzy blonde, she demanded a fur coat and a new car, too.

FICTION OF RUSSIA'S MILITARY STRENGTH

One worlders, Soviet appeasers, and political opportunists are trying to frighten the American people by exploiting the fictitious power of Russia. The real facts are that Russia is a military threat to no one except her small nearby neighbors. Her menace to the rest of the world lies in her ability to inoculate knaves and fools of other lands with her vicious ideology. If we would stop communism, the place to begin is here at home.

Little Finland made a sucker out of Russia's Army until overwhelmed by numbers; a portion of the German Army drove the Russians back like cattle; and the Russian Army never started marching west until General Patton had destroyed the German Army. Then, for some inexplicable reason, General Patton was ordered to withdraw his troops so the Russian "conquerors" could triumphantly enter Berlin and Prague.

Everyone knows that communism has been steadily losing ground in western Europe for more than a year, particularly in France and Italy. The people of these countries recognize Communist Russia for what it is—the greatest economic hoax in all history.

Since the end of the war, Russia has been living on lend-lease, UNRRA, and the spoils looted from other countries; yet, despite all that, her new 5-year plan has failed and Russia is ready to fall apart from her own internal weaknesses and economic fallacies. Her arrogance, insolence, and war talk are the usual devices resorted to by rulers to detract the attention of their people from their domestic failures; and, from recent events in this country, it is evident that Russia does not have a monopoly on this age-old formula.

Arthur Sears Henning, in the Washington Times-Herald of May 10, 1948, says:

WAR SCARE STRATEGY

The campaign strategy of Democratic National Chairman MCGRATH is directed toward convincing his party as well as the country that America faces the danger of war with Soviet Russia and that it would be foolhardy to swap horses in midstream. The Democratic high command has been proceeding on this line of action ever since the President's message to Congress a few weeks ago assailing the Soviets and calling for preparation for possible war.

That Mr. Henning has correctly stated administration strategy is evidenced daily by reports emanating from the White House. In one day recently—May 13, 1948—the following newspaper headlines screamed at us in black letters an inch high: "Peace Hopes Dim—Truman"; "The President Says: Peace Prospects No Brighter"; and "President Asks Billions More for Defense."

Are we to be fed this synthetic war talk until a frightened people needle the Congress into voting away additional billions of dollars of the taxpayers' money, and we are bullied into accepting price controls and regimentation which will wreck small business, the farmer, and all producers of raw materials, and foster cartels and monopolies?

The reason you do not hear much about controls in current news is because the subject is unpleasant and politically unpopular; but right now there is a complete economic mobilization plan at the White House. It is the blueprint for all sorts of controls and it goes pretty far. If the administration and its Republican allies in the so-called bipartisan foreign policy are permitted to carry out their mad plans, you can expect economic and price controls as drastic as any experienced during the war. The American people are being "conditioned" to accept these controls by the same old methods that have prevailed during the past 15 years when, every time the administration wanted to further shackle the American people, it brought out a new emergency or a new crisis. Do you not feel these words are becoming a bit shopworn?

Russian aggression in the Balkans, Manchuria, and Korea means that Russia merely is consolidating the areas we turned over to her on a silver tray at Tehran, Yalta, Quebec, and Potsdam, where we gave away the peace—piece by piece. Imagine, if you can, the stupidity of setting up American headquarters in Berlin and permitting Berlin to be entirely surrounded by Russian troops; or delivering the Kuriles Islands to Russia so they point like a dagger at the heart of Alaska.

But Russia made her most colossal blunder in trying to force the yoke of despotism on the unassimilable people of the Balkans. Today the Balkans are seething with revolt and, if we choose to arm the Balkans, Russia will be torn apart by a revolution in which millions of the Russian people will join.

We invited the insults and indignities dished out to us by Russia when we gently slapped Tito on the wrist after he brutally shot down and murdered five American flyers. A self-respecting administration would have demanded that Stalin deliver Tito, dead or alive, in 48 hours—or else, and if he failed to comply, a couple of atomic bombs dropped on the Kremlin would have brought him to his senses. That would not have been the highway to war, but the pathway to peace, for Soviet Russia recognizes nothing but force.

CULMINATION OF A CENTURY-OLD CONSPIRACY

Since Soviet Russia is not in any sense a military threat to the United States, why the sudden war hysteria—why the pressing emergency to give away billions of dollars of the American taxpayers' money now? It's a sad and sordid and dirty story, folks—the culmination of a century-old conspiracy to break the economic strength of the United States, pillage our country, and dominate our production and trade.

From the early days of this Republic, European absolutists saw in our system of government a threat to their decadent monarchies and all other forms of absolutism. During our Civil War, one European group aided the North while another aided the South in the hope that we would destroy ourselves. When we survived that war and gave evidence of growing strength, the London Times, then the mouthpiece of European absolutists, said editorially:

> If that mischievous financial policy, which had its origin in the North American Republic during the late war in that country, should become indurated down to a fixture, then that Government will furnish its own money without cost. It will pay off its debts and be without debt. It will have all the money necessary to carry on its commerce. It will become prosperous beyond precedent in the history of the civilized governments of the world. The brains and the wealth of all countries will go to North America. That Government must be destroyed or it will destroy every monarchy on the globe.

Their next move to destroy us was the demonetization of silver in 1873, but under our system of free competitive enterprise and a protective tariff, we were able not only to survive this infamy, but to grow and prosper.

Most European monarchies have fallen, but that does not mean a change of systems, only a change of masters. Absolute monarchies have been succeeded by cartels, monopolies, and other forms of absolutism under the control of international banker-buccaneers.

Frustrated in the past to gain control of American commerce and industry, the international bankers were quick to recognize that the Communists, fellow-travelers, half-baked liberals, so-called intellectuals, and fuzzy-minded New Dealers were the instrumentalities through which they could attain their objectives—by debauching our currency, confiscating property through taxation, breaking down our protective tariff, and draining away our wealth to such an extent that we could no longer consume the major portion of our own production. Then the American manufacturer would be forced to seek foreign markets; and foreign goods would flow into free trade America to pay interest on foreign bonds held by the international bankers.

So long as the American manufacturer has profitable home market, he is not interested in foreign trade. He favors a tariff to protect agriculture, mining, labor, and industry. He looks on the American workman and the American farmer as his best customers; and it is to his interest to pay the highest possible wages and the highest possible prices for raw materials.

But once he is forced to seek foreign markets, wages and raw materials become merely items of cost to be kept as low as possible. Then American industry becomes a more profitable investment for the international bankers, who will take over the control of our American economy at the expense of our own people.

In confirmation of the above statement, I should like to quote from an article by Walter Trohan, one of the keenest observers and ablest newspapermen in the National Capital, which was carried in the Chicago Daily Tribune and the Washington Times-Herald:

> WASHINGTON, April 19, 1947.—The nimble fingers of Wall Street and the long arm of London countinghouses are widely regarded on Capitol Hill as the real molders of the so-called American bipartisan foreign policy. * * * The New York financial interests and various elements profiting in foreign trade are now considered as having shaped American foreign policy for the last decade. Wall Street has fused groups of widely divergent interests from the Communists of Union Square to the social circles of Park Avenue to pump for its foreign programs.

Dean Acheson, who as Under Secretary of State has in many respects been the de facto head of the Department under both Secretaries Marshall and Byrnes, is quitting his job. Presumably, he will rejoin the law firm which is said to be handling at least one of the applications for international loans that he has been promoting in the State Department. His successor is to be Robert A. Lovett.

Mr. Lovett was an Assistant Secretary of War for Air during the war, but his regular job is a partner in Brown Bros., Harriman & Co., the Wall Street investment bankers. Mr. Lovett will find himself at home in the Truman administration. Secretary of Commerce Harriman is one of his former partners. Navy Secretary Forrestal comes from another Wall Street investment house. Secretary of War Patterson was a Wall Street lawyer before he went to the Federal bench, from which he was brought into the subcabinet by Secretary Stimson, still another Wall Street lawyer. In such a galaxy Secretary of the Treasury Snyder hardly ranks as one of the elite. He was a banker, but only in St. Louis.

This is probably the greatest concentration of spokesmen for Wall Street and its international high binding that has ever been assembled in any American cabinet. It is particularly striking that this concentration should occur in an administration that started out 14 years ago with the announced watchword of driving the money changers out of the temple.

It was Wall Street and the evils practiced there that made that slogan possible. Today all that remains of the campaign started in 1933 is a continuing harassment, not of the high finance that was then so loudly denounced but of business throughout the Nation, which was guilty of few of the evil practices attributed to Wall Street, and itself often suffered from those practices. The producers have been made the goats of New Deal propaganda, while the money changers have been restored to the sanctuary.

Wall Street saw profit in the old adage that if you can't lick them, join them. The opportunity to do so arose from the failure of Mr. Roosevelt's domestic program. He turned then to an adventure in foreign war. As experts in foreign meddling the money changers "saw their opportunity to make peace and seized it. Now they own the temple."

With one important exception, there is little distinction between Mr. Truman's indiscriminate foreign loans and the wild lending of the twenties that helped bring on the depression. So far as hope of recovery is concerned, the issues are virtually identical. The important exception is that it is not necessary this time for the Wall Streeters to go out and peddle bonds to trusting suckers. The money comes direct from the Treasury, and the Bureau of Internal Revenue takes it away from the widows and orphans. Wall Street gets all the profits and incurs none of the opprobrium.

ARE YOU GUILTY OF SAYING "I DON'T WANT TO KNOW ANYTHING ABOUT MONEY"?

The international banker-racketeers have been able to get away with their plans because we deliberately close our minds to the subject of money and refuse to discuss it or try to understand it. Why? Because a part of the conspiracy to gain control of American industry and dominate our commerce has been to spread insidious propaganda designed to convince the American people, including the Congress, that the subject of money is so mysterious and complicated that only the monetary experts and the international bankers are capable of understanding it.

So successful has been this campaign that if you broach the subject of money to anyone in or out of Congress, nine times out of ten the answer will be: "I do not know a thing about money; I do not want to know anything about money; I leave that subject to the monetary experts"; and because we have left this subject to the experts, millions of men have died and billions of dollars have been wasted; and civilization is balancing on the brink of the abyss.

NOTHING MYSTERIOUS ABOUT REAL MONEY

There is nothing mysterious or complicated about real money. Anyone with a fourth-grade education, who knows that 2 and 2 equals 4, can understand it. For money has but three simple functions: First, to serve as a measure of value of goods and services; second, a medium of exchange; third, a convenient way to store the equivalent of goods and services. Nothing mysterious or complicated about that, is there?

And yet this simple subject is the most important subject on earth; and the integrity, or lack of integrity in money, is reflected in men and nations. Without money, civilization could not have had a beginning; and without a sound, stable, dependable monetary system, civilization cannot survive. If we continue to ignore this all-important subject, we are not fit to represent our constituents in the Congress.

The importance of money in the life of a people was most eloquently expressed in the opening paragraph of the memorable speech by the Honorable John Paul Jones, of Nevada, before the United States Senate, on October 14, 1893:

Mr. President, the question before the Senate, broadly considered, involves all the varied interests of this Republic. Every concern of our people, financial and industrial, religious and moral, political and social, come within its all-embracing scope. Upon a proper solution of the problem of money in a country depends the decision of the question whether there shall be in that country more poverty or less, more crime or less, more insanity or less; whether among its people there shall be more employment or more idleness, more happiness or more misery—indeed more liberty or more slavery—for it must be borne in mind that men may be as thoroughly enslaved by unfavorable industrial conditions as by positive legal enactment.

President Garfield said:

Whoever controls the money of a nation controls its industry and commerce.

And as long ago as 1790, Mayer Amschel Rothschild said:

Permit me to issue and control the money of a nation and I care not who writes the laws.

The founding fathers of this Republic considered the control over our money of such paramount importance that they wrote into the Constitution of the United States (art. I, sec. 8, clause 5, powers of Congress):

The Congress shall have power * * *. To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures.

But we flaunted this provision of the Constitution when we signed the Bretton Woods monetary agreements, which transferred this power to a foreign tribunal—a financial superstate—financed by the American taxpayers but controlled by debtor nations. The control over our money must be returned to the Congress where it belongs.

Both party platforms of 1948 should contain sound money planks just as they did in 1892; and we Republicans who believe in sound money should give our best efforts to have such a plank written into the 1948 Republican platform at Philadelphia, in June.

A BRIEF RÉSUMÉ OF WHAT HAS HAPPENED TO OUR MONEY SINCE THE ADVENT OF THE NEW DEAL

For 90 years prior to 1934, the price of gold was pegged at $20.67 per ounce; and since there are 480 grains in one ounce, this fixed the amount of gold constituting $1 at 23.22 grains. This was the amount of gold you could receive, on demand, from any bank for each dollar of currency presented for redemption prior to 1934. For example, by presenting for redemption $10 in currency, you received a $10 gold piece containing 232.2 grains of pure gold. And, incidentally, from the time the United States adopted a monetary system in 1793, the amount of gold constituting $1 was never less than 23.2 grains until 1934 ,when the amount was reduced to 13.71 grains. This depreciated the dollar 41 percent, and permitted a proportionate reduction of monetary reserves; and since it required 35 of these depreciated dollars of 13.71 grains to equal an ounce of gold, the price of gold advanced to $35 per ounce. After the short time-lag between cause and effect, the dollar bought only what 59 cents bought prior to this act of depreciation; and was referred to at the time as a 59-cent dollar.

An interesting but startling comment on how the price of gold was manipulated is disclosed in the following excerpt from the diary of Henry Morgenthau, former Secretary of the Treasury:

If anybody ever knew how we really set the gold price through a combination of lucky numbers, etc., I think they would really be frightened.

The above naive remark suggests that they were totally oblivious of the fact they were gambling with the future of the world—just juveniles playing with a gun they did not know was loaded.

As the United States price of gold rose above the world price there was consternation in foreign capitals. When Sir Montagu Norman, then Governor of the Bank of England, frantically protested that such an action would throw the whole world into bankruptcy, Morgenthau informs us that he chuckled and the President guffawed—a performance strangely reminiscent of Nero fiddling while Rome burned, for Sir Montagu Norman's prophecy is dangerously close to coming true. The American people are staggering under the greatest national debt in history, and most of the other nations of the world are facing bankruptcy.

Just one example will show the world-shocking repercussions which follow a debauching of the currency and the repudiation of contractual obligations for the redemption of currency. Following the debacle of 1929, which was precipitated when European bank reserves dropped from 40 percent to 21 percent, France, Belgium, and Holland were desperately trying to rebuild their monetary reserves. Gold, because of its scarcity, was unobtainable, so they turned to something they had every right to believe was equally good—United States gold certificates, which had printed on them the pledge that they were redeemable in gold, at face value—and the English pound sterling. When we repudiated that pledge and made these gold certificates redeemable at only 59 cents on the dollar—and the pound sterling depreciated approximately the same amount—the banks of these three countries suffered terrific losses. The Bank of France not only lost its capital but many times its capital; and France was forced to the dangerous expedient of a capital levy and the issuance of non-interest-bearing bonds.

As a result the French people lost confidence not only in their bank but in their government as well, and became easy prey to every Fascist and Communist plot. France began to disintegrate; and when the Germans marched in, in World War II, instead of stopping the Germans as they did in World War I, France fell apart—and because France fell apart thousands of white crosses mark the graves of American dead all around the world.

RIGHT OF REDEMPTION SHOULD BE RESTORED TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

Prior to 1934, the American people enjoyed the right to redeem their paper currency in gold at face value, on demand. So long as the people have that right they can use it as an effective brake to discourage reckless and extravagant government spending. One of the first acts of the New Deal administration, before starting on its spending spree, was to deprive the people of the right of redemption. This accomplished, and the dollar cheapened by 41 percent, the printing presses were put to work turning out billions of these depreciated dollars, so that in a matter of 10 years, currency in circulation increased from approximately $5,000,000,000 to $28,000,000,000. This increase in the currency naturally caused a further gradual depreciation in the purchasing power of the dollar; but it was not until 1945, when Public Law 84 was passed permitting a 37½-percent reduction in monetary reserves, that the dollar started to take a real toboggan downward.

FALLING EUROPEAN BANK RESERVES PRECIPITATE 1929 DEPRESSION

Under laws in effect prior to 1934, the Treasury was required to maintain a monetary reserve of 40 percent of the face value of all currency in circulation. That was because the experience of more than a century had fixed 40 percent as the minimum reserve necessary to insure the redemption of currency at face value, on demand. Thus, it became axiomatic that currency in circulation was worth two and one-half times the reserve back of it; and if reserves fell below 40 percent, the value of currency fell proportionately. It was the violation of this inexorable economic law that precipitated the 1929 depression.

In the late 1920's, European banks permitted their monetary reserves to drop from 40 percent to 21 percent, and their currencies depreciated proportionately. In a desperate effort to restore these reserves, they dumped their American stocks and bonds on the market and broke our market. Silver money was withdrawn from circulation in India and dumped on the world's silver market, thereby forcing down the price of silver from 65 cents to 26 cents per ounce. This wiped out 60 percent of the purchasing power of 1,000,000,000 people in the Orient and the Middle East where silver is, and always has been, their money. You simply cannot destroy the purchasing power of half the people in the world without bringing about a world depression. However, the Chinese still had confidence in the integrity of silver; and Japan used this cheap silver to first industrialize, then militarize Manchuria, and the foundation was laid for World War II.

ADOPTION OF SOUND MONETARY SYSTEM IN 1933 WOULD HAVE ENDED DEPRESSION AND PREVENTED WORLD WAR II

Real economists and monetary authorities of the type of Sir Henry Deterding repeatedly pointed out that by joining silver with gold, at fixed and proper ratio, in a return to bimetallism, the depression would end within a few months; but the voices of real economists were drowned out by the vociferousness of pseudo economists of the type of Leon Henderson and Harold Laski.

It is tragic to think how easily the depression could have been brought to an end and World War II prevented if the United States had assumed leadership for the adoption of a sound monetary system at the London Economic Conference of 1933. Bitter quarrels and rivalries among the United States delegates to the conference prevented any constructive achievements; and when the President sent his bombshell message, recently referred to in the memoirs of Cordell Hull, the conference was broken up; and the resultant economic chaos speeded nations along the highway that led to World War II.

Apparently incapable of recognizing the real underlying cause for the 1929 depression, the pseudo economists of the New Deal placed all blame on American business, American capitalism, and the Smoot-Hawley tariff. Starting on this false premise, they carried on much like a quack doctor who, unable to correctly diagnose his patient's illness, doses him with every concoction on the drug store shelves.

Proceeding on what the President frankly admitted to be a course of "trial and error," they experimented with every half-baked theory and took many dangerous excursions into socialism, communism, regimentation, and other forms of collectivism, all of which inevitably lead to absolutism and despotism. Once, along about 1937, when a brief business upturn tempted them to think the depression was ended, they exultantly boasted: "It didn't just happen, it was planned that way." But with another sharp slump, they were left drifting aimlessly like a rudderless ship on an uncharted sea. With their ship about to founder, they began to call on the internationalists and the one-worlders of Wall Street for help. While the New Dealers stayed on as "fronts," the smart boys from Wall Street were really in command.

INFLATION BY LEGISLATION

Unlike the New Dealers who never knew where they were going, the smart boys from Wall Street knew exactly where they wanted to go; and as the war was ending, they promptly started to carry out their plans to gain control of American industry and commerce. Three pieces of must legislation were sent to the Congress, supported by the most outrageous propaganda, stressing the argument that the passage of this legislation was absolutely necessary to prevent war and bring about economic recovery.

These were the amended Reciprocal Trade Act, which permitted an additional 50-percent reduction in tariffs; Public Law 84, which permitted the lowering of monetary reserves from 40 percent to 25 percent or less; and the Bretton Woods monetary agreements, which were fashioned to place the control over money, credit, and commerce in a financial superstate, financed by the American taxpayers but controlled by debtor nations and international bankers.

While introduced and passed as three separate and distinct measures, they fit together as perfectly as the parts to a jigsaw puzzle, forming the most perfect instrument ever devised to sell America down the river. This triumvirate of laws will deliver control of American industry and commerce to the international bankers, flood our markets with goods and commodities produced by foreign slave labor, and lower the American standard of living to the world level.

It is becoming increasingly evident that these were the objectives of those who concocted, and caused to be disseminated, the lying propaganda that American business, American capitalism, and the Smoot-Hawley tariff were responsible for the 1929 depression. While it is probably true that most New Dealers were the stupid dupes of the real conspirators, their ignorance does not extenuate their guilt.

If we would escape the catastrophic consequences of these three pieces of legislation, we must speedily adopt a sound monetary system and restore tariffs adequate to protect American producers, American labor, and the American market.

REPEATING THE ERRORS OF 1929

The terrible consequences of the 1929 depression which was precipitated when European banks permitted their monetary reserves to fall from 40 to 21 percent, should have deterred us from ever permitting our monetary reserves to be reduced below the point of safety. But Public Law 84 of 1945 authorized the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board not only to reduce reserves from 40 to 25 percent but, in some instances, to 20 percent or less. The time lag and OPA price controls temporarily kept people from realizing what was happening to their money, but by 1946 the already depreciated dollar had lost another 37½ percent of its value, and commodity prices had advanced 60 percent. That is what started the vicious cycle of rising prices and the resultant demand for higher wages. As a consequence, our 1948 dollar has a purchasing power equivalent to only 37 cents prior to 1934.

A contributing factor to this inflationary spiral was the appropriation of approximately $10,000,000,000 for the British loan and the Bretton Woods bank and fund, which had the effect of increasing the currency in circulation about 37½ percent. We can expect similar disastrous results when appropriations are made under the European recovery program. Unless immediate steps are taken to stabilize the currency by adopting a sound monetary system, the purchasing power of our 1949 dollar probably will not exceed that of 25 cents prior to 1934.

The same type of demagogic New Dealers who blamed American business and the tariff for the 1929 depression are now contending that high prices are the result of excessive profit taking by business; and are demanding a return to price controls and a more stringent regimentation of business. These demagogs must know—if they know anything—that the New Deal's debauching of our currency is responsible for high prices; and that if all profits were eliminated, prices would drop less than 7 percent because business profits average less than 7 percent.

While thus keeping the American people confused and worried about inflation, those responsible for cheapening the dollar in 1945 are cunningly promoting the drive for a return to the single gold standard and the redemption of currency in gold at $35 per ounce—a slick method for turning their billions of synthetic 37-cent dollars into 59-cent dollars and pillaging the United States Treasury of its gold.

MORE DANGEROUS THAN THE ATOMIC BOMB

With monetary reserves around the world now averaging less than 21 percent, the entire world is figuratively sitting on an economic powder keg which, at any time, can explode with more dangerous consequences than the dropping of all the atomic bombs in existence. The situation is infinitely more serious than that which precipitated the 1929 depression.

There are many indications that falling monetary reserves are causing worldwide alarm. Argentina has just suspended transfer of dollars and other hard currencies from the country in payment of exports. Disparities in currencies, prices, and terms of trade are impeding economic recovery in Europe and elsewhere. The exchange rate of the dollar and the pound sterling—the two leading currencies of the world—is known to be vulnerable, subject to speculative raids, to illicit transactions, and to frightened withdrawals. In an attempt to remedy this situation, France has recently devaluated her currency, but was criticized by the World Monetary Fund.

Right in the face of this chaotic situation, the National Economic Advisory Council, in a report just sent to the Congress by President Truman, said the United States will require countries getting ERP aid to work out devaluation of their currencies with the 46-nation World Monetary Fund. This apparently is a threat that ERP money will be shut off to countries that refuse to submit to a revaluation of their currencies by the World Monetary Fund. That the National Economic Advisory Council would make such an announcement regarding a so highly sensitive matter, before formulating a policy and reaching an agreement, only goes to prove that top-rank New Dealers are still as oblivious to the dire consequences of monetary manipulations as was Henry Morgenthau when he talked about fixing the price of gold through a combination of lucky numbers.

If the World Monetary Fund can manipulate the currencies of other countries, it can manipulate the value of United States currency for, under the Bretton Woods monetary agreements, we took the power over our money from the Congress, in which that power was vested by the Constitution, and turned it over to the World Monetary Fund.

Before permitting ourselves to become further involved, it would be well to ponder President Garfield's warning that: "Whoever controls the money of a nation controls its industry and commerce."

Lest you have forgotten what this World Monetary Fund is and the powers with which it has been vested, let me refresh your memory: The fund is a financial dictatorship, set up in perpetuity, free from supervision, investigation, or criticism; and answerable to no one but its own officials. In its directorate, we are out-numbered 9 to 3, which means that debtor nations and international bankers will control money, the value of money, trade, and credit. Millions of lives and billions of dollars have been expended to dethrone dictators, but the fund is many times more powerful and dangerous than Hitler ever was.

If you doubt a single statement made above, secure a copy of the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund and International Bank, issued by the United States Treasury when Henry Morgenthau, Jr., was Secretary. Below are a few excerpts from pages 19, 26, and 33 of this very remarkable document:

The Managing Director and the staff of the fund, in the discharge of their functions, shall owe their duty entirely to the fund and to no other authority.

Any question of interpretation of the provisions of this agreement arising between any member and the fund or between any members of the fund shall be submitted to the executive directors for their decision. In any case where the executive directors have given a decision under the above, any member may require that the question be referred to the Board of Governors, whose decision shall be final.

The fund shall possess full juridical personality, and, in particular, the capacity to contract; to acquire, and dispose of immovable and movable property; to institute legal proceedings.

The fund, its property and its assets, wherever located and by whomsoever held, shall enjoy immunity from every form of judicial process except to the extent that it expressly waives its immunity for the purpose of any proceedings or by the terms of any contract.

Property and assets of the fund, wherever located and by whomsoever held, shall be immune from search, requisition, confiscation, expropriation, or any other form of seizure by executive or legislative action.

The archives of the fund shall be inviolable.

And on and on ad infinitum. The American taxpayers put up the money. The fund decides how and where our money will be spent, for "the Managing Director and the staff of the fund * * * owe their duty entirely to the fund and to no other authority."

The Bretton Woods monetary agreements, particularly the part referring to the fund, is the greatest conglomeration of double talk ever thrown together by that master of double talk, the late Lord John Maynard Keynes. Proponents of this measure did not dare submit it to the fierce light of publicity that blazed over the conference at San Francisco when the Charter of the United Nations was adopted. They chose to have it adopted as an "essential appendage" to the United Nations; but, rather than being an appendage, it is the tail that wags the dog. The fund is the big tent; the United Nations is merely the side show.

As now constituted, the principal functions of the United Nations are to spread confusion throughout the world and lull us into a false security while the internationalists are setting up their financial superstate—the World Monetary Fund. That there are some able, honorable men in the United Nations, no one will deny; nor can anyone deny that the United Nations personnel is honeycombed with one-worlders, fellow travelers, Communists, phony liberals, and "fugitives from the New Deal."

Before spending $65,000,000 of the American taxpayers' money to build a new "Tower of Babel" for the United Nations, would it not be well to explore the merits of a sound monetary system?

A sound monetary system will do more to maintain world peace and economic stability than all the League of Nations, United Nations, and European recovery programs that ever can be formulated.

A "managed economy and managed currency" as now perpetuated under the Bretton Woods monetary agreements means economic chaos, anarchy, and war. Sound money means peace and economic recovery.

The choice is now up to the American people, and the decision they make will determine whether they are to be free men or economic slaves.

THREE MEASUREMENTS ESSENTIAL TO ORDERLY GOVERNMENT AND ECONOMIC STABILITY

Three accurate measurements are absolutely essential to orderly Government and economic stability. These are: First, a measure of value; second, a measure of distance; and, third, a measure of weight.

At the Bureau of Standards in Washington, D. C., a metallic yardstick, fashioned from metals least affected by air or changes in temperature, and least subject to expansion or contraction, is kept in a dustproof, moistureproof case under constant guard lest something should cause it to vary one ten-thousandth of an inch. A metallic pound weight is likewise protected and guarded. Every few years they are carefully transported to London and Paris and compared with similar measurements there. These measurements do not vary with political or economic conditions or ideologies in the various countries; they are constant.

But the most important measure of all—the measure of value—is permitted to fluctuate all over the globe. Currencies are presumed to be measured in gold but the price of gold varies from $35 per ounce in the United States to as high as $110 per ounce in other parts of the world; and black-market quotations are much in excess of $110 per ounce. You cannot build a sound economy with an elastic currency any more than you can construct a building with an elastic yardstick as your only means of measurement; nor can the value of money be allowed to fluctuate with the prices of commodities. Surely no one would propose a difference in the number of inches in a yardstick whether the price of dress goods was 50 cents per yard or $10 per yard; and no one would propose to increase or decrease the number of pounds in a bushel, whether the price of potatoes was $1 per bushel of $5 per bushel. To stabilize the value of our currency does not mean to fix prices; it simply means to make the dollar a constant, dependable measure of value.

MONEY MUST HAVE A VALUE OF ITS OWN

The principal function of money is to serve as a constant, dependable measure of the value of goods and services. When money fails to perform that function, there is bound to be economic chaos—the kind of chaos that exists throughout the world today. The economic problems of the world can be solved only by the adoption of a sound monetary system; and this naturally brings up the question: What constitutes sound money?

To be sound, stable, and dependable, money must have a value of its own, entirely unaffected by the credit or lack of credit of the countries in which it circulates. To give money this quality, currencies must be backed by, and be redeemable in, "something" that has a universally recognized and accepted value.

For centuries, gold and silver, and paper currencies redeemable in gold or silver, have been the only mediums that were universally recognized and accepted in exchange for goods and services. This didn't just happen. From the dawn of civilization, mankind, in the exchange of goods and services, recognized the necessity of a dependable measure of value and medium of exchange. Many mediums were tried and found wanting for, until the birth of mining, such objects or materials as could be accumulated in sufficient quantity to serve as money were more or less perishable and, therefore, variable in volume and value.

The impelling force that caused gold and silver to be accepted as money lies in the fact that of all material things, gold and silver alone are imperishable and indestructible. Because of their ready divisibility, noncorrosiveness, and susceptibility to luster, gold and silver are peculiarly adapted for coining into money, the purpose for which they were intended. Rarest and most precious of all metals, their relative production down through the ages has been remarkably uniform, increasing in almost exact proportion with increases in population and commerce.

The best evidence that there will never be a surplus through overproduction is the report of the United States Bureau of the Mint, which shows the total world production since the discovery of America in 1492 to be only 1,500,000,000 ounces of gold and a trifle less than 18,000,000,000 ounces of silver.

CONFIDENCE IN THE INTEGRITY OF GOLD AND SILVER IS UNIVERSAL

No other measures of value have been so constant and dependable; and, as a result, men of all times and climes have had confidence in the integrity of gold and silver money; and in articles redeemable in gold and silver. This confidence has been strengthened by custom, tradition, and sentiment; and no one will deny that customs founded on tradition and sentiment are the most changeless and unchangeable things in the world.

There is ample evidence of this in the Orient and Middle East where, despite the cruel manipulations in the price of silver since it was demonetized in 1873, three-fifths of the people of the world have tenaciously clung to silver as their money. In setting up a world monetary system, the wishes and desires of three-fifths of the world's people cannot be ignored. An awakening Orient will not tolerate for long a continuation of a monetary system forced on them by western powers which, by permitting manipulations in the price of silver, has kept millions of people in poverty and economic chains.

UNITED STATES GREW AND PROSPERED UNDER BIMETALLISM

Bimetallism—the use of both gold and silver for money and monetary reserves—is not a new untried theory. Years of successful operation proved bimetallism to be the most just and perfect monetary system the world has ever known.

In 1793, our young Republic adopted bimetallism as its monetary policy and during the 80 years in which this policy was in operation, the United States experienced the most phenomenal growth in our entire national history. It was with this kind of money we carried our commerce to the seven seas, expanded the Original Thirteen Colonies into our present great Nation extending from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific Ocean and from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, adding the Louisiana Purchase, the Oregon Territory, California, Texas, and Alaska; settled our great West; expanded agriculture; explored and utilized some of our natural resources; developed many of our mines; built most of our railroads; and started the industrial development which has made us the envy of the world. Yes, we did pretty well with this kind of money.

It was not until silver was demonetized in 1873 that we were afflicted with major depressions like those of 1873 and 1893. Limited to gold as the sole monetary reserve, the population and commerce of the world increased so much faster than the production of gold, that currencies and credits were expanded all out of proportion to redeemable reserves. To circumvent economic laws, many nations resorted to cartels, monopolies, frozen credits, empire preferences, favored trade areas, and other stilts and crutches, only to have the world's economic structure collapes like a house of cards, in 1929. This unhealthy economic condition was responsible for both World Wars; for every war is, in essence, an economic war.

PRESENT LOW MONETARY RESERVES ARE INVITING DISASTER

With monetary reserves throughout the world averaging only half of what they should be, every thoughtful person must realize that silver should be joined with gold, at fixed and proper ratio, to supply the other half, if we are to escape a debacle many times as severe as that of 1929. It is trite to say: "All that is needed is confidence." But having said that, you have said nothing. You might better say—and with more fidelity: "All that is needed is credulity."

The bill introduced today is drawn to correct this desperate situation. It does not increase the value of gold; but merely adjusts the price of gold to bring it in conformity with the depreciated value of the dollar. Fifty-six dollars today is the equivalent of $20.67 prior to 1934—the price at which gold was pegged for 90 years—1844 to 1934. By accepting the price ratio of 16 to 1 which was fixed by the Congress in 1837, silver will have a price equivalent to $1.29 prior to 1934. The price ratio is presumed to represent the relative production of gold and silver, but since the true ratio is closer to 14 to 1, it may be developed in hearings before an appropriate congressional committee that the 14 to 1 ratio should be adopted.

NEED FOR SPECIAL CONGRESSIONAL MONETARY COMMITTEE

It is hoped that the Congress will create a special joint monetary committee with Members from both the House and Senate to consider this all-important matter and report back to the Congress at the earliest possible time. The one and only issue to be considered by such a committee should be a sound monetary system.

When, after thorough hearings, the proper prices for gold and silver have been agreed upon, these prices should be pegged by the method provided in this bill. By thus effectively pegging the prices of both metals, at fixed and proper ratio, the parity value of both will be maintained; and gold or silver money, or certificates redeemable in either, will be equally desirable. This will preclude any possibility for operation of the so-called Gresham law, which presupposes a preference by the people for one monetary metal over the other.

USE IS FIRST PREREQUISITE OF VALUE

The value of any commodity comes from the use that mankind makes of it. If we refused to use wheat for food and cotton for clothing—the purposes for which they were evidently provided by a Divine Providence—they would have little or no value. The same is true of gold and silver.

There are many other compelling reasons why the United States should remonetize silver. These will be covered under the heading: "The case for silver."

MONEY MAKES THE MARE GO

Time and space do not permit me to discuss the question of money as thoroughly as I should like, but to those who have a real interest in this subject—and everyone should have—I recommend the reading of the Government printed document titled: "Money Makes the Mare Go" by John McBride, former Clerk of the House Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. It thoroughly covers the subject and is written in simple, understandable language. Referring to this book, Frank C. Waldrop, editor of the Washington Times-Herald, under date of November 13, 1947, said:

> Next to life itself nothing is so essential to mankind as money. * * *
> It begins to be time, therefore, for us to put a little effort into thinking about the nature of money. What is it and why is it so powerful? * * *

Some very fascinating evidence on that subject has just come to hand from Capitol Hill. * * *

It is not dull reading. Quite the opposite. * * * The title is "Money Makes the Mare Go." You can argue with Mr. McBride if you like. * * * But it is hard for anybody to argue that the monetary history of the past 20 years reflects much credit on the brains of the people who have claimed custody over the valuation of money.

It is plain to anybody who has been to the grocery store lately that something is wrong with the alleged experts' management of money and has been for some time.

The report to the House Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures tells you some facts about that in language anybody can understand. It is worth reading and * * * items from it will be reported in this space from time to time just as reminders, but nothing less than the full item will really do justice to your interest, if you have interest.

And if you don't, then quit kicking at prices, taxes, and other consequences of the Government's money management.

And it's no good pointing at somebody else. We people in the United States of America are responsible for the kind of government we get.

Rev. Henry F. Wolfe, of Charleston, S. C., in commenting on this book in the Charleston News and Courier, November 23, 1947, said:

SOUND MONEY: A CURB ON WAR

If it were possible to make a book on money a best seller so that everybody would be reading it and discussing it, wars and depressions would be eliminated. All wars are economic. All depressions are the result of unsound economic and monetary policies. * * *

Sound money is the first requisite for peace and economic recovery. * * * If our congressional leaders in Washington would appropriate money to put this book into the hands of every honest-to-God American * * * inflation, depression, and world war III would disappear overnight. * * * After you read it, you will be a red-hot American and you will do your best to get your congressional leaders to get this book published and placed in the hands of all Americans.

THE CASE FOR SILVER

Probably the most widely accepted canard about silver is that somewhere there is a great horde of this metal ready to flow into the United States Treasury once the price is increased. During the debate on the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, it was gloomily predicted by the opponents of this measure that if we increased the price of silver to 45 cents per ounce, the flow of silver into this country would bankrupt the United States Treasury. But despite the fact that we purchased all silver offered at this advanced price, we were able to buy less than 3,000,000,000 ounces, and on this the Treasury already has made a profit of $1,500,000,000.

Just what are the facts about silver? The records of the United States Bureau of the Mint show that during the 456 years that have elapsed since the discovery of America in 1942, the total world production of silver has been a trifle less than 18,000,000,000 ounces. Making allowances for losses and industrial uses, there is probably not more than 9,000,000,000 ounces available for monetary purposes in the entire world. Approximately one-third of this is owned by the United States Treasury and most of the balance is coined into money in other countries, principally in the Orient.

An advance in the price of silver, as proposed in my bill, would not tempt other countries to melt down these coins for their silver content and sell the silver to us because, once the price of silver is pegged, their silver coins will have a value equal to their silver content. Nor would the owners of silver jewelry, silverware, and silver plate be tempted to melt down such articles for their silver content for sale to the United States Treasury; for at hearings on the Green bill before the Senate Appropriations Committee in 1946, it was shown that the retail prices on such silver articles were from 5 to 25 times the value of their silver content.

While silver has other industrial uses in such articles as moving-picture films and electrical appliances, the amount and value are infinitesimal when compared with the selling prices of such articles. A typical example is the thermostatic control used in refrigerators and automobile heaters. Approximately 3 cents worth of silver is required in the manufacture of each of these thermostats; and if the cost of the silver in each were increased from 3 cents to 10 cents or 12 cents, it would have small effect, indeed, on the cost of a $200 refrigerator or a $2,000 automobile. Surely the industrial users of silver are more concerned about sound money and a sound economy than they are about any temporary profits that might accrue to them through buying silver below the cost of production.

In the event that silver is monetized at the price suggested in my bill, it is doubtful that we would be called upon to buy as much as 1,000,000,000 ounces of foreign silver, but if we do find it necessary to buy any foreign silver, we will be reimbursed many times by the advance in the price of gold, since we own approximately 60 percent of the world's gold supply, most of which was purchased from other countries.

A return to the single gold standard would be most unfair to the United States and other countries of North and South America because the United States produces only 11 percent of the world's gold, and North and South America combined produce only 30 percent of the world's gold. Most of the balance is produced in Russia and the British Empire. South Africa alone produces approximately 40 percent. The reverse is true of silver, for North and South America produce 70 percent of the world's silver; and the remonetization of silver would eliminate the unfair discrimination against the Western Hemisphere, which exists so long as gold is the sole monetary reserve.

We have heard a lot about the administration's good-neighbor policy but recent events in Panama and Bogotá prove that our relations with Latin America leave much to be desired. Our national safety depends on the maintenance of friendly relations with our neighbors in North and South America; and nothing will cement the ties of friendship with Canada and Latin America so much as the adoption of a sound monetary system and the remonetization of silver. Our international do-gooders and "fugitives from the New Deal" have blundered about in South America, interfering with the political and economic life of the people and consorting with those considered subversives by South American governments. With a vulgar display of wealth, they have poured gifts of the American taxpayers' money into these countries in a way to offend the people. Latin Americans are a proud people and resent interference in their internal affairs, and gifts that put them in the role of mendicants.

Latin-American countries have almost unlimited natural resources awaiting development and if we give them a sound monetary system, they will not only be able to take care of themselves and develop a sound economy of their own, but will supply us with one of the best markets in the world for heavy machinery and equipment necessary to develop their natural resources.

There is the opportunity for similar trade in China and other parts of the Orient and Middle East where silver always has been and always will be their money. The people in those areas dislike and distrust paper money. They want hard money. Gold, because of its high price cannot be minted in coins of small enough denominations to suit their economy. Bleeding hearts that spout about political equality for all peoples while fostering economic and monetary policies which keep half the people of the world in economic chains are the rankest kind of hypocrites. Political freedom without economic freedom is an empty shell. If we would cement our friendship with Canada and Latin America, and save the Orient from communism, economic chaos, and anarchy, we will give them a sound monetary system. The United States is the one country in the world capable of doing this. Will we accept our responsibility, or will we follow the will-o'-the-wisp fallacies of those inoculated with foreign "isms," ideologies, and one-world-itis?

Based on the above facts alone, every loyal American should be in favor of bimetallism. But there is another equally important reason why the people of the United States should be wholeheartedly in favor of bimetallism and an equitable price for silver.

Silver is the magic metal—the Aladdin's lamp—which can quadruple our recoverable mineral wealth, make possible the profitable production here at home of 99 percent of our mineral requirements, including strategic minerals, and bring to the United States the greatest era of prosperity that we have ever known.

Silver's magic stems from the fact that it is largely a byproduct of other metals. Ninety percent of the silver produced in the United States comes as a byproduct of such base-metal ores as lead, copper, and zinc, and, in many instances, it is the silver content in these ores that makes it possible to mine them.

Few people realize the effect of byproducts on our domestic economy. But for the fact that there is a ready sale for bran and other wheat byproducts, the cost of producing flour for bread would be much greater than it is now, and if it were not for the fact that there is a ready market for hides and other cattle byproducts, the cost of beef would be much higher.

If remonetized and priced at proper ratio to gold, silver will do exactly the same thing in keeping down the cost of producing lead, copper, and zinc that bran and hides do in keeping down the cost of producing flour and beefsteaks. Silver is just as essential to our monetary system as hides are to the manufacture of shoes, and it would be no more ridiculous to throw away the hides and go barefooted than to refuse to use silver for the purpose for which it is needed.

In our Western States are millions of tons of so-called low-grade copper, lead, and zinc ores which cannot be mined now except with the aid of Government subsidy payments. Many of these ores have a silver content of from 1 to 5 ounces of silver to the ton; and if silver were remonetized, these properties would go into profitable production without subsidiary aid.

There are also many instances where, in operating mines, low-grade lead, copper, and zinc ores with a small silver content are abandoned in the mine or thrown on the dump and their values lost forever, whereas this wealth could be saved for our Nation, if the price of silver was what it should be.

It is axiomatic that when the price of silver goes up, the prices of lead, copper, and zinc go down; and this reduction in the prices of these essential metals benefits manufacturers and ultimate consumers alike. With silver remonetized and priced at the proper ratio to gold, many of our idle mines will go into production and thousands of new mining properties will be opened up.

The remonetization of silver, and the resultant necessary increase in price that would come from joining silver with gold to supply adequate monetary reserves, can in no way be construed as a subsidy to the mining industry. The world needs—must have—a sound monetary system; and history and experience proves that bimetallism is the most perfect monetary system the world has ever known. Not only will it cost us nothing, but it will add immeasurably to our national wealth and national income. In view of the many advantages that will accrue to the United States by the adoption of a sound monetary system, it is beyond all comprehension how any intelligent, patriotic American can oppose such a policy.

IMMEDIATE STABILIZATION OF DOLLAR MOST URGENT

As previously mentioned, the bill introduced today does not increase the value of gold but adjusts the price of gold to the present depreciated value of the dollar. Nor does this bill attempt to restore to the dollar its pre-1934 value, or purchasing power; but to peg its value where it is now so that it will not continue to depreciate. The dollar is now losing a minimum of 1 percent a month of its purchasing power, and so long as that condition exists, there will be more and more strikes and labor stoppages; buying and selling will continue to be on a day-to-day basis; and no matter how acute the housing shortage, the situation will not improve until the value of the dollar is stabilized and builders have a constant, dependable measure of material and construction costs.

Once the dollar has been unhinged from value, it is practically impossible to restore its original purchasing power without wrecking our entire economy. For example, it now requires $2.71 to buy what could be bought for $1 prior to 1934. That means the dollar would have to be increased in value 271 percent to restore its pre-1934 purchasing power. This would be fine for those with plenty of money in the banks and no debts; but it would be mighty hard on the debtors since, in effect, their debts would be proportionately increased. Even to restore the dollar to its 1945 value would mean increasing it 60 percent. To realize what that would mean, take the example of a veteran who recently bought a home and assumed a mortgage of $10,000. In effect that mortgage would be increased to the equivalent of $16,000 based on the current value of the dollar. The best and fairest method is to peg the value of the dollar where it is now; and that is what this bill proposes to do.

WHY THE STOCK MARKET IS NO LONGER A BAROMETER OF AMERICAN BUSINESS

The present danger is doubly acute because of inconsistencies in our monetary policy. When the dollar was depreciated 41 percent in 1934, the price of gold was advanced from $20.67 to $35 per ounce to compensate for this change in dollar value. To be consistent, the price of gold should have been advanced to $56 per ounce when the dollar was depreciated another 37½ percent in 1945. But despite the fact that the enactment of Public Law 84—1945—caused gold prices in other parts of the world to advance to as high as $110 per ounce, we still permit foreign nations to buy our gold at $35 per ounce. This means that foreign nations are buying gold at the lowest price in history, for $35 today has a purchasing power equivalent to only $12.95 prior to 1934, when the price of gold was pegged at $20.67 per ounce.

That is why you hear so much about the dollar shortage in Europe and other parts of the world. Thank God there is a dollar shortage in other countries; otherwise they would drain our Treasury of gold at much below its real value. However, the vaults of New York banks and insurance companies are bulging with synthetic 37 cent dollars; and if we are simple enough to take the advice of the 42 economists who urge a return to the single gold standard and the redemption of currency in gold at $35 per ounce, we can expect to have our Treasury pillaged of its gold overnight.

So long as the present situation exists, foreign nations—and international bankers in collusion with foreign nations—can raid our stock market any time they choose, make tax-free profits, force down the prices of our choicest stocks and bonds and pick them up at bargain prices, and thereby gradually gain control of American industry. No wonder the stock market is no longer a barometer of American business and that industrial stocks are selling much below their real value. For example, based on the present value of the dollar, United States Steel stock is selling for the equivalent of $27.75 prior to 1934.

For the reason mentioned above, there is a dollar shortage in other countries, but the shortage of purchasing power in Europe is not nearly so acute as has been represented. Right now European investments and dollar credits in this country total $26,000,000,000, and much of this is British capital. There is plenty of money in the British Empire to rehabilitate England's decadent industries, but the owners of this money refuse to risk it under the Socialist Labor government which is nationalizing and socializing England's industries. While British investors are picking up our choicest industrial stocks and bonds at bargain prices, the administration—in league with Republican internationalists—is spending billions of the American taxpayers' money to bolster up England's Socialist regime.

Recent byelections in England prove that a majority of the English people are opposed to their Socialist government, and undoubtedly this Government would have fallen but for the $3,750,000,000 we loaned it. Thus, we are clearly interfering in the internal affairs of the English people and gaining the enmity of a majority of them.

Scarcely a week passes that the British-owned Lever Bros. does not buy another soap, toothpaste, or cosmetic company. Meanwhile, we have dismantled 14 soap plants in Germany. Could it be that this is to provide a profitable market for Lever Bros. soap under ERP? Be that as it may, much of the support for the European recovery program has been secured by appealing to the larceny of those who hope to profit from this international pork barrel at the expense of the American taxpayers.

PUTTING THE HEAT ON CONGRESS

One of the stock arguments of the proponents of ERP is that it is necessary to protect our own economy. By what sort of reasoning can it be shown that our economy will be benefited by giving away $17,000,000,000 of our money and resources? For 30 years we have steadily lost money on our trade with Europe; and there is nothing to indicate that the future promises anything better.

Proponents of the Marshall plan tell us that the sum of $17,000,000,000 was arrived at only after the most careful and painstaking study by the experts of the President's Economic Committee, the Harriman committee, and the Krug committee. But more than a year ago Ben Cohen, then Under Secretary of State, gave exactly the same figures in a speech in Los Angeles. This forces one to the inevitable conclusion that they first decided how much the American people could be taken for, and then set up the committees to justify the take. But, folks, that is only the beginning. They are now planning to add a new lend-lease program; and Paul Hoffman, the new Administrator of ERP, was not warm in his chair when he said "more money was needed."

If you want to get the real low-down on Mr. Paul Hoffman, read the review of Jobs and Markets and The Elements of Economics in Public Document No. 94829.

Then the war scare, whipped up to put this program over, means additional billions of dollars for defense. General Marshall says our defense force is a hollow shell, although we spent $10,500,000,000 on national defense the past year. This is more than one-quarter of the entire national budget. Just how many additional billions of dollars will it require to fill that empty shell?

Five billion dollars have just been added to next year's defense program without an argument and yet when a courageous House Appropriations Committee dared to trim $1,000,000,000 from ERP, the internationalists of both parties let out a roar of opposition heard around the world. Would it not be wise to stop long enough to take inventory before pursuing further the mad course that leads to national bankruptcy?

HOW LONG CAN OUR ECONOMY CARRY MOUNTING TAX BURDENS?

In 1939, taxes took $1 out of every $13 of our national income. Today, taxes take $1 out of every $4.

For 14 years, we have been living on money borrowed against resources accumulated over the preceding 140 years. World War II cost us approximately $330,000,000,000. Since 1940, we have poured $73,000,000,000 into Europe. Our national debt is $255,000,000,000, but this does not take into account veterans' pensions and other commitments, which makes the total obligation of our Government approximately $425,000,000,000. This means a debt of $3,000 for every man, woman, and child in the United States; or a debt of $12,000 for every family of four in the United States. Few of us are in a position to pay these debts. And while the Government can borrow more money from the people and print more paper currency, just how long can our economy bear these burdens; and just what will the dollar be worth unless we take drastic steps to remedy this situation?

Every time we ignore the admonition of George Washington—to stay out of foreign entanglements—we get into trouble. Yet right now we are considering a political, economic, and military alliance with western European nations. Is this the entering wedge for a one-world superstate to which we will surrender our national sovereignty?

Many Members of Congress reluctantly admit they voted for ERP because a vote against it might be interpreted as supporting the Stalin-Wallace-Marcantonio program. Wallace is not opposing ERP to save the American taxpayers' money. He advocates turning $50,000,000,000 over to the United Nations for distribution so that Russia will get the lion's share. A sound monetary system will do more for European recovery than all the billions of dollars we have poured into Europe in the past, or may pour into Europe in the future. This is not a statement made at random. To substantiate it, let us briefly review the French situation:

France is the most self-sufficient country in Europe, capable of producing 98 percent of her requirements; but because of a lack of confidence in their country's currency, the French people have hoarded away more than $2,000,000,000 in gold. If we will but give ourselves and the world a sound monetary system, that hidden hoard of $2,000,000,000 will flow into the Bank of France and serve as a monetary reserve for $5,000,000,000 of sound, dependable, redeemable currency; and France will be able to take care of herself without aid from us. A similar situation exists throughout the world. Once a sound monetary system is adopted, from $12,000,000,000 to $15,000,000,000 in gold and silver will come out of hiding; and by using this gold and silver as monetary reserves, most countries will be in a position to issue sufficient sound currency to take care of themselves. But for the sake of argument, let us presume that after a sound monetary system has been put into operation, the various countries of the world still require $10,000,000,000 to put their economic houses in order. Instead of loaning them $10,000,000,000, it would be necessary to loan them only $4,000,000,000 in gold and silver, against which they could issue $10,000,000,000 in sound, stable, dependable currency. And instead of pouring the money down "operation rat hole," as we are doing at present, we would stand a reasonably good chance to get this $4,000,000,000 back, for once currency has been stabilized, economic recovery throughout the world will be rapid.

OTHER IMPEDIMENTS TO EUROPEAN RECOVERY

Aside from the lack of a sound monetary system, the two principal impediments to European recovery are the sadistic Morgenthau plan, which would make a cow pasture of Germany, and the Socialist government of England, which, in its administration of the German Ruhr, is more concerned with socializing and nationalizing the Ruhr than in producing coal and steel. Switzerland, only 70 miles from the Ruhr, where there is an abundance of coal, is forced to import coal from the United States; and we have even sent Pennsylvania coal to Newcastle, a performance considered for more than a century as the acme of the ridiculous.

Most European countries have their production up to 90 percent or more of what it was in 1939; but Germany's production is less than 50 percent of what it was in 1939. If that affected only Germany, it would not be so serious, but aside from France, practically every country in Europe was largely dependent on German trade before the war. For example, 28.8 percent of Greek imports came from Germany, and Greece's exports to Germany were in approximate balance. The German market took nearly all of Greece's export tobacco crop, and the loss of that market is a major factor in Greece's economic paralysis. The Netherlands got 21 percent of her imports from Germany; Denmark, 24 percent; Belgium and Luxemburg, 11 percent; Norway, 16.9 percent; Sweden, 21 percent; Switzerland, 23 percent; and Italy, 18.6 percent. Are the American taxpayers expected to supply these imports for free while some gloat and others profit because Germany is prostrate?

WHY THE DIFFERENCE IN TREATMENT OF GERMANY AND ITALY?

It is difficult to justify the difference in our treatment of Italy and Germany. Both countries were led into a war of aggression by power-mad dictators; and Americans killed by Italians are just as dead as those killed by Germans. Hitler never could have risen to power but for the manipulation of a debauched currency; and it was the pillaging of the German people through the manipulating and debauching of their currency that tempted them to follow the leadership of the demoniacally fanatical paperhanger.

To pursue a postwar policy that deprives the German people of the means of supporting themselves, and prevents the economic recovery of Europe; while placing the burden of feeding Germany and much of Europe on the back of the American taxpayers, is certainly going to the extreme to gratify the sadistic tendencies of those who would out-Herod Hitler.

Communism, fascism, and all other forms of absolutism come into being and are sustained by a debauched currency. They cannot compete or survive in a free world that operates under a sound monetary system. In view of these incontrovertible facts, is it not time that we abandon the course that is leading to a condition worse than war—unbridled anarchy throughout the world—and adopt a sound monetary system which is the first requisite of world peace, economic stability, and orderly self-government?

SOUND MONEY OR FIAT MONEY

The instability of world currencies is responsible for the economic chaos that exists throughout the world today. Some may attempt to deny this statement but none can refute it. In many countries, all limits on the amount of currency issued have been removed; and while the United States has not yet gone to that extreme, we are rapidly approaching it. The redeemability, which acted as a final check, is gone; and without that, the other limitations can be easily overridden.

Currency that is not redeemable is fiat money; and the only way that fiat money or managed currencies can work is through collectivism, or completely government-controlled economy. This means complete coercion of individuals, controlled production, rationing and price fixing; and that is just exactly what the Administration is advocating and asking. That is not progress but reaction.

VAST GULF EXISTS BETWEEN AMERICAN ECONOMY AND EUROPEAN ECONOMY

Before we permit ourselves to be lured by the siren call of those who would have us surrender our national sovereignty and accept a satrapy in either a superfinancial controlled state or a superpolitical state, it would be well to recognize the great gulf that exists between the American way of life and the European way of life. Europe always has suffered under a semifeudal monopolistic private capitalism that controlled production, distribution, wages, and prices. In many of the European countries as few as 4,000 families, associations, and cartels owned or controlled 90 percent of the land and wealth. When these conditions caused the people to overthrow their government, it was but a step from private monopoly to state monopoly. But while they changed masters, they did not change systems. A minority group was still in control. Europeans always have lived under a controlled economy and know no other way. It never occurred to them to try free enterprise or grant the people freedom of opportunity. True, some large estates were divided among the peasants, but only to have their crops confiscated by the state. When this change in masters failed to bring about the promised millennium, the leaders explained their failures by contending that Marxism could succeed only if the entire world were brought under subjection and the wealth of the world divided: "To each according to his needs." Not to each according to what he merits, but "To each according to his needs." Of course, the masters of the controlled state would be the ones to decide how the wealth was to be divided.

SOFTENING US UP FOR THE KILL

Since the international banker racketeers operating under the semifeudal, monopolistic, private capitalism of Europe had pillaged not only Europe but most of the world as well, the choicest plum left to pick was the United States. Men of the type of Prof. Harold Laski and the late Lord John Maynard Keynes were sent over to the United States to inoculate our so-called intellectuals with the new ideology so they, in turn, could "soften us up for the kill." That could be best accomplished by debauching our currency and draining away our wealth so that we no longer would be able to consume the major portion of our own production. This would force our manufacturer to seek foreign markets, and consequently, they no longer would be interested in a protective tariff.

The international bankers were quick to recognize that such a program was playing right into their hands since foreign goods then would flow into free-trade America to pay interest on their foreign bonds. So they allied themselves with the motley crew of left-wingers, fellow travelers, Communists, and so-called liberals who went to make up the New Deal. Now that the international bankers of one-world persuasion are in the driver's seat and consider some of their erstwhile associates a liability, they have sent out the new barefoot boy of Wall Street to place all blame for present world conditions on the Communists, while they gather in the shekels.

COMMUNISM IS WORLD MENACE BUT NOT THE ONLY MENACE

Communism is unquestionably a world menace but if we accept the misleading propaganda that the Communists are our only enemy, the other conspirators will be free to pillage our country and gain control of our industry and commerce.

Today a mighty conflict rages throughout the entire world between two entirely different systems of government. One is a free economy—the American way of life—with freedom of action and opportunity for the individual. The other is a regimented economy—the totalitarian state—with slavery of the individual to the state.

We must surrender the illusion that there can be a common understanding between such contradictory systems of human relationships. If communism were the only enemy, it would be reasonably easy to combat. The Communist point of view was definitely stated by Nicolai Lenin, years ago, when he said:

As long as capitalism remains we cannot live in peace. In the end, one or the other will triumph—a funeral requiem will be sung either over the Soviet Republic or over world capitalism.

Soviet Russia knows that it must destroy us, emulate us, or face revolution at home. This revolution in Russia and the Balkans is nearer than most of us realize.

But there is another enemy more dangerous and powerful than communism, which, while using communism when it suits its purpose, adheres to the philosophy of Cecil Rhodes, who visualized a great superfinancial state of cartels and monopolies in the hands of a few individuals or groups which would control money, credit, production, distribution, and prices. Not only does this enemy visualize a superfinancial state, but it is mighty close to achieving it through the Bretton Woods monetary agreements, which set up the International Bank and the World Monetary Fund. Both of these institutions are controlled by debtor nations; and since debtor nations are at the mercy of the international bankers, this means that the international bankers are in control.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TRAGEDY

It is a tragedy that the American people consider big business as a composite of American capitalism, American industry, and international bankers. As a result, our industrialists and our capitalistic system are often blamed for sins committed by the international bankers.

Our domestic economy always has been entirely different from old-world economy. Instead of a monopolistic private capitalism, where a few thousand families or associations control most of the wealth, we have a people's capitalism with most of our wealth distributed among millions of our people. Even the giant corporations have millions of individual stockholders.

This is why the group which gained political control of our Government in 1933 were unable to establish complete economic control. With our wealth so widely distributed, they had to use a different technique than their European mentors. They first debauched our currency and then started confiscating our wealth by a system of tax and tax, spend and spend, lend and lend.

HOW OUR ECONOMY DIFFERS FROM THAT OF OTHER NATIONS

Foreign industrial nations imported most of their raw materials at the lowest possible prices, with little regard to the economic status of those from whom they bought, and then manufactured or fabricated these raw materials as cheaply as possible. They had little incentive to pay high wages to their own people because their products were manufactured chiefly for the world's markets and not for home consumption.

Our economy has been exactly the reverse. We produced 97 percent of our raw materials right here at home, the products of our farms, mines, and forests, and instead of shipping the major portion of our manufactured goods half way around the world, we consumed 94 percent of them right here at home. Our manufacturers and fabricators of raw materials had a direct incentive to pay the highest possible wages and the highest possible prices for raw materials because the American workman, the American farmer, and other producers of raw materials were their best customers. This brought about a more equitable distribution of wealth and gave the American people the highest standard of living in the world.

By encouraging free competitive enterprise production was increased and prices kept at a minimum, and to protect free enterprise from unfair trade practices and monopoly antitrust laws were enacted. Unfortunately, under the regimentation, restrictions, and controls of the past 15 years, antitrust laws have not been and could not be adequately enforced, and as a consequence, many small enterprises have been put out of business or absorbed by larger corporations. This drift toward monopoly is a dangerous threat to our economy and must be stopped by strict enforcement of the antitrust laws. There is no place under our system of government for regimentation, controls, cartels, or monopolies. They are the trappings of the totalitarian state.

Recognizing the incontrovertible fact that free trade is possible only between nations and peoples who enjoy the same standard of living; and that free trade would not bring the other 94 percent of the world's population up to our standard of living but would drag us down to theirs, we protected our home market for our home producers with a protective tariff.

The tariff not only protected labor and industry from the competition of goods from low-wage countries, but it created a great pool of purchasing power—a people's capitalism—from which industry and new enterprises could be financed without the aid of international bankers.

It was this great pool of purchasing power distributed in the hands of millions of our people that made mass production possible, for mass production is possible only where there is mass consumption. That is why other countries have not attempted mass production; their people do not have the purchasing power to sustain it.

AGRICULTURE AND MINING FORM THE ARCH THAT SUPPORTS OUR ENTIRE ECONOMY, AND THE TARIFF IS THE KEYSTONE IN THAT ARCH

Agriculture and mining—the production of raw materials—form the arch which supports our domestic economy; and the keystone in that arch is the protective tariff. It is axiomatic that if the keystone is removed, the arch will crumble. Yet we are permitting internationalists and one-worlders, through the operation of the Reciprocal Trade Act and a debauched currency, not only to permit foreign imports to come in free but, in many instances, to subsidize them. If we do not restore these tariffs, the American standard of living will fall to the world level.

Why should not we protect our own market? We took it from no one. We created it ourselves with only 6 percent of the world's land area and 6 percent of the world's population. Other nations have the remaining 94 percent of the world in which to create sound economies of their own.

It is no mere figure of speech to say that agriculture and mining form the arch which supports our entire economy. The annual income of agriculture and mining is always one-fifth of our national income. Whenever anything happens to reduce the income of agriculture and mining, the national income is reduced 5 times as much; that is to say, for every $1,000,000,000 of loss to agriculture and mining, the national income loses $5,000,000,000. This follows just as surely as night follows day.

We are pursuing a most dangerous course which is bound to be reflected by a sharp drop in farm income. Normally, 70 percent of farm production—grains and grasses— is fed to livestock and thus converted into beef, mutton, pork, hides, wool, etc. Because of the huge exports of farm products and the resultant high prices, the number of cattle in the United States has been reduced by more than 10,000,000 head in the past 3 years; and the number of stock sheep in this country is the lowest since 1867. There is every indication that this year's crops in Europe and other parts of the world will be the highest in more than a decade. When Europe no longer needs our grain or we no longer can afford to give Europe this grain, we will have a huge surplus of grain and feed because the livestock that would normally consume it will be dead.

The resultant drop in farm income will be reflected by a drop in our national income.

The squeeze is also being put on our domestic mining industry; and many of our mines are idle. Unless something is done to correct this situation very soon, agriculture and mining are in for a big slump not unlike that which followed World War I. Sound money—bimetallism—and a protective tariff are the only things that will prevent such a catastrophe.

THE SOURCE OF MOST OF OUR TROUBLES

Most of our troubles stem from the fact that those who have been running our Government for the past 15 years have been trying to apply Old World isms and ideologies to our economy. The starry-eyed Galahads, who took over in 1933, called their program the New Deal because they thought they had discovered something new in Government. They ridiculed the Constitution as old and obsolete, prattled much about "the brave new world of the future"; "the dawn of a new era"; "the era of the common man"; "dynamic democracy"; and "democracy in action." Beware of men using such phrases. They are either a little cuckoo or demagogic opportunists. Their conception of democracy is to force on the people the kind of government they, in their ego, think is good for them, whether the people want it or not. Their entire philosophy was aptly stated by Harry Hopkins:

> The people are too damn dumb to know what is good for them.

There never was anything new about the so-called New Deal. New Dealism differs not in kind but only in degree from socialism, communism, collectivism, and other forms of absolutism—all of which are thousands of years old—and range all the way from absolute monarchies and the bureaucratic controls of Soviet Russia to England's socialism and the "managed economy and managed currency" of the New Deal.

Double talk has developed into a fine art. The most efficient technique to this end is to use the old words but change their meaning. The two most misused and abused words in the dictionary are "liberal" and "democracy." Every crackpot in the country calls himself a liberal and the thing he espouses democracy.

A United States Senator went into rhetorical rhapsodies telling how he saw democracy bursting into full bloom under Tito; and even Communist Russia has taken to calling herself a democracy.

Thank God, this country is a Republic and not an absolute democracy. For any government that has no restraining influence other than the unbridled will of a mere majority is tyranny.

The Constitution of the United States insures to everyone within our borders certain inalienable rights that even a majority cannot take away; and it is ironical that those who would destroy our system of Government are the most insistent for their rights under the Constitution. Beware of those who pretend to support the Constitution while advocating the destruction of capitalism, which Webster's dictionary describes as: "An economic system which rests upon private ownership of property, the conduct of business for private profit, and freedom of individual initiative in business; opposite of socialism." When they destroy American capitalism, they destroy the American system of government. Probably in their ego, they visualize a benevolent despotism in which they will be the king pins; but they fail to understand that despotism, which has a way of beginning with benevolence, usually ends by being merely despotic.

THE ONE WORLDERS ARE ON THE MARCH

One worlders arrayed in top hat, white tie, and tails, travel up and down the land exploiting the atom bomb and the fictitious power of Russia in the hope of frightening our people into surrendering our national sovereignty and accepting a vassalage in a world superstate in which we will be outnumbered and outvoted 15 to 1. They are just as much a threat to our American way of life as the Communists or the international banker-racketeers.

The two worst offenders among the one worlders are Robert M. Hutchins, chancelor of the University of Chicago, and Owen J. Roberts, former Justice of the United States Supreme Court, who seem to be incurably afflicted with "degree-ego-itis" and a delusion of omniscience. To arrogate to themselves the right to conspire to reduce the United States to a satrapy in a world government and thereby make a scrap of paper of the Constitution, which they have sworn to uphold, suggests an exaggerated ego and a crass conceit not unlike that of Dr. Alan Nunn May who, in seeking to justify his betrayal of the atomic-bomb secrets of Canada, said to the court:

> I felt that this was a contribution I could make to the safety of mankind.

It is gratifying to note that Mr. Justice Oliver made this fitting rejoinder:

> Alan Nunn May, I have listened with some slight surprise to the picture of you as a man of honor who has done only what you believed to be right. I do not take that view of you at all. How any man in your position could have had the crass conceit, let alone the wickedness, to arrogate to himself the decision of a matter of this sort, when you yourself had given a written understanding not to do it, and knew it was one of your country's most precious secrets—that you could have done this is a dreadful thing.

A one-world superstate, based on universal suffrage, like that of the World Charter prepared by Mr. Hutchins and his associates, would inevitably degenerate into a world dictatorship more dangerous and powerful than anything envisaged by Hitler. Based on population, the control of a one-world government would go to Soviet Russia and her Asiatic stooges.

Reference to Messrs. Hutchins and Roberts is made only to show that those inoculated with foreign ideologies or obsessed with ideas destructive to our American way of life are not all Communists. They run the gamut of many so-called "intellectuals," self-designated "liberals," various types of New Dealers and fellow travelers, and hundreds of "front" organizations, with deceptive names and concealed objectives.

It is a serious reflection on the judgment of many leaders of free enterprise that they have contributed hundreds of thousands of dollars to these "front" organizations, most of which are trying to hobble or destroy free enterprise. This is because they are permitted to deduct such contributions from their income-tax returns. While many tax-exempt contributions serve worthy purposes, on the whole they do more harm than good.

Our tax laws should be amended so that the full tax goes to the Government. Then pseudo-philanthropists would have to make such donations out of their own pockets and not out of the pockets of Uncle Sam. As a consequence, they would be more careful about investigating the purposes and objectives of organizations to which they are urged to make donations. The total over-all reduction in taxes made possible by such an amendment to our tax laws would be astounding.

IS POVERTY RESPONSIBLE FOR COMMUNISM?

The American people have been propagandized into believing that poverty is the cause for communism, and that if we just pour enough of the American taxpayers' money into poverty-stricken areas of the world, communism will vanish—presto. Was it poverty that made Communists out of the $100,000 a year Hollywood writers? Communism comes from "a limp in the head" rather than from an emptiness in the purse. Nowhere is poverty more prevalent than in China yet the Chinese Nationalist Government has consistently fought communism for 20 years.

The 400,000,000 people of China must have Manchuria's raw materials and water power if they are to develop a stable economy; and since we were a party to robbing them of Manchuria, it is our duty to see that Manchuria is returned to them. That does not mean risking the life of a single American soldier. China has the manpower. All Chiang Kai-shek needs is equipment and supplies. The rice and minerals of Korea are also essential to a sound economy in eastern Asia, and the Koreans should have a government free of Communist domination.

FUGITIVES FROM THE NEW DEAL

The task of the Chinese Nationalist Government has been made more difficult by New Deal appointees, holding lush jobs in the Orient, who persist in calling Chinese Communists agrarian reformers although the Chinese Communists frankly admit they are part and parcel of the world revolution. In Korea, where these New Dealers are contemptuously referred to as fugitives from the New Deal, their meddling has caused the Koreans to hate us after 40 months of occupation more than they hated the Japanese after 40 years.

The people of the Orient were interested observers of our stay in the Philippines, saw us raise the Filipinos to the highest standard of living in the entire Orient, and then give them their independence. As a result, our prestige in the Orient was higher than that of any other nation; but as a result of New Deal fumbling we are fast losing that prestige.

Another fallacious argument in favor of the United Nations and world government is that when all people know and understand each other they will not fight each other. Yet some of the cruelest and most ruthless wars in history have been civil wars where both sides talked the same language and knew all about each other.

NOW IS THE TIME TO THINK STRAIGHT, TALK STRAIGHT, AND HOLD FAST TO THE THINGS WE KNOW TO BE TRUE

We might just as well face the fact that we live in an age of treason, conspiracy, and double-talk. Unquestionably, most of those inoculated with foreign isms and ideologies, and their deluded followers, are sincere in their convictions. But among them are a few with treason in their hearts, conspiracy in their minds, and double-talk in their mouths, who have embraced the immoral doctrine that "the end justifies the means" and who recognize that: "When engaged in performing a discreditable action, there is nothing so advantageous as to utter loudly virtuous sentiments."

Of all the crimes they have committed against the United States, probably the worst is the twisting and corrupting of the minds of our children in schools and colleges, so that they humiliate, embarrass, and even betray their parents just as Hitler's youth and Stalin's youth betrayed their parents. But whether these expounders of false un-American doctrine are deliberate betrayers of their country and all mankind, or merely poor babes who were taken for a one-world ride at Bretton Woods, is beside the point. They must be weeded out from all positions in our Government, and schools and colleges should weed them out of positions of responsibility, for, as the man from Texas observed: "It makes little difference whether you are shot accidentally or on purpose, you are just as dead."

Two factors are largely responsible for the acceptance by many of our people of foreign isms and ideologies, and the idea of a world government. First and foremost of these is the outrageous propaganda of untruths and half-truths which have been disseminated largely by the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars of the American taxpayers' money. Second is the growing lack of confidence in our national leadership, particularly in foreign affairs. The most unpardonable and untruthful piece of propaganda disseminated to frighten the American people into sacrificing their freedom for a satrapy under a world government was the statement by Robert M. Hutchins, "that two atomic bombs exploded simultaneously would make the United States uninhabitable." The fact that most of our so-called scientists failed to refute this collossal falsehood suggests that they are a part of this one-world conspiracy. There is nothing in history to indicate that the adding of new weapons of war, or the outlawing of them, will end wars.

Half a century ago, during the Boer War, news reports out of South Africa carried the story that a single shell killed 500 soldiers; and that, therefore, the waging of future wars on a large scale was impossible because they would destroy civilization. Since that time, we have developed more and more deadly weapons and fought bigger and bigger wars.

WILL INTERNATIONAL CONTROL OF THE ATOMIC BOMB PREVENT WAR?

The atomic bomb is unquestionably a dangerous weapon, but by no means the most dangerous. It ranks fifth as a dangerous weapon; and any real scientist will agree that biological and bacterial warfare are more dangerous and deadly than atomic warfare. Nations did not refrain from using poison gas in World War II for humanitarian reasons; but because they feared retaliation. It is only fear of retaliation that will deter them from using the more deadly weapons referred to above.

There is just one way to stop war. Eliminate the causes of war. All wars are, in essence, economic wars. A sound world economy will bring an end to war just as it will bring an end to booms and busts and world-wide depressions. But you cannot have a sound world economy without a sound monetary system. First things must come first.

PEOPLE LACK CONFIDENCE IN OUR FOREIGN POLICY

The lack of confidence in our foreign policy comes from the growing conviction that those directing our so-called bipartisan foreign policy do not know whether they are on foot or on horseback; and that many of their decisions are governed by political expediency. Many things have happened in the past 3 years to strengthen this growing conviction. Of the billions of dollars of UNRRA supplies, more than half of them went to countries behind the iron curtain, and were used by those countries to build up their own war machines and equip guerrilla bands to prey on Greece. Then hundreds of millions of dollars of the American taxpayers' money was poured into Greeve to combat these selfsame guerrillas. A few months ago, it was decided to take Trieste away from Italy. Now they want to give it back. Heat was poured on the United Nations to force the partition of Palestine. Then it was decided to put Palestine back together again. By another flip-flop, the administration recognized Israel 20 minutes after the state had been formed. As a result of this off again, on again, gone again policy, thousands of Jews and Arabs have been killed. Three hundred million Moslems have been turned against the United States. Jerusalem, the Holy City of Jew, Gentile, and Moslem alike, has been desecrated, and many sacred shrines destroyed. We are sending oil badly needed at home to Europe because the chaos in Palestine has stopped oil shipments from the Middle East. We have played right into the hands of Russia, giving her a made-to-order excuse to send troops to protect the Jews just as she protected the Czechs and, incidentally, grab the great oil fields of the Middle East.

However, the administration is not alone to blame. The Republican members of the so-called bipartisan foreign policy committee must bear their full share of responsibility.

Neither party has a monopoly on opportunists. The Republican majority in the Senate has been sorely bedeviled by a small group of left-wing New Dealers of one-world persuasion, masquerading as Republicans; and because of their obstructive tactics, much meritorious legislation has been defeated. Some cynical Republican opportunists seem pleased to have these left wingers in the party on the presumption that in the coming campaign they can work both sides of the street; but it must be said to the credit of the great majority of the Republicans in Congress—they refuse to sacrifice principle for political expediency. Next week is the time for all real Americans to be on guard for whoever is nominated by the Republican convention will be the next President of the United States.

A DANGEROUS PRECEDENT

The political expediency that tempted the administration to turn the heat on the United Nations and force the partition of Palestine, set a most dangerous precedent. If the United Nations had a right to partition Palestine at the insistence of a minority, then it has the right to partition any country, including the United States. Armed with this right and the force to back it up, the United Nations could force the return to Mexico of California, New Mexico, Arizona, and Texas; and set up a Negro republic in the South, in accordance with the announced objectives of Soviet Russia.

Whatever our sympathies for any particular group, this is no time to let emotion or political expediency determine our action. The first concern of those entrusted to handle our foreign policy should be the safety of the United States and the security and welfare of the American people. American citizens who meddle in the affairs of foreign countries should be reminded that real Americans owe their full loyalty to only one country and have only one homeland—the United States of America.

HOLD FAST TO WHAT WE KNOW TO BE TRUE

The United States of America, starting from scratch 160 years ago, became in that short period of time the greatest Nation on earth—with more freedom, greater opportunity, and a higher standard of living for all of our people than exists anywhere else in the world.

Our system of government has worked so well that with only one-sixteenth of the world's population and land area, we are being called upon to feed millions of other people; and yet we find among us those who would have us follow strange isms, despite the fact that countries experimenting with such isms are coming to us for alms.

It was the proud boast of the makers of the Constitution of the United States that for the first time in history, the three departments of the Government: the legislative, the executive, and the judicial, were by that instrument made wholly independent of each other.

The Constitution grants to the Executive the right, and imposes it as a duty, to make to Congress recommendations from time to time as to the state of the Union; but the Constitution never contemplated the exercise of any pressure by the Executive upon Members of either House of Congress.

There is today throughout the country a feeling of uneasiness, crystallizing into a conviction, that the lines of demarcation, which the Constitution has wisely marked out between various departments of the Government, are being obliterated; and that the functions of Government are being merged more and more into the Executive.

If this Republic is ever to lose its liberties, it will be through the gradual absorption and concentration of all the functions of government in the Executive. We must return to constitutional government—to a government of law and not a government of men.

The platform of any political party that aspires to greatness and hopes to merit the confidence of the American people must conform in letter and spirit to the Constitution of the United States.

CAPITALISM AND THE CONSTITUTION

Since our system of government cannot function without capitalism, and capitalism cannot function properly without a sound monetary system, a brief résumé of the monetary policy pursued during the first 115 years of this Republic may be helpful in arriving at a correct solution of our present problems.

In 1793, bimetallism was adopted and continued as our monetary policy for the following 80 years. During this period, the United States experienced the greatest expansion and growth in our entire history. In 1873, when bimetallism was abandoned because of the machinations of England, Germany, and the international bankers, the United States was thrown into a violent depression.

Because of the superiority of our system of government, the freedom of opportunity given the individual, free enterprise, and the protective tariff, we recovered from this premeditated conspiracy to destroy us; but, by 1890, economic storm clouds began to gather which threatened another depression. World commerce and trade had expanded faster than the production of gold and it was evident that either silver would have to be added to gold to create an adequate monetary reserve or our economic structure would have to be shaken down by a depression to bring it in line with the inadequate gold reserve.

The statesmen of that day not only recognized the danger, but took measures to eliminate it. Both major parties had sound money planks in their 1892 platforms; and, in 1893, the Congress passed legislation declaring bimetallism to be the monetary policy of the United States. A commission was sent to London to seek the cooperation of England and other European nations in a return to bimetallism.

Probably the best composite view of the Congress of that period was voiced by the Honorable John Sherman in the Senate of the United States on January 5, 1890, when he said:

> I will vote for any measure that will, in my judgment, secure a genuine bimetallic standard. One that will not demonetize gold, or cause it to be hoarded or exported, but will establish both silver and gold as common standards and maintain them at a fixed ratio, not only in the United States but among all the nations in the world.
> The hope of philosophers and statesmen is now nearer to realization than ever before. If we could contribute to this result it would tend to promote commerce and intercourse, trade, and travel, peace and harmony among the nations. It would be in line with the civilization of our age.

But England was at the height of her power and influence—the greatest shipping, commercial, and banking nation on earth. Her colonies and the colonies of most of the other imperial nations were silver-money countries and by manipulating the price of silver, they were able to control the economic life of these colonies and pillage them at will. They refused to join with us in a return to bimetalism and, as a result, the United States was afflicted by the terrible 3-year depression from 1893 to 1896.

With this evidence of the consequences of an unsound monetary system, the American people were in a mood to return to bimetallism either with or without the cooperation of other countries; but just at that time, gold was discovered in South Africa and Alaska and greatly exaggerated reports of the extent of these gold deposits influenced many people to believe that production from these new gold fields would take up the slack and fill the role of silver in supplying adequate monetary reserves.

For a time this new gold did take up the slack but in 10 years the inadequacy of gold again became apparent; and in the money panic of 1907, banks were forced to issue scrip in lieu of redeemable currency. The gold shortage became increasingly evident but because we consumed 94 percent of our own production, most of our business was conducted among our own people. Other nations did not fare so well. They were forced to resort to cartels, monopolies, silver blocks, empire preferences, and other props to stabilize their credit and currency. This condition inevitably leads to wars and depressions and accounts for the present sad state in which most other countries find themselves.

The return to bimetallism is inevitable, but a return to a sound monetary system will not be achieved without bitter opposition from those who profit by a fluctuating currency; and you may again expect to hear exaggerated reports of new gold discoveries and increased production. But before giving too much credence to their arguments, just remember: The records of the United States Bureau of the Mint show that the total world production of gold during the 456 years that have elapsed since the discovery of America in 1492 has been only 1,500,000,000 ounces; and there is nothing to indicate that the production of either gold or silver will increase in any greater proportion than during this 456-year period. We dare not risk another war and another depression to satisfy the cupidity of the moneychangers.

LABOR IS LEARNING THE HARD WAY

Personal aggrandizement and promises of social and labor gains for their members tempted many labor leaders to support the New Deal policy of managed economy and managed currency, apparently unaware that they were selling labor down the river; for while wages advanced from $5 to $10 per day, the debauching of the currency makes $10 today the equal in purchasing power of only $3.70 prior to 1934; and the tax burden created by the New Deal's monetary and fiscal policies is so confiscatory that risk capital for new business enterprises is practically nonexistent. Ford Motor Co. employees, for example, were better off economically 30 years ago when Henry Ford established a minimum wage of $5 per day.

Labor is learning the hard way the truth of Daniel Webster's statement:

Of all the contrivances for cheating the laboring classes of mankind, none has been more effective than that which deludes them with paper money. * * * The very man of all others who has the deepest interest in a sound currency, and who suffers most by mischievous legislation in money matters, is the man who earns his daily bread by his daily toil.

THE KIND OF GOVERNMENT THE AMERICAN PEOPLE WANT

If I understand the wishes and desires of real Americans—and I think I do—they want to be free and enjoy the rights guaranteed to them under the Constitution; the opportunity for individual initiative and the right to engage in free enterprise.

Our forefathers did not come to America seeking security, but opportunity—a fair chance to make good in a free world. They were not prepared to surrender their rights as men for the promise that they would be fed, clothed, and noused. Security at the cost of surrendering their rights as freemen was repugnant to them.

One-tenth of our population once had that kind of security, but we fought a great war to end it, because we called it by its right name—slavery. Those who surrender any of their constitutional rights for the transient favors of a bureaucracy will shortly find themselves coming on bended knee begging for what was rightfully theirs in the first place.

The following plank is suggested for the Republican Party platform of 1948:

THE MONETARY POLICY OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY

The Republican Party always has been the party of sound money. It recognizes that the principal function of money is to serve as a constant, dependable measure of the value goods and services; and that to have this quality, money must be backed by and be redeemable in something of a universally recognized and accepted value. It also recognizes that from time immemorial gold and silver money, and currencies redeemable in gold and/or silver, are the only things that have been universally recognized and accepted in exchange for goods and services.

In 1933, when the Democratic administration abandoned sound money and embarked on a policy of debauching the currency under the Marxist formula of managed economy and managed currency, it precipitated the vicious spiral of rising prices and the resultant demand for higher wages.

The Republican Party believes that unsound monetary and fiscal policies of Government and not business are responsible for booms and busts; and that an unsound monetary system is more fruitful of human misery than war, pestilence, and famine; and has brought more injustice than all the bad laws ever enacted.

The Republican Party further believes that the right of redemption of paper currency should be restored to the American people; not only because it is right and just and will restore confidence in the integrity of our money, but because it places in the hands of the people an effective brake against Government waste and extravagance.

In the event that a thorough investigation by appropriate committees of the Congress proves what now seems evident—that there is not sufficient gold in the world to adequately back currencies and insure their redemption at face value on demand—then a sound monetary system should be adopted in which silver is joined with gold, at fixed and proper ratio, to create adequate, redeemable monetary reserves; such sound monetary system to be in strict accordance with article I, section 8, clause 5 of the Constitution of the United States:

"The Congress shall have power * * * to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures,"; and the act of Congress of November 1, 1893 (sec. 311, U. S. Code Annotated (ch. 8, 28, Stat. 4)), which is still in effect:

"SEC. 311. Policy of the United States as to bimetallism. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchange value, such equality to be secured through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals, and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts. And it is hereby further declared that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such a safe system of bimetallism as will maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States, in the markets and in the payment of debts."

Displaced Persons

OF
HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter from the Under Secretary of State, Robert A. Lovett, dealing with the subject of displaced-persons legislation.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APRIL 15, 1948.

Hon. CHAPMAN REVERCOMB,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Immigration and Naturalization.

MY DEAR SENATOR REVERCOMB: At your request, Mr. Richard Arens, staff director of the Subcommittee to Investigate Immigration and Naturalization, has asked for the views of the Department of State respecting S. 2242, a bill to authorize for a limited period of time the admission into the United States of certain European displaced persons for permanent residence. Inasmuch as this bill was introduced following executive sessions of the Committee on the Judiciary, and has since been pending on the Senate Calendar, the Department of State has not previously had an opportunity to comment on it.

As you know, Secretary Marshall testified last July before the House Committee on the Judiciary in favor of H. R. 2910, to admit up to 400,000 displaced persons to the United States. It remains his view that the United States should take significant action along these lines. The need is now, if anything, greater than it was last July. Therefore, while it is gratifying to note that the Senate Committee on the Judiciary has reported favorably on the principle of admitting displaced persons, it is somewhat disappointing that it has done so in terms of a bill providing for entry of only 100,000 displaced persons in 2 years, and under conditions and restrictions which make the bill extremely difficult to administer. I believe, however, that by a number of appropriate amendments the bill could be put into form which would contribute materially to a solution of this displaced-persons problem.

(1) Members: The bill provides for entry of 50,000 displaced persons a year for 2 years. There are now approximately 800,000 displaced persons in Germany, Austria, and Italy who should be resettled. I am convinced that if we take only 50,000 a year for 2 years we will still have the bulk of the problem with us in 1950. On the other hand, if we increase the number to at least 100,000 a year, we would, in cooperation with other countries, dispose of a substantial portion of the problem by the end of 1950. Moreover, our own contacts with agencies in the United States interested in exploring the opportunities for the resettlement of displaced persons meeting the tests of this bill have convinced us not only of the desire but the ability of the American people to afford opportunities to such numbers with helpful effect on our domestic economy. In any event, it would seem appropriate to raise the ceiling to that level in order to afford an opportunity for additional numbers to enter if they meet all the standards established by the bill.

(2) Eligibility: The bill would exclude otherwise qualified displaced persons who entered Germany, Austria, and Italy after December 22, 1945. This would be extremely difficult to administer and would apparently result in discrimination against most of the Jewish displaced persons. The committee's report explained that the date of December 22, 1945, was selected because it was the date applied under the President's directive of that date. There was justification for establishing this dead line under the President's directive at the time of its issuance because the numbers applying for admission to the United States obviously exceeded those admissible under the quotas and also because it was desired to avoid an influx of refugees into the United States zone for the purpose of taking advantage of its provisions. However, our own consuls subsequently found this date so difficult to administer that the Department of State, on February 12, 1948, changed the date to April 21, 1947. This later date was the one on which General Clay closed the displaced-persons camps to further admittance.

As far as discrimination against Jewish displaced persons is concerned, I should like to point out that almost all of the Jewish displaced persons who remain in Germany, Austria, and Italy arrived in those countries after December 22, 1945. They have been admitted to the displaced-persons camps and are fully eligible under the International Refugee Organization constitution. Under the circumstances, it would be unfortunate to exclude most of this group from potential eligibility. It is, therefore, recommended that the date of eligibility be changed to April 21, 1947.

(3) Agricultural priorities: The bill provides that not less than 50 percent of the visas shall be issued to agricultural workers. If the provision is applied as written, it would amount to an exclusive priority for agricultural workers if each brought in with him only one member of his family. I understand that you have already taken cognizance of this situation and have indicated your intention to propose an amendment which would make it clear that the wife and unmarried dependent child under 21 years of age of each agricultural worker would be included among the quota for agricultural workers. While this amendment would eliminate one drafting defect of the present bill, there would, in our opinion, still be room for improvement along two lines: In the first place, in conformity with our tradition of maintaining intact the family unit, it would seem advisable to include within the priority all bona fide dependent members of the family; in the second place, the 50-percent priority would seem to be too high in the light of the fact that only about 25 percent of the displaced persons are agricultural workers and that the Judiciary Committee's own report points out that shortages in agriculture in the United States are not as acute or as enduring as shortages in other occupations, such as construction workers, nurses, domestics, seamstresses, and tailors. We would, therefore, recommend that the percentage of priority be reduced to approximately 25 percent.

(4) Priority for persons from annexed areas: The bill provides that not less than 50 percent of the visas shall be issued to displaced persons coming from areas "annexed by a foreign power." The committee explains in its report that it intends to refer to displaced persons from Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia, and from that part of former Poland which is east of the Curzon line. In our opinion, the bill as drafted contravenes the present foreign policy of the United States which has declined to recognize the annexation of Latvia, Lithuania, or Estonia by the U. S. S. R.

Moreover, I should like to point out a number of objections to the policy of discriminating in favor of a particular group of displaced persons as provided in the section under reference. In our opinion, all of the displaced persons who have qualified for International Refugee Organization assistance are equally entitled to consideration. There is nothing in our knowledge of the situation which would justify the conclusion that displaced persons from the Baltic areas, or from former Poland east of the Curzon line, have suffered more than refugees from U. S. S. R. or Yugoslavia or Poland west of the Curzon line, whether Protestant, Catholic, or Jewish. Accordingly it is our opinion that opportunities to come to the United States should be distributed equitably among all groups of qualified displaced persons, in approximate proportion to their relative numbers in Germany, Austria, and Italy; also, we are convinced that the annexed-areas priority would be extremely difficult to administer because of overlapping with the priority for agricultural workers and because of the difficulties of proof which would arise in establishing place of origin, especially with reference to former residence east or west of the Curzon line. It is, therefore, our recommendation that this provision be deleted and that there be substituted a provision to secure an equitable distribution of such opportunities among the various categories of displaced persons.

(5) Administration: The bill provides for a three-man Commission, which would formulate and issue rules and regulations, receive reports, and transmit reports to the Congress. Otherwise administration of the bill is left to the various agencies presently responsible for administering the immigration laws.

Our analysis of the displaced-persons problem has led to the conclusion that an American resettlement program could best be administered by giving broad powers of coordination and administration to the Commission. These powers should embrace all aspects of the program, including the screening and selection of those qualified to fill such opportunities, ascertaining what opportunities there may be for resettlement in the United States without displacing residents from employment or housing, and their transportation and distribution throughout the United States. A program of the nature proposed by the bill is a new and special one. No existing agency is charged with or has experience in all of its aspects. A number of existing agencies must be used. Their efforts will need to be coordinated by over-all direction. We are confident that such a program would succeed. We are less confident that the program would be properly administered under the divided authority provided by the bill. In this connection, you may be interested in an analysis of the administrative aspects of S. 2242, made by Mr. Ugo Carusi, former Commissioner of Immigration, at the personal request of the chairman of the House Subcommittee on Immigration. A copy is enclosed.

(6) Exclusion of out-of-camp displaced persons: The bill would exclude out-of-camp displaced persons from eligibility except in hardship cases. In our opinion, this would discriminate unfairly against some of the most enterprising of the displaced persons who have temporarily supported themselves outside the centers in reliance upon assurances given that they would not thereby lose eligibility for resettlement. It is recommended that this section be eliminated.

Because of the urgency of the matter, this letter has not been cleared with the Bureau of the Budget, to which a copy is being sent.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT A. LOVETT,
Acting Secretary.

Washington College of Law Commencement Address by Hon. Theodore F. Green, of Rhode Island

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address I delivered at the annual commencement exercises of the Washington College of Law on Thursday, June 10.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Dean Rogers, trustees, faculty, and graduating class of Washington College of Law, it is a pleasure to be present and take part in these commencement exercises. At least it would be a pleasure if in these hectic last days of this session of Congress if I were not momentarily expecting a call to hasten back to the Senate Chamber to decide the fate of our country and perhaps of our world. Each Senator I suppose has the feeling that their fate depends upon him. Literally that might be the fact in case of a close vote. However, I accepted this invitation some time ago, and with my New England tradition hate to break an engagement, especially of this kind.

This is by no means the first time that I have come in close contact with Washington College of Law. For 10 years I was a member of the council of legal education of the American Bar Association. That council, as you know, has in charge the establishment and maintenance of high standards in the American law schools, and in this connection publishes a list of those who meet the standards set. The Association of American Law Schools undertakes similar duties. During those 10 years I was a member of the council, we had occasion several times to examine the status of this college, and unfortunately did not find it meeting wholly the standards set up by the council. I am glad as a former member of that council to learn that those standards have now been met, the college having been admitted to the Association of American Law Schools last December, and being fully approved by the council of legal education as well as by the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. Let me congratulate you, the members of the fiftieth class graduating from the school, on this happy coincidence.

You as law students share with other college students, and in fact with your fellow citizens generally, interest in matters affecting not only ourselves, your family, and friends, but the communities in which you live, the Nation of which they are a part, and the whole round earth. This was not the case until after the First World War. It had justly been said that the average American college student knew little about the world outside and possibly cared less. No outside affairs seemed to touch him and perhaps few of them did. All that has changed. After World War I and, more especially now after World War II, the drastic economic pressures have affected the student profoundly, but there has been more than the pinch of financial pressure to awaken the American undergraduate to the problems of his larger world. You have not been able to remain uninterested in the face of so much that has vitally concerned your country, your families, your friends. You have realized, properly, that these economic, social, political, and international concerns of the hour are as much your business as they are anyone's. In a moment you will step into the midst of them. There may be many troubles you will encounter that will be beyond your control. How are you prepared to go ahead and in what way, best for you and for your fellows, shall you face the years immediately before you?

For one thing, I would urge upon you the value of a progressive temper of mind. It is more urgent than that; it is, as I see it, an absolute necessity that our society produce and use men of an all-round point of view, men of broad vision. I am not advocating any special set of ideas, rather I am advocating a way of thinking.

Let me give you an illustration of the regrettably misguided thought prevalent today. It is provided by some of our patriotic organizations. In them we have groups of people who especially revere the memory and deeds of our revolutionary forebears. They set up memorial tablets, they preserve historic buildings, they identify themselves with their ancestors who fought for the principles and the foundation of a democratic government. To such organizations we should naturally look for inspiration in the progressive ideas of today. But we find no such thing; we find, indeed a fairly general opposition to any departure from the settled ideas of long ago. The smallest attempt to change conditions with an eye to modern needs seems to them the threat of socialism or even communism. Such an attitude is certainly not keeping the faith with the forebears now so revered. The Yankees have become Tories, the revolutionaries have become reactionaries. In revering the ideas of their ancestors as practicable in all cases today, these people have been unfaithful to the spirit. They do not see that they are opposing the very attitude, the very way of thinking which made the founders of America brave and admirable men.

Now, to return to the quality of mind which I would urge upon you: it is apparent that we need men who will see the situation in its entirety and not only from one special angle or from one particular prejudice. The people of this country look to their leaders for expression of sound judgment and for the guidance of careful thought. The failure of some of these leaders has been a reproach to the schools and colleges where they were educated. If our colleges will not produce men of highest caliber I do not know where we shall find them. The American colleges have in their hands our future safety and success. To some of you who graduate today we are looking for the sane, alert, comprehensive spirit needed to unshackle us from the outworn usages of the past and to determine the truly progressive actions of tomorrow.

Perhaps the most salient characteristic of this broad vision must be the habit of questioning. Accept nothing without first inquiring to the best of your abilities. Bring all that you know of past experience to test the promises of the present for the future. Reject as easily as you accept. We are encumbered with a prodigality of useless thought. Learn, above all, that the selfish way is not the best way—not even for you. What harms society harms every member of it. A man who thinks his benefits will arise from the calamities of others is as shortsighted as a man who, in the middle of the ocean, would set the ship leaking to be rid of his fellow shipmates.

The same thing is equally true, although perhaps the thought is harder to grasp, when we deal not with individuals but with nations. This thought, although now more generally grasped, is still sometimes found lacking, even among the leaders up on Capitol Hill. This crops out both in dealing with domestic problems, such as the relation of a citizen to his fellow citizens and the relation of a citizen to his government. It crops out also in our foreign problems dealing with the relation of one nation to another nation and of all nations to a world organization. The various aspects of these two questions seem at times almost too difficult for Members of this Congress or any group of men to deal with sympathetically, intelligently, and effectively.

Now that the day of graduation from college to brokerage office seems to be over, you may be in a better position to question the creed of profit for its own sake. In the catastrophes of the past few years it has been again and again proved that the profit motive is false and fatal. Long ago the American naturalist, Henry Thoreau, expressed the whole thing very simply and very well. Thoreau said, in effect, "Here is a hat factory. For what does it exist? To make hats? One would naturally expect a hat factory to exist primarily to make hats—but no; not at all. The purpose of this factory is to make money, as far as the owners are concerned, and for them that is the whole essential purpose." That little example of Thoreau's expresses, in principle, our major mistake of the past highly industrialized century. We did not plan, we did not stop to consider our true purposes, we were rarely interested in whether we turned out hats, or guns, or razor blades—our main objective was to make money. The consequence was that, with no regard for social values, we had a lot of good, fair, and bad hats; we had underpaid workmen; and we had overpaid profiteers. Then came the widespread depression as a result of such shoddy thought. It was not until then that the profiteers realized they were in the very boat they had set aleaking, and that everyone was going down together.

We must see to it that people have the opportunity to make a comfortable living—not just some people, but all people. Our trouble has assuredly not been that we lacked the facilities to insure the economic security of all. Our trouble has been in the careless, unthinking use of the marvelous facilities we have. Once more, then, it is not a matter of means so much as a matter of ways, and the way that your generation thinks and acts may well prove the saving grace of society.

Finally, it seems to me that the problems which confront you may be said to bear not only material but also spiritual implications. Men by their very nature are linked together the world around. So long as they quarrel, they are defeating their own ends. What is good for you is, on the whole, good for all—there is no other welfare. An individual can go selfishly through life, inconsiderate of others, and attain a material success, but that is success only from a very short-range view. Actually, the individual stands arraigned as an enemy of society, and we should have no place for such.

Our great necessity now is for clear thinking. We need men who can and will define terms and do so unmistakably. We do not need labelers; the propensity of sticking irrelevant, thoughtless names on any number of things is far too well developed. No. We need men who can look a fact in the face without blanching, who can tell what they see—not what they guess they see or what they want to see. If the American college cannot supply such men, I do not know where to look for them.

Actually, I believe the classroom and the campus can produce such men. When we speak, as we often do, of "a liberal education" we are primarily concerned with the contents, the materials of a liberal education. That is not my point now. For the moment I am more concerned with the way of a man's mind.

If the college can train the processes of a man's thinking and train them well, a very important thing can be accomplished. It is like the sharpening of a tool. The tool exists apart from the sharpener. Materially he can add nothing to it. But he can form it, he can shape it. He can change it from a blunt, useless object to a keen, skillful implement.

So the college, if it does nothing else, can do a great deal in preparing its students to recognize the genius of tolerance. We need broad-minded men. We need men able to judge which is idle fad and which is true progress. We need men who will not espouse a new formula because it is new nor stay wedded to an ancient one simply because it is old. They must be men with standards by which they can judge, not simply standards to which they will cling uncritically by habit and custom. The times are shifting, the search for the real values was never more avid. At this moment blundering experiment or stubborn reaction are out of place. We want men who will see the situation and see it steadily and whole; not out of prejudice, not out of preference, but from an honest will to understand all that can be known, and then to act in a way consistent with the facts and with the best interests of society.

The future of society depends on the emergence of such men in places of trust and of general importance. Their emergence should be mainly from the college campus. And that is simply one way of saying that, as I see it, the future of society is in the hands of the colleges of the world. Washington College of Law has developed such men. I trust that there are many such here now. You of the graduating class have the wonderful opportunity of entering actively into a tumultuous world in which such men are needed as never before. I congratulate you on your opportunities.

OF

HON. CARL A. HATCH

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Theater for Washington," from the Washington Post of June 19.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THEATER FOR WASHINGTON

With the passing of the National Theater into limbo or filmdom, the Capital of the United States will be without a single legitimate playhouse. The one structure which can more or less speedily be reconverted to remedy this lack is the old Belasco Theater facing Lafayette Park. The Public Buildings Administration has announced that it will receive bids for the rental of this structure. But the terms under which bids have been invited afford scant hope that the reconversion will become a reality. Elsewhere on this page, a correspondent analyzes in some detail the defects of these terms from the point of view of those interested in keeping the legitimate stage alive in Washington. We agree with him that the offer of the Public Buildings Administration to make the Belasco available will be no more than an empty gesture unless that agency acts to make private operation of the theater feasible and to insure that it will actually be operated in the interest of the community's cultural life.

There is no doubt at all that the people of Washington will support a theater which offers them first-class theatrical fare and which offers its tickets for sale on the nondiscriminatory, or American plan. Several commercial entrepreneurs have expressed lively interest in operating such a theater here. So has the American National Theater and Academy which, through the Washington Art Center Association, has done much toward inducing the Government to make the Belasco available. ANTA is perhaps peculiarly qualified to meet the drama needs of the National Capital. It was chartered in 1935 by Congress for the purpose of stimulating interest in the drama and bringing to all Americans their heritage of the past, the best of the present, and to aid the development of better drama in the future through its academy. Many of the most distinguished American dramatists, actors, and producers are among its officers and directors. Washington would be an ideal home for ANTA. And ANTA would be an ideal custodian of a Washington theater.

It was Washington's need which prompted the Public Buildings Administration to offer the Belasco for rent. That need should not now be ignored in the selection of a tenant. It is a far more important consideration than the amount of income which the Government can glean from the lease. It merits, indeed, on the part of the Government which has its site here, affirmative and sympathetic and generous help.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Colonel Bankhead Ready To Retire," from the Windsor Star of June 12, and an article entitled "Under the Reading Lamp," by W. J. Hurlow, from the Evening Citizen of Ottawa, Canada, both regarding the retirement of Col. Henry Bankhead.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Windsor Star of June 12, 1948]

AMERICAN SOLDIER-DIPLOMAT—COLONEL BANKHEAD READY TO RETIRE

(By C. J. K.)

An American soldier-diplomat who in the earlier years of his colorful Army career molded a tribe of wild head hunters of the rugged Luzon Mountain region into an efficient fighting battalion of United States forces in the Philippines, is about to retire after having spent 15 consecutive years in the service of his country in the United States Embassy at Ottawa.

DISTINGUISHED FAMILY

He is Col. Henry Bankhead, member of the distinguished Alabaman family of that name, four of whom over a period of three generations have rendered combined aggregate service of 66 years in the House of Representatives and in the United States Senate.

John Hollis Bankhead, Jr., son of John Hollis, Sr., and Colonel Bankhead's eldest of two brothers, was serving in his third term in the Senate when he died.

William Brockman Bankhead, Colonel Bankhead's second brother, began his political career as a member of the Alabama Legislature. But he too was elected to the House of Representatives where he remained for 24 years to serve the last three terms of his career as Speaker of that august legislative body.

Walter Will Bankhead, son of John Hollis, Jr., and thus grandson of the first John Hollis, was elected when his uncle, Congressman William Brockman Bankhead died, to fill the vacancy created by his death.

Thus father, two sons, and a grandson achieved election to the Nation's highest legislative councils.

LEAVE IN JUNE

When Colonel Bankhead and his charming Irish-American wife, former Anabel Madden White, leave Ottawa in June for their retirement home upon the sun-kissed shores of Miami Beach, Fla., Canada's diplomatic corps will lose one of the most congenial and popular of its members.

Canada considered that she had been singularly honored when on June 20, 1933, President Roosevelt saw fit to appoint Colonel Bankhead as commercial attaché to the United States Embassy in Ottawa. The appointment was interpreted as an honor for the reason that Colonel Bankhead's Alabaman family already had become identified in the public mind in this country as one intimately associated with the highest affairs of state in Washington. There were few Canadians who were not aware when Colonel Bankhead arrived in Ottawa that his father was a distinguished Member of the United States Senate nor that his eldest brother was Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Colonel Bankhead strove quietly but assiduously over a period of approximately 11 years as commercial attaché to promote a closer trade and all-round commercial relationship between this country and the United States than had existed before his coming.

ALABAMA-BORN

Colonel Bankhead was born in Moscow, Lamar County, Ala. He received his early education in the public schools of Fayette, attended the University of Alabama from 1904 to 1907, inclusive, and then entered the Eastman Business College, intending to pursue a business career. While at the university he distinguished himself as an athlete and captained the university's football team.

During the First World War Bankhead was commissioned as a lieutenant colonel and as a colonel and was assigned to the Eighty-first Division of the United States Expeditionary Force, soldiers of which had been recruited from Alabama, Florida, North and South Carolina, and from Tennessee. He was appointed to the staff of his divisional commander as divisional quartermaster and sailed for France on July 31, 1918. He served as divisional quartermaster in the field until October 16, 1918.

Colonel Bankhead was twice married. His first marriage took place in Chicago on December 2, 1902. His wife of that marriage, Alice Buffington Stickney, daughter of John Buffington Stickney and Caroline Russ, of Jacksonville, Fla., died on September 4, 1938.

Six years later, on December 29, 1944, Colonel Bankhead married his second and present wife at Miami Beach, Fla., where he has established his permanent American home for his retirement years. Anabel Madden White was born in Ohio on January 1, 1900, the daughter of John Madden, a native of Dublin, Eire, and Martha Ann Wilcox, born in London, England.

SON IN WINDSOR

A son, John Long Bankhead, born in 1903, now in the United States Foreign Service is stationed as United States consul at Windsor, Ontario. He married Katherine Gill, daughter of Hester Ann Carrigar and James Shields Gill, representative of two pioneer families of the State of Tennessee. Their only child, Katherine Ann Bankhead, born at Morristown, Tenn., on August 24, 1928, is an only grandchild of whom the counselor of Embassy of Ottawa has become particularly proud. An only daughter of Colonel Bankhead, Mrs. Flamen B. Adae, resides with her husband, a realtor, at Miami Beach.

UNDER THE READING LAMP—A FAREWELL ADDRESS TO CANADA REVIEWED AS LITERATURE

(By W. J. Hurlow, literary editor, the Evening Citizen)

In these practical and prosaic days when speech has lost its wings and become pedestrian and dingy, it is all too seldom that one hears a public utterance marked by the qualities of literature at a high level. In the era of the giants, that was not an uncommon experience of audiences. Much of the material in Edmund Burke's Reflections on the French Revolution, was first delivered to the House of Commons at Westminster.

The reason why so many of us profess to dislike oratory is that we lack conviction and are strangers to principles we feel to be greater than ourselves. We are ashamed to express emotion because our souls are like dried peas rattling around in a bladder.

On Tuesday evening of this week we had the privilege of listening to an address that deeply impressed a large audience of professional and businessmen and ladies; a deliverance that gripped us all by its clarity, sincerity, honesty, and feeling.

We regretted very much that extreme stringency of space on the following day compelled us to write only a short report, a summary consisting of paraphrases and brief quotations picked out here and there. Oratorical in manner, the material of this speech was couched in literary form.

However, it has now been printed and we have it before us in a neat little booklet which we have special pleasure in bringing to the attention of readers of this page. The title is, "Address of Col. Henry M. Bankhead at the Rotary Club Dinner." The function had been arranged to do honor to the speaker who is retiring after 15 years of service as commercial attaché, United States Embassy, Ottawa.

The brochure contains the author's reminiscences of his life among us, a beautiful description of the scenery of the Gatineau, an eloquent appreciation of Canada's development as a nation, her honorable place in the world's estimation and of our Dominion as seen through the eyes of an educated and sagacious American.

For many years Colonel Bankhead spent summers at MacGregor Lake and he tells of his coming to the province across the river:

"Good fortune led me to a beautiful lake nearby, where the water was cold and deep and alive with game fish. The people were friendly and hospitable and I lost my heart to the spot. I became the proud possessor of a small island with a modest cottage on it, where I spent 27 happy and contented summers. I would linger on into early fall when the green mountainside changed to gold, brown, and red and all the other beautiful colors of nature. When I could hear the swish of the wild ducks and the honk of the geese as they winged their way to the southland, then I knew it was time for me to go."

This passage, redolent of poetry, is followed by an autobiographical episode touched with humor. The writer tells of his first visit to what was then the new Legation on Wellington Street:

"I entered the building at noontime when all of those hard-working diplomats were out refreshing the inner man and, no doubt, solving the problems of the world. I went into an office on the ground floor which was well and attractively furnished. Beyond a large, flat-top mahogany desk was a huge and beautifully upholstered chair. As I was alone in the room I actually had the temerity to sit down in it. It was most comfortable. As I sat there looking over and beyond Parliament Hill I would visualize my beloved lake nestled in the foothills of the Laurentians. The thought occurred to me that it would be a happy situation if I had some legal right to the chair, but at that time I was on the wrong side of the political fence so I dismissed the idea from my mind and left."

Then comes a comparison or perhaps, rather, a contrast between political elections in Canada and the United States by one who has watched the former and participated in the latter.

"When election time comes your party leaders make a few dignified radio speeches expounding their theories of government. The 'outs' mildly condemning the 'ins' for their acts of commission and omission and the 'ins' with equal fervor denounce the 'outs' as being incompetent and unworthy of becoming the 'ins.' The party lieutenants go to the ridings and beat the bushes to get out the voters. On election day they all go to the polls and vote and the returning officer tallies up the result. And then, what happens? Nothing happens, because Mr. King, like Old Man River, rolls on and on and on. He appoints a new cabinet and continues doing business at the same old stand."

This is the year for a Presidential election in the United States and Colonel Bankhead draws a witty Dickensian picture of an American campaign:

"Our elections are like a cat and dog fight, and the fur flies everywhere. The two political parties in convention select their candidates and then those two giants enter the arena for mortal combat. The underlings on all sides hurl at each other all of the epithets laid down in the political book. They throw brickbats, dead cats, or anything that comes to hand, and a good time is had by all."

Growing serious again, the writer points out that the 27 years he has lived among us total one-third of the lifetime of Canada as a confederation, and continues:

"Since 1920 your population has increased more than 50 percent, your national wealth has multiplied manyfold. Your production from natural resources, agriculture, and industry has grown so great that you now export one-third of all which you produce into the channels of trade to afford comfort and pleasure to other people of the world. That is a remarkable achievement for a country of 12,500,000 people and especially so when compared to the exports from the United States of less than 10 percent produced by 145,000,000 people."

There are many who assess the greatness of a country by its size, natural wealth, and material prosperity; who regard education as a means of filling the purses rather than the heads and hearts of citizens; to whom man lives by bread alone. It is thrilling to find a realistic neighbor with the discernment to recognize the true nature of Canada's influence, and sufficient interest in us to lift our sights to a higher range:

"But bear in mind that your acquired leadership and influence among the nations of the world is not on account of your territorial extent and geographical location, nor your unequaled natural resources and your economic growth but it is because of the character of your people. The blood of 26 nations courses through the veins of Canadians, making a composite citizenry containing all the better qualities of these diverse races. Creating a nation of Christian law-abiding people, a people imbued with the highest sense of honor, justice, and right, living with each other in a spirit of amity and accord, all working together for the prosperity, happiness, and contentment of all the people and for the glory of Canada and the brotherhood of man. Therein lies your greatness."

The prayer of Burns that some power would give us the gift to see ourselves as others see us, cannot, in the nature of things, be answered but as a compensation we have friends who reflect for us the virtues as well as the defects hidden from our own eyes. Colonel Bankhead sees the angel in the marble, the glints of gold in the quartz, and continues:

"We, your neighbors, do not envy your great expanse of land and sea, your fertile soil, the production of your factories and mills, the richness of your mines, the huge fortune which stems from your vast forests, or the power in your streams. We are happy that you possess them. We are not jealous of your industrial expansion or your power of place and influence in world affairs. We glory in your achievements. There is only one thing in all this wonderful country which we covet and that is your friendship. That, we treasure above all things."

Colonel Bankhead salutes the Allied leaders in the Second World War, the three white-plumed knights of democracy:

"One of these chieftains did not live to partake of the fruits of victory and lies peacefully sleeping in the hallowed ground of his ancestral estate. Another one, who by the magic of his inspiring words, led his people to the very heights of valor and courage and stood as a bulwark of democracy and freedom. He did see the victory but later fell a victim to the vicissitude of political fortune. The third one, happily, is still captain of the ship of state and has guided that noble vessel through the tortuous channels of economic readjustment and has brought his country to the highest peak of prosperity and the contentment of his people."

In striking words, the writer speaks of the very flower of the young manhood of both our countries who fought together as friends and allies, and emphasizes the pious duty of all right-minded and peace-loving men to see that the supreme sacrifice made by so many of them shall not be in vain:

"They died together and were buried side by side in the blood-soaked soil of alien lands where today their spirits, together with millions of other spirits, both friend and foe, stand as silent sentinels as a warning to the leadership of all countries that they must, in the United Nations, by the display of wisdom, unselfishness, patience, justice, and equity, create a condition where the peoples of all lands can live in peace and without fear. Toward that end our countries are making every effort and we shall continue to do so and pray for its success."

The colonel recalls the part Canadian scientists played in the performance of a miracle hitherto held impossible, the splitting of the atom, the issue of which feat may result in inconceivable good or ill. He says: "Canada is justly proud of the great contribution she made in the development and production of the atomic bomb, the use of which brought to a speedy termination the war in the Far East, thereby saving many thousands of precious lives. The magic ore which made it possible came from your good earth and your scientists and physicists in collaboration with our own, and some from other friendly countries, developed and produced this powerful instrument of destruction which staggers the imagination of man. The world knows it is safe in the hands of those who produced it, and that our countries would never use it as a weapon of aggression."

In an address of this kind it was inevitable that reference should be made to the 3,000 miles of undefended boundary between the two countries, but Colonel Bankhead is incapable of indulging in the trite and hackneyed clichés beloved by orators who keep on boring even although they strike no oil. He calls the general lesson derived from that fact a mistake:

"On occasions like this in both our countries the speaker frequently indulges in that fantasy of thousands of miles of undefended border line which separates our two countries. That is all a fallacy because that border line does not separate and divide our countries and our peoples, but it unites them and binds them together and every foot of that frontier is heavily defended—not with strong forts and powerful long-range guns and murderous modern deadly implements of war but by ties of mutual respect and understanding, confidence, trust, and friendship, ties which are more enduring than hoops of steel."

Contemplating the happy relationship existing between the United States and Canada, the colonel urges that the principles of faith, hope, and charity should be retained; faith that our shared ideas and ideals may never become dimmed or lose their lustre; that the 130 years of unbroken peace between us may endure for all time; and that no nation or combination of nations shall ever be permitted to effect a cleavage between us.

Knowing that there are evil intentioned people intent on sowing discord for sinister purposes of their own, the author, a patriotic American addressing loyal Canadians, uses plain talk: "There are a few people in both of our countries, happily only a few, who are possessed of pigmy souls and poisoned tongues, who by the spoken or written word say things which have the effect of creating discord between us. When we think of those unhappy souls we should recall the words of the Holy Nazarene when He was on the cross and being tormented by His persecutors and He cried out, 'Father, forgive them for they know not what they do.'"

The peroration sounds a personal note that moved those who heard and will touch others who may read it and closes with an apostrophe to the land in which the speaker spent happy years and made many friends:

"Tonight, my friends, my heart is sad because of the inevitable realization that we have come to the parting of the ways. But my spirits are buoyed somewhat by the consciousness of knowing that in my feeble way I have tried to foster the spirit of understanding, good will, and friendship between us. Henceforth, we shall pursue our separate ways but I trust that our pathways will converge again, and when they do I hope that we shall have, each for the other, the same sentiments and the same sympathies, and may the interim seem but as a dream.

"O Canada, dear friend, a fond farewell."

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK
OF IDAHO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 21 (legislative day of Monday, March 29), 1948

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. JOHN THOMAS, late a Senator from the State of Idaho

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, I desire to pay a tribute of respect to the memory of a friend of long standing, the late Senator JOHN THOMAS, who was distinguished for his service in this body to the people of the State of Idaho and to the Nation.

There was much in JOHN THOMAS of the rugged strength of the lofty mountains of Idaho whence he came; there was simplicity, the badge of greatness; there was courage and devotion to the principles of representative government. He had keenness of intellect, and integrity of purpose.

Senator THOMAS, from 1928 to 1933, had the privilege of serving in this body with another illustrious Idahoan, the late Senator William E. Borah, and he took understandable pride in friendship and close association with his noted contemporary. Like Borah, he believed that nothing should be left undone to preserve democracy in this country. His strong convictions against excessive participation in world affairs were similar to those of that senior statesman. Senator THOMAS primarily believed that attempts to impose our concepts of democracy on Europe would result in the weakening, if not the destruction finally, of our American form of Government.

Mr. President, it was my honor to have served in the other House of Congress during the last term of Senator THOMAS, and it was my privilege to have been his friend since 1924. I found him to be conscientious in his duties, aware of his responsibilities, and alive to the problems of the day. He was immensely loyal to our system of Government and proud of his part in its operations.

The esteem in which he was held by his associates in the livestock and banking enterprises in Idaho, their loyalty to his friendship, their confidence in his spoken word, and their faith in his ability were shared by thousands of other Idahoans who twice elected him to the Senate following appointments; first, to succeed Senator Frank R. Gooding, and later to succeed Mr. Borah.

I was present at Gooding, Idaho, at the funeral services for Senator THOMAS, where sheepmen and irrigationists, from the reclamation lands he had helped wrest from the desert, mingled with Senators, high State officials, and his business associates—all gathered to pay final tribute to their friend, one of the great champions of the West.

It was there that the Reverend J. Wesley Miller, long-time friend of the Senator, in describing the nobility and strength of character of the deceased, said:

We shall not soon forget the earnestness, the vigor, the persistency, and the tenacity which marked his efforts in behalf of the farmer, the stockman, and the furtherance of reclamation throughout Idaho. He never seemed to be discouraged, and nothing seemed to daunt him.

He was loyal to his friends, liberal in his views, independent in his opinions, courageous in his convictions, an aggressive fighter, an eloquent advocate, an earnest worker, a wise legislator.

He was the embodiment of all the elements essential to the highest type of American citizenship, and the bright example of his life and work may well serve as a guiding star for those of us he left behind.

At the same services Senator C. WAYLAND BROOKS, representing the congressional committee appointed by the President of the Senate, said:

If you want to see a monument to JOHN THOMAS, look around Idaho. He was rich in his devotion to duty, in his friendship, in idealism, and in his courage, and the mark he has left on the educational, agricultural, commercial, and financial institutions of Idaho will carry on through all time as a living monument to a great man.

JOHN THOMAS was born in a rock-fronted dugout of his homesteading parents, Daniel W. and Mary Elizabeth Sparks Thomas, in Phillips County, Kans. After graduating from high school, he attended a State normal school at Great Bend, Kans., and taught two terms in a country schoolhouse. Later he was county superintendent of schools and then was registrar of the land office at Colby.

Coming to the pioneer community of Gooding, Idaho, in 1909, he established the First National Bank, a venture which was later to become an integral part of a banking corporation serving the financial needs of a rapidly developing agricultural empire. He had served as a director of the corporation of the Federal Reserve Bank of Salt Lake City.

His civic and political activities included terms as local school trustee, city councilman, and mayor; while in politics he served the apprenticeship of precinct committeeman, county and State chairman, and member of the Republican State and National committee.

He was never one to put personal advantage above political principle, and the record of his career reveals that he had within him the hard core of Americanism which has been our Nation's bulwark in time of need.

His exemplary service in the Senate did not have the colorfulness of a Borah. Senator THOMAS was not a speech maker nor an orator, but in his quiet, unassuming manner, he wielded the influence that goes with honesty of purpose and integrity.

JOHN THOMAS died of a cerebral hemorrhage November 10, 1945. His remains, accompanied by the congressional committee, military escort, his daughter, and grandson, were flown to Boise in a 12-hour, nonstop flight in an Army C-54 transport. He was buried in the cemetery at Gooding, Idaho, in the late afternoon of a winter's day, in the presence of hundreds of his sorrowing friends who came to pay him tribute. In their hearts, as in ours, is enshrined the image of this splendid Senator of honored memory.

The Eightieth Congress

OF
HON. HALE BOGGS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, the Eightieth Congress concluded its work after being in continuous session throughout the night and the early morning of June 19 and 20 at about 7 a. m. on the latter day.

As your Representative in the Nation's Capital, it is my desire to briefly summarize the work of the Congress.

I should like to divide this brief summary into three phases—local, national, and international.

A Member of Congress must divide his time between the interests of his own constituents and that of the Nation as a whole. The measures I shall discuss are all public measures. It is impossible to go into any detail on the countless letters and requests that must be answered and attended to, all of which are vital to constituents.

LOCAL MATTERS

Louisiana and New Orleans have fared exceedingly well under the provisions of legislation enacted by the Eightieth Congress. Of commanding importance to the entire State is the question of adequate flood control and the development of our rivers and harbors. In this respect the Eightieth Congress made available more funds and authorized more valuable projects than any previous Congress. Of particular importance to the people of the Second District is the authorization of the first funds for Federal protection of Lake Pontchartrain. This is a vast undertaking and one greatly needed by the residents of the area involved. Of importance to the fish and oil industries was the making available of funds to dredge Bayou Segnette from Westwego to Lake Salvadore.

It was necessary in the closing days of Congress to prevent the sale of the Federal Barge Line, which is domiciled in the city of New Orleans, and which serves our inland waterways, so that safeguards recommended by shippers and civic organizations could be incorporated. This was done. The Louisiana delegation worked diligently to protect the American merchant marine which is essential to the continuance of the great ports of our State. Early in the session a move was defeated which would have transferred 500 American ships to foreign flags. This proposal would have had disastrous effects upon the American merchant marine.

During the closing days of the first session the Eightieth Congress enacted a long-range sugar act. The act extends over a period of 5 years and assures basic prosperity for the sugar growers and processors throughout the State of Louisiana. It has been hailed as the finest piece of legislation on sugar ever passed by the Congress.

The Congress made available additional funds for social security, which will make it possible for the aged, the blind, and the dependent children in Louisiana to receive greater Federal assistance. More funds were made available for highway construction. Thus the Federal Government will match the State building program. Early in the session we succeeded in securing funds for the completion of the Robert Todd Homes, which are dedicated exclusively to veterans. A new branch post office is now operating in the Dryades Street section. This was made available last summer. The retirement pay and other benefits for the railroad employees have been increased without any additional cost to either the employees or to the employers.

Of vast importance to the State of Louisiana is the so-called tidelands bill. I was the author of one of these bills which would confirm the title of the State of Louisiana and that of the other seacoast States to the lands beneath the tidewaters upon which they border. The House of Representatives passed this legislation by an overwhelming majority. Unfortunately, however, in the hectic rush to adjourn demanded by the Republican leaders, the Senate took no action. This is one of the most important pieces of legislation which must be considered at a special session or when the Congress reconvenes.

NATIONAL AND DOMESTIC LEGISLATION

The domestic record of the Congress in many respects is a good one, although it is not unreasonable to be critical because of some of the things that were left undone.

One of the finest accomplishments of the Congress was the passage of legislation unifying the armed forces. This is a real step forward in providing for the national security, but it is now apparent that a considerable amount of repair work must be done on the unification act in order to eliminate wasteful and duplicating practices which still remain.

The Congress passed a tax-reduction bill in the opening days of the first session. I introduced legislation which would have increased the exemptions and increased the credit for dependents. Some concessions were made in both of these respects. The bill which was finally enacted recognized the importance of the Louisiana community property system from a tax point of view, and it is hoped that in future tax revisions it will not be necessary to again face this issue. During the closing days of the session many technical amendments were made to the Internal Revenue Code, which should be extremely helpful.

In the closing days of the session the Congress realistically faced the problem of national security by enacting a peacetime draft in order to bring our armed forces up to the required strength.

Legislation was enacted providing for the payment of terminal leaves of enlisted men in cash, and the veteran's benefits were adjusted so that the beneficiaries could meet the rising cost of living.

At about the same time, cost-of-living wage increases were made possible for postal employees and other Federal workers.

Despite the tremendous increase in the cost of national defense, and foreign commitments due to the aggressive tactics of Russia and its communistic satellites, a reduction of well over $2,000,000,000 was made in the Bureau of the Budget's estimate of Federal expenditures for the fiscal year of 1949.

The Bureau of the Budget requested approximately $37,000,000,000 and the Congress appropriated approximately $35,000,000,000. Of this amount, $13,000,000,000 were made available for national defense, $6,000,000,000 were appropriated for our veterans and the development of atomic energy, and approximately $6,000,000,000 were made available for the first year of the European recovery program.

The Congress failed to take action relative to housing, repeal of the oleomargarine tax, the tidelands bill, the education bill, and the wage-and-hour bill.

It was my privilege to serve on a joint committee throughout the fall of 1947, made up of Members of the House and Senate, which studied the critical housing shortage all over this country. As a result of the work of this committee, a comprehensive housing program and comprehensive housing legislation was introduced. This legislation passed by unanimous consent in the Senate. It was approved by the House Committee on Banking and Currency, but the Republican leadership in the House failed to approve the legislation and it did not become law. In my opinion, this is probably the most serious dereliction of the Eightieth Congress. The failure of the Senate to pass the oleo tax repeal bill must also be criticized. It was my privilege to sponsor one of these bills in the House of Representatives where the repeal measure was passed by a 2-to-1 vote. I have already commented on the tidelands bill.

In summary, I believe that it can be said with justification that the Congress has about a 50-percent batting average on domestic legislation. There is much to be done in the coming session.

The tragedy about the failure to enact housing legislation is that we not only failed to provide for slum clearance and low-rent housing, but we eliminated title VI and the other aids which stimulated private enterprise in building thousands of additional homes during the current year.

On the domestic scene, I was sorry that Congress failed to act on my resolution making the records of Congressmen available to the public—this should have been done.

INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

In the field of international relations this Congress has been outstanding. It must be remembered that this was the first postwar Congress after the conclusion of the Second World War. When compared to the Congress of 1920, the Eightieth Congress stands out as one of the great Congresses in the field of foreign affairs.

The 1920 Congress wrecked the League of Nations, returned the Nation to isolationism, built up a high tariff structure, and made the Second World War inevitable by its failure to recognize the world role of our great Nation.

The Eightieth Congress has fashioned the Marshall plan, which, if properly implemented and properly administered, should bring about the unification of Europe. It has already proved its value in stemming the onrushing tide of world communism. The Marshall plan will cost money, but its cost will be infinitesimal as compared with the cost of a third world war. The fight of Senator VANDENBERG in the last days of the session to obtain adequate funds for the program was a splendid one.

I was particularly pleased at the action of the Congress in view of the fact that in March of 1947 I introduced a resolution in the Congress sponsoring the idea of a Federation of Europe, which is largely incorporated in the Marshall plan. This resolution came about the time that the so-called Truman doctrine on aid to Greece and Turkey was presented to the Congress.

While I supported the Greek and Turkish program, it was my feeling that this type of piecemeal aid would never succeed, that Europe would ultimately be ripe for Communist infiltration and that sooner or later such a haphazard foreign policy would bankrupt our own country. The Marshall plan is a complete repudiation of the isolationism which found favor in our country from 1920 through 1938. The victory of democracy in Italy, the strengthening of the coalition government in France, and the active efforts toward western Europe may be attributed to the plan.

Of importance, too, was the passage in the closing days of the Vandenberg resolution, which expresses the approval of this Nation of the idea of regional security arrangements, such as the union of western Europe.

The over-all accomplishment on foreign affairs is an extremely good one. On the debit side must be mentioned the effort of a small group of isolationists in the House of Representatives to block the reciprocal trade program and the failure to appropriate funds to the United Nations for the construction of permanent buildings in New York City.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, I believe it fair to say that this has been one of the busiest Congresses that the Nation has seen. For my own part, it has been hard and difficult work.

I have always, however, considered it a high privilege to represent a great American constituency. In conclusion, I would be remiss if I did not thank the members of that constituency for the guidance and help that I have received from them in meeting the many problems and issues which I have set forth.

Who Is Right on Each Point of the Arizona-California Water Dispute?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

Tuesday, June 1, 1948

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, in the several recent hearings before Congressional committees on legislation dealing with the water controversy between Arizona on the one hand and certain water agencies in southern California on the other, the representatives of the California agencies have correctly declared that there are three main points of dispute between the contending parties. Those men declare that these three items in dispute, when totaled, involve upward of 2,000,000 acre-feet of water annually out of the Colorado River. They argue further that Arizona must prove herself right in her contentions on all three, and prove those California agencies wrong, in order to show conclusively that there is enough water physically and legally available to Arizona in the main stream of the Colorado River, if Arizona is to get the 1,000,000 acre-feet of water for the central Arizona project covered in S. 1175. Of course, the men from southern California contend that Arizona is wrong on all three of these main points in this water dispute and that the California contention is correct. Let us see.

It helps to clarify the complicated matter somewhat to have this broad dispute thus narrowed to these three main points and to have it stated that they involve a total of more than 2,000,000 acre-feet of water out of the river annually. Now, that amount of water is twice what Arizona is asking for out of the river, under S. 1175. Obviously, even if Arizona is right on only two of the three points—since any two involve upward of a million acre-feet of water—then their contention against Arizona's claim would not be valid in their opposition to S. 1175.

Because these California witnesses, through several hearings, have filled thousands of pages of printed testimony in their attempt to prove their case to the disadvantage of Arizona, it is hardly to be expected that one can answer them adequately in a few paragraphs. Instead of attempting an adequate answer, I am briefly outlining the situation. Therefore, for the present I count confidently upon the good judgment of all who follow this matter to arrive at a correct conclusion and proper answer by their own sound reasoning. Now here is the case.

What are these three main points of dispute? They may be stated as follows:

First. These California agencies contend that the heavy evaporation losses, amounting to upward of 600,000 acre-feet of water annually, should and must be charged against Arizona entirely and no part of such inevitable losses may be charged against the California water users. Arizona rejects this idea.

Second. The California agencies contend that the 1,000,000 acre-feet of water mentioned in subsection (b) of article III of the Santa Fe compact is not "apportioned water" under the terms of the compact, but should be considered surplus, and, as such, 500,000 acre-feet of it belongs to California users. Arizona denies this.

Third. California agencies contend that in the proper system of water accounting out of the Colorado River water bank, Arizona must be charged with all of the sum total of her beneficial uses of any water which is diverted from the Colorado River or any of its tributaries, including the Gila River. On this third point there would be a difference of about a million and a half acre-feet of water annually involved in the difference between these disputants. Arizona takes an opposite view.

If the three lump sums first mentioned are totaled—and they are stated in round numbers—it will be seen that the California witnesses have stated it rather conservatively when they say that the three main points of dispute together involve upward of 2,000,000 acre-feet of water annually. I think it would be more nearly correct to say that the total of the three would be much nearer 3,000,000 acre-feet of water than the 2,000,000-plus which the California men admit. Now, according to my own thinking, Arizona is right on all three of these points in dispute. But even if Arizona is right on only two, she is entitled certainly to more than a million acre-feet of the water involved. Without doubt, any fair-minded, unprejudiced person can see the truth of this minimum claim of Arizona. While I have listed the three points from the opponents' testimony, my own statement of them, though brief, is, I believe, fair and conservative.

1. WHAT IS FAIR ABOUT EVAPORATION LOSSES?

There are heavy evaporation losses on the lower Colorado River because of the hot, dry climate. In a proper accounting, who shall bear those losses? When a dam is built and a storage is created in order to make flood water available, the larger surface of the quiet water impounded increases the evaporation losses. These witnesses from southern California know that storage is necessary in order to get even the minimum amount of water which California claims from the Colorado. In fact, without storage, they would be unable to get, in firm supply, one-third of the amount of water they are now actually getting. Since storage is necessary for California in order to increase the amount of water available to her out of the Colorado River, and since storage increases the evaporation losses, I believe in equity California ought to share in both the benefits and the losses.

What these California men are saying is that all of the advantages of storage are theirs, but they are not to share any of the evaporation losses. In effect, they say let the other States of the basin share all of these losses, as it is our view of the law that we are to share none of the losses of this water through evaporation. "It is not so nominated in the bond." Now, Arizona feels that these inevitable evaporation losses should be prorated and borne equitably. What is the right view from the standpoint of equity? What is your view as to what Congress intended in regard to this matter when writing the Boulder Canyon Project Act of 1928?

2. MAY CALIFORNIA RIGHTFULLY CLAIM III (B) WATER?

Another main point of dispute in this water controversy concerns the million acre-feet of water in subsection (b) of article III of the Santa Fe compact. If it is "apportioned water" within the meaning of the compact, as I certainly believe it is, it seems crystal clear that California excluded herself from claiming any part of it by her own Act of Limitation in 1929. Of course, if it is "surplus water" within the meaning of the compact, California may be entitled to half of it in firm supply after 1963. Now, according to the Santa Fe compact, there are two classes of water in the Colorado River, as treated by that instrument—namely, "apportioned water," meaning water allotted in firm supply in perpetuity; and the other class of water being "surplus water" or "undivided water," which is not yet divided into firm supply. Since California under the law is to share in the division of any surplus waters, it, of course, is her objective to try to show as much water as possible to be in that category. They twist the law in every possible way. It seems to me that their logic and reasoning that III (b) water is surplus under the terms of the compact and subsequent law is quite fantastic and violates all the plain intent and meaning of language. To any fair-minded, impartial reader, it is at once evident from a simple reading of the compact that the million acre-feet of water included in subsection (b) of article III is apportioned and is not surplus water as the California witnesses contend it is.

3. HOW ABOUT CALIFORNIA'S PLAN FOR WATER CHARGES?

On July 25, 1947, I extended my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD under the title: "Which Is the Correct System of Accounting?" In that statement I contrasted the two methods suggested for charging each State for water used out of the Colorado River. I explained the depletion method, which is the one favored by Arizona and by the Bureau of Reclamation, and also by a majority of the leading water authorities in the West. In contrast with this proper depletion method, I explained the novel California method which, for want of a better name, we may call the beneficial consumptive-use method.

In my statement in the House on July 25 last year, I recognized that the expression "beneficial consumptive use" as a concept in western water law is of great significance, but explained that it was not intended primarily as a measure of volume, but rather as a measure of rightful use of water according to the meaning of the term in the Santa Fe compact. That term pertains to proper use of water in this basin, and it was not intended to be used as a measure of volume for accounting purposes. Therefore, I am convinced that the law intended each State to be charged for the quantity of water by which that State as a whole depletes the flow of the Colorado River, and that, of course, means diversion into the State, less the return flow from the State as a whole. That is the way the depletion must be figured.

Since July 25 last year I have heard much additional testimony from witnesses representing water agencies in southern California, all using the same fallacious arguments and manner of computation which they had previously used. Now, to my mind, Mr. Charles Carson, of Arizona, hit the California idea a fatal blow by his testimony recently before a congressional committee. He did this by pointing out that the Santa Fe compact, which is the basic law governing the fundamentals of this issue, was an authorized treaty between seven sovereign or quasi-sovereign States, on the division of the waters of the Colorado River. These seven States formally adopted the Santa Fe compact in their sovereign capacity, and, therefore, it is an instrument representing their sovereign will as States of the American Union.

No, this compact was not made by 30, 40, or 50 irrigation districts or by any other number of individual irrigation districts within the Colorado River Basin, for each of which this Federal law would require an individual computation of diversion less return flow to the river. How absurd the idea, both physically and legally. The Santa Fe compact is a contract entered into by these seven individual States. Each State as such is entitled to an amount of water from the Colorado River, which is rightfully coming to that State as a whole. The only logical and sensible measurement is the use of the depletion system as it applies to a State as a whole. When the compact says "diversion less return flow," it can only mean the amount of depletion of the river at the State boundary line just as it leaves the State, for only in this way can the exact and proper computation be made and charge be made against each State getting a share of that water.

This California proposal is to measure the Colorado River water by taking the sum total of all the amounts diverted in any way from the main stream or tributary, within a given State. But such computation becomes illogical and really impossible. There may be 10 or a dozen diversions from a small stream which is a tributary of the Colorado River within a State, and while it might be possible to measure the amount of water diverted at each of these diversions, it is impossible to tell how much of that diverted water gets back into the stream within that particular State. Water travels a long way underground. The only way to measure the return flow, whether it be from one diversion or 40 or more diversions within a State, is to measure the stream at the State line as it leaves the State, in order to see how much of the diverted water within that State has returned to the river within that State. Any other method is fantastic and leads to utter confusion, or in other words—it is impossible.

This brief statement of the Arizona-California controversy may be entirely too concise to give Members of Congress the essence of a half dozen committee hearings during the past 3 years. I do not expect many to read those voluminous books. Arizona claims approximately 2,800,000 acre-feet of water annually out of the main stream of the Colorado River and desperately needs every drop of it. The water is physically available, for more than 12,000,000 acre-feet of water has been flowing in the river between Arizona and California, and nearly 10,000,000 acre-feet after the California diversions have been taken out. In other words, nearly 10,000,000 acre-feet of Colorado River water is leaving the United States annually and going to Mexico.

I trust that my colleagues will give this great controversy on which the welfare of the Pacific Southwest depends, very close and painstaking study, and after that I have full confidence that the Congress of the United States will complete in equity and justice the great work of Colorado River development, now only half finished, which was begun by Congress many years ago.

Accomplishments of the Eighteth Congress

OF

HON. JOHN SANBORN

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. SANBORN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address I delivered over Stations KGEM, KTFI, KEIO, and KIFI in Idaho outlining the accomplishments of the Eightieth Congress:

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE EIGHTIETH CONGRESS

Good evening friends. This is your Congressman, JOHN SANBORN, speaking to you from Washington. This will be my last broadcast during this session of Congress. I invite you to join me in a review of some of the accomplishments of the Eightieth Congress during the past 2 years.

As the Members of this Congress assembled here in the Capital City, January 1947, to assume their legislative duties, the critical eyes of the Nation turned toward them. Newspaper writers were more than skeptical and predicted failure. Opponents suggested that the country would end in a recession because of the reactionary trend reflected in the elections. However, in spite of this pessimistic forecast, the Members have consistently worked toward a sound legislative program and have achieved remarkable success. It is to be admitted that errors have been made, but over the long pull the trend toward achievement of good, sound governmental practices has been consistent.

From the very start, a program has been pushed to stabilize our economy and give confidence to business and security to the workingman. Legislation was passed in the first few weeks outlawing the pending crippling portal-to-portal suits. These billion-dollar suits not only would have bankrupted nearly every affected business in the Nation, but would have penalized every employer who had made concessions to the worker. The Republican Eightieth Congress, unhesitatingly made the decision and passed corrective legislation.

The general trend during the past 2 years has been toward the reestablishment of good government. Inspired by the unified leadership of the Republican Party, a majority of Democrats joined with the majority party to pass corrective legislation relieving the stress and strain on our economy caused by favoritism to certain groups. The good of the country was again placed above the interests of selfish groups. The rank and file of labor was given freedom again, and the economy of the Nation was assured of uninterrupted growth.

The Taft-Hartley bill became law with a majority of Republicans and Democrats voting to override the President's veto. As a result of this, certain selfish labor leaders have been shorn of some of their power. Although they protested desperately, the Taft-Hartley law has added greatly to the welfare of the people of the Nation. It is not the answer to all our labor-management troubles but it does provide an avenue of settlement without severe loss of production, and gives the workingman an opportunity to take a hand in the settlement of his difficulties.

Perhaps the greatest and most far-reaching achievement of the Republican Eightieth Congress has been its check on the trend toward increased Federal regulations.

Upon the insistence of the American people in an election year, the President removed most of the controls on civilian consumption of goods in 1946. However, the reaction to this by the administration has been to insist that these controls be restored with more authority than before. Their insistence makes it clear that the lifting of controls was intended to be only temporary for political purposes. In nearly every vital message the President has made to Congress there has been a plea for the return of controls. The Republican Congress has resisted the return of these controls and insisted that our economy be permitted to prosper on the freedom that made it so great. As a result we have witnessed an unusual increase in productive activity and employment.

In 1945, the President advocated a war-manpower draft bill. The Republicans successfully opposed this legislation. In 1946, the Republicans in Congress successfully opposed a bill proposed by President Truman to draft into the Army any worker striking in a plant or industry that had been taken over by the Government. In 1947 and 1948, the President has continued to try to gain more control of the people and the Republican Congress has consistently opposed such action. The Eightieth Congress has received and met the greatest challenge ever to be handed to any Congress. The challenge to establish a lasting peace throughout the world is still with us, but thanks to the Eightieth Congress a step toward the achievement of this peace has been made.

The Members of Congress have realized that to achieve victory for the cause of freedom we must be no less realistic, no less courageous, and no less self-sacrificing than we were in the achievement of our great military and naval victories.

Our problems are many and complicated. We have a $260,000,000,000 public debt—the largest in history—to carry and pay. We have a tremendous Federal budget to cut back. We have a burdensome tax rate to be reduced. We have other impediments to sustained production to eliminate. Production has not yet balanced with demand, and prices are high—but a step toward achieving these aims has been made.

For the first time in nearly 16 years the Government is operating on a balanced budget—and this at the insistance of the Eightieth Congress.

For the first time in nearly 16 years, Congress has reduced the amount of money requested by the administration. For the first time in many years the people of the Nation have been given a tax reduction. The Republican Congress finally succeeded in securing enough support to override the President's veto of a tax-reduction bill.

Our internal difficulties are further complicated by the demands from abroad. These demands are not so much for money as for goods in terms of money. America faces its greatest challenge in the effort to maintain its free economic order and still assist the foreign countries to regain economic stability. I believe it is the responsibility of the United States not only to assist in furnishing goods and wealth, but it is our responsibility to be sure that we are not indirectly supporting foreign systems of government that will in the future undermine our free-enterprise system of economy. There are no simple, magic-wand solutions to these problems. The picture is complex.

An even greater tragedy than Europe is facing today would be for the United States to adopt the very methods of government that have contributed to Europe's desperate plight. It must be realized that Europe's problem is not solely economic, nor that it can be resolved by outside financial assistance alone. What has been happening in Europe is not just that they have been running out of goods in terms of dollars. They have also been running out of freedom, by too much government. That must not happen here.

There are those who today urge more government regulation and control as the solution to the problem which government regulation and control itself helped create. The Eightieth Congress has opposed every effort of the administration to increase the trend toward more Government control and regulation. If to be free, the rest of the world depends upon our strength, then we must remain strong. That can only be done by reemphasizing—not discarding nor ignoring—the very principles of Government that have been our source of strength.

In the last 14 years, the Federal Government has expanded from 521 agencies and bureaus to 1,141. The number of employees has increased from 582,000 to 2,000,000. The Eightieth Congress has started the trend toward decreasing such bureaus. Our country is now proceeding along the paths of less and less control. We do not want regimentation.

We have witnessed what has happened in other countries when socialism has taken over. Great Britain is slipping from her position as a leader in the world. Her domestic economy is crumbling and were it not for the subsidy of our American dollars, she would be forced to return to sane practices of government. Many substantial Britons have expressed the thought that our aid to them has been a terrible deterrent to their recovery by underwriting their socialistic activities. In Great Britain, 2,000,000 persons toil over 25,000 rules. Government control has become Britain's biggest industry and a standard music hall joke.

Consider the plight of the British. The Ministry of Food, with its rations, tells 47,000,000 Britons what to eat for breakfast, lunch, and dinner. The Board of Trade decides how much clothing they can buy. The Ministry of Health controls the building and repair of homes. The Ministry of Fuel determines which of them may drive an automobile, and where they can go in it. The Treasury prescribes which foreign countries they may visit. The Ministry of Agriculture has the last word on who can kill a pig. The Ministry of Supply parcels out steel and other supplies to industry. This exemplifies the ends to which governmental controls can lead us. The trend toward this as a future for the American people has been halted by the Eightieth Congress.

The Eightieth Congress has not forgotten its responsibility to the veterans who served so nobly during the late war and other wars. Since the Eightieth Congress convened in January 1947, 24 bills pertaining to veterans have become law:

Public Law 115, increasing the revolving fund in the Veterans' Administration from $1,500,000 to $3,000,000 for the purpose of making non-interest-bearing loans to disabled World War II veterans taking vocational rehabilitation courses.

Public Law 270, to provide a 20-percent pension increase for veterans of the Civil and Spanish-American Wars.

Public Law 254, to provide for the cash payment of terminal-leave bonds any time after September 1, 1947.

Public Law 338, to increase the minimum allowances payable to disabled veterans undergoing vocational rehabilitation under Public Law 16.

Public Law 411, to increase the subsistence allowances to veterans pursuing full-time educational training courses under the GI bill of rights. The measure increased such allowances from $65 to $75 a month for single persons, from $90 to $105 for veterans with one dependent, and to $120 for veterans with more than one dependent.

The Republican Eightieth Congress resumed their development program on reclamation projects. Critics of the Eightieth Congress have accused the Republicans of forgetting the West and of hamstringing reclamation development. This is not true. Under the leadership of the Eightieth Congress, reclamation development is going forward at an accelerated rate. Last year the Republican Congress—contrary to the propaganda put out by opponents—appropriated the largest amount of money ever given reclamation. To the critics, I would like to point out that historically, the Republican Party was the first to recognize the need for reclamation projects. This goes back to the administration of Theodore Roosevelt. Ever since that time, the Republican policy has been to foster such projects. During the first session of the Eightieth Congress generous appropriations for reclamation and flood-control projects were voted—larger sums than in previous Congresses.

The State of Idaho has received her share under this program. I am pleased to report to the people of Idaho that my requests for additional money for reclamation have been well recognized.

All major projects in Idaho are going forward toward early completion. The following is a brief summary of the appropriations authorized for Idaho during the second session of the Eightieth Congress:

Bureau of Reclamation for construction

Boise project, Idaho, Payette division	$2,325,000
Boise project, Idaho, Anderson Ranch Dam	5,800,000
Lewiston Orchards project	1,136,000
Minidoka project, surveys and preconstruction	147,500
Palisades project, contracts	2,000,000
Rathdrum project, Hayden Lake	109,500
Preston Bench project, Franklin County	453,000
Total	11,971,000

The Eightieth Congress also appropriated $351,000 for flood control on the Heise Roberts area, and $500,000 to begin construction on the Lucky Peak Reservoir.

I had the pleasure of being host to a large group of visiting members of the House Public Lands Committee last year. This group was favorably impressed and gave me good support for Idaho projects this year. This summer I hope other committee members can visit Idaho and learn more about the resources and needs of our State. Some of the Appropriations Committee have promised us a visit in September.

Under the pressure of the Eightieth Congress, investigations of fraud in Government were continued and startling discoveries were made. Such persons as General Meyers were exposed and properly punished.

By persuasion of the Republican Congress, the administration conceded there were a few Communists and fellow travelers in high Government offices. And as a result of this persuasion, the Communists and fellow travelers are being shown in their true colors—traitors of our Government. Senate and House hearings on the Mundt-Nixon bill have brought into the open some significant disclosures of Communist purposes. This bill does not attempt to outlaw the Communist Party, but it does bring its members out into the open for identification. The House and Senate brought the bill's bitterest opponents before their committees. What we have learned from such opponents is very valuable. Two such witnesses were William Z. Foster, chairman of the Communist Party in the United States, and Henry A. Wallace. Each took about the same line of argument. Mr. Foster left no doubt as to where his allegiance was placed. He stated he would not support the United States if it were attacked by the Soviet Union—that American Communists would not in any circumstances obey any of the proposed legislation restricting Communist activities—that American Communists would seek to end any war in which the United States and the Soviet Union might become engaged, on Soviet terms—that if drafted into the Army, American Communists have not yet decided whether they would obey or disobey military orders.

The Eightieth Congress has taken steps through committee work, to establish a stable agricultural economy. Investigation is proceeding toward the initiating of a program to provide security against collapse of farm prices. This will be worked out in the next Congress.

The Eightieth Congress has made an enviable and remarkable record. Every member of the majority party and every member of the minority party who put aside partisanship for the welfare of their country can take pride in the part they had in it.

I am looking forward to my return to Idaho after the session is over. Many of you have written about problems you want Congress to Consider. I hope to discuss these problems with you personally and to see your projects first hand for better understanding.

I want to thank the radio stations for providing me with this outlet to bring you my views on what is being accomplished by Congress.

Our Foreign Policy

OF
HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, when World War II was forced upon us, two momentous jobs facing the American people had to be done.

It was imperative that our soldiers must win the war. It was imperative our Chief Executive and the State Department handling foreign affairs must win the peace.

We were told that the war was being waged for the freedom of all countries and was a war to end all wars and to establish permanent world peace.

Over 300,000 of our finest American soldiers gave their lives and won the war. Over 1,000,000 were wounded, many of whom will never again be able-bodied. Our soldiers did the most effective job of fighting the world has ever witnessed. They did their part of the job. Their efforts backed up by the American people with production and taxes of over $300,000,000,000 finished the job. These veterans and the 140,000,000 American people are entitled to know why our Chief Executive, State Department, and diplomats have not completed their task; why they have not been able to bring peace to the world; why there is less freedom, less peace, and more fear today than in any peacetime in the history of the world.

Mr. Speaker, the fathers and mothers who gave their sons and daughters to the service, many of whom never returned, would like to have the answer to the above questions. Millions of the GI's who served all over the world and who are back in civilian life, including hundreds of thousands languishing in the hospitals would like to know why, when they won the war, those handling our foreign affairs have failed to win the peace.

Today, I shall give some facts and point out why we have lost the peace up to the present time, and are again concerned about another war. I shall point out some major political blunders which followed one after another during and at the close of the war by the State Department and the past and present Chief Executives in power, whose acts are in part responsible for their not winning the peace. I believe the people should have all the facts.

THE CONFERENCE OF CAIRO, EGYPT

Mr. Speaker, shortly after Japan declared war on the United States the late President Roosevelt and members of the State Department flew to Cairo for a conference with Arabian leaders and were met there by Chiang Kai-shek, head of the Chinese Government, whose millions of Chinese soldiers had borne the brunt of battle against Japan for years. It was important to keep Chiang Kai-shek in the war against Japan. His people wanted to ease up their efforts after 4 years of sacrifice and war.

Powerful financial interests in China were urging Chiang Kai-shek to ease off the fight against Japan, clean out and subdue the Communists in China, and largely leave the war against Japan to be fought by the United States.

THIS HAPPENED AT THE CAIRO CONFERENCE

The President pleaded with Chiang Kai-shek to stay in the fight and step it up. He promised that the rich, big province of Manchuria, rich in minerals and necessary to the life of China which had been overrun and occupied by Japan would be returned to China after the war. That the United States would furnish modern Springfield rifles, artillery, air power, and American officers to train his soldiers. Chiang Kai-shek finally agreed to continue in the fight and to step it up.

Mr. Speaker, nearly 3 years later at Yalta, when the war was coming to an end, in another conference, this time with Stalin, without a representative from the Chinese Government being invited or present, in order to persuade Russia at the close of the war when Germany was folding up to turn her armies in the east against Japan, the late President Roosevelt agreed to give Russia the two principal ports of Dairen and Port Arthur in Manchuria, control of the railroads which were the arteries of commerce, with a part of Sakhalin in Manchuria, the Kuril Islands east of Manchuria, and agreed that Russia should have the big Chinese state of Outer Mongolia which was the part of China largely controlled by the Chinese Communists. All of the above was promised to Chiang Kai-shek previously at Cairo. These are only some of the concessions made to Russia after we had won the war with the exception of dropping the two atomic bombs on Japan.

Russia was given this control in Manchuria and China, including one-half of Korea which is giving us a lot of trouble in Korea today, causing us to spend many millions of dollars a year and will doubtless ultimately turn Korea and China with 360,000,000 people over to the Communists, controlled by Moscow.

Mr. Speaker, after the war was over in 1946, the late President Roosevelt sent Gen. George Marshall, now Secretary of State, to China with instructions to insist that Chiang Kai-shek form a coalition government, taking in the Communists, giving them representation according to their strength.

Chiang Kai-shek had put off on the promise of the late President, the cleaning up of the Communists in his own country to help us fight the war, with the understanding that he was to get back the territory of Manchuria taken by Japan and was to continue to have the cooperation of the United States Government.

When Chiang Kai-shek, in charge of the real China, refused to accept the plan of General Marshall, the United States Government stopped shipping ammunition necessary for the Springfield rifles and the modern arms we had given China after the conference at Cairo. Chiang Kai-shek had to go back and open up the old munition factories of 1925 and gather up what old guns were possible which would shoot that ammunition. He needed special parts for American trucks. The government of China had on deposit in New York $17,000,000 in cash to purchase in the United States ammunition, special parts for trucks, and other material necessary for war. Notwithstanding she was willing to pay cash, an embargo was placed on the filling of these orders by this Administration and the State Department. Only within the last few months has the embargo been lifted on the $17,000,000.

Gen. Douglas MacArthur, in a long conference with one of the able Members of this Congress who visited him last fall in Japan, said, and I quote:

> Our failure to support the government of China immediately and vigorously at the end of the war, will turn out to be one of the biggest single blunders in the history of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, at that time we had idle enough trucks, light and heavy artillery, munitions of all kinds, and airplanes which were rusting out in the climate near there in Okinawa, Guam, and the Philippines, which if turned over to China, and we had not stopped flow of ammunition so they could use our modern arms we had given them, to enable Chiang Kai-shek at that time to win the war against the Communists, he could have defeated and pushed back Russian communism. He could have established a strong Chinese Government which is absolutely necessary to make the billions worth while we have put into Japan, out of which we seek to make a nation under the leadership of General MacArthur following the plan of the Government of the United States. By our acts and policy we sacrificed China. We broke our word with a nation with which we have been on very friendly terms for 100 years. We made it possible for Russia to extend her power. We are feeling the result of that power in Korea today. We made it possible for Russia to become a great menace to Japan, and particularly to the Philippines, and a greater threat to Alaska near the northeastern boundary of Russia. They further agreed Russia should sit in with a Board to help direct MacArthur in his administration of Japan, and the general deserves the thanks of the American people for rebelling with such vehemence that this mistake was avoided.

Mr. Speaker, the above are only a few of the true facts which also brought an indelible stain against the United States Government. Now, at this late day, China this year is given by the United States $800,000,000 which I fear will be wasted and lost because we appeased Russia till it's too late. China will most likely fall to the Communists and Russia.

THE TEHRAN CONFERENCE

Mr. Speaker, the next week after the Cairo, Egypt, conference, the President with his advisers from the State Department stopped off at Tehran for another conference. There they met Mr. Stalin and made the deal to partition Poland, notwithstanding at the beginning of this war under the articles of the Atlantic Charter one of the purposes set out and agreed to by the late President Roosevelt and Winston Churchill was, "that every government, whether large or small, after the close of the war, should have its present boundaries kept intact, that it should be free to set up its own government, without any interference whatsoever by a foreign power."

They agreed at Tehran that Russia should have a large part of the eastern half of Poland, and in order to compensate Poland who again was not consulted, Poland was to move west and take a lesser acreage from Germany. The result was that Russia was put in a position to absolutely take over Poland which she has later done, converting it into a more oppressive and totalitarian Communist government than exists in Russia today. This Christian nation was turned over in a secret conference to Russia. The late President Roosevelt, on being questioned after he returned from the Tehran conference, made a public statement that no secret deals were made and the people of the United States and the Members of Congress did not know until months later that Poland had been given away in part, and finally in fact in whole. Poland and China expected us to keep our word. We did not keep it. Then later on, when we were certain Germany would be defeated, a most important conference was held at Yalta.

THE YALTA CONFERENCE

Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding that all small nations were guaranteed freedom under the Atlantic Charter, the facts came out later that it was agreed to at Yalta that Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Rumania, Hungary, Bulgaria, Albania, and Poland were to be considered as a part of the Russian sphere of influence. This is one of the reasons that Russia since the close of the war has insisted that she had been given special rights under the Yalta agreement to regard these countries to some extent as satellite nations, and as being under special commercial and trade relations to her.

Mr. Speaker, at the conference at Yalta it was further agreed that some of these satellite nations I have just named, and Austria and Germany, were to pay in war reparations to Russia an amount of over $12,000,000,000. They were in fact mortgaged in these agreements to pay financial reparations to Russia that would wreck all of these governments. This added to Russia's power over them.

At Yalta we agreed to the dismantling of nearly 1,000 industrial and war plants to go largely to Russia. We agreed that about 42 percent of all German reparations should go to Russia. We agreed that Germany alone should pay Russia over $10,000,000,000 in reparations. We agreed for the purpose of occupation to give Russia, in addition to the large part of eastern Germany Poland had taken, the rich agricultural eastern and northeastern part of Germany which completely surrounded the capital city of Berlin. England got the great industrial Ruhr section in the west. We took the southern part and France took some of the southwest part for the purposes of occupation and administration under the various governments.

Eisenhower later said Russia got the breadbasket, England the industrial section, and we got the scenery.

WE HELD OUR TROOPS BACK

Mr. Speaker, to give Russia the honor of capturing Berlin, the capital city of Germany, we made the great mistake of holding our troops back. That was a colossal blunder. The Germans, who knew they were beaten, would probably have surrendered with hardly any more loss of life to the Americans, and we could have occupied most of the territory now held by the Russians and occupied the capital city of Berlin. Had we not held the troops back, we would be in a strong position in Germany today, instead of a very weak position that could touch off another war.

Had we done this and some other things there would be no stopping by the Russians of our trains, airplanes and trucks entering Berlin to the great embarrassment of General Clay and the United States as has been happening over the months past. We stopped our troops at Pilsen in Czechoslovakia, not many miles from the capital city of Prague of a million population, in order to let the Russians have the honor of coming in and liberating the capital city of Prague which had been ready and waiting to surrender to the American troops for days. That is one of the reasons that Russia is in charge of Czechoslovakia today.

Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest mistakes made at the Yalta Conference was the agreement which was carefully worked out and was later made a part of the United Nations Charter at San Francisco, giving the big five nations the single veto power.

Governor Stassen and others representing our Government at San Francisco, and the transcript of record of that convention will substantiate my statement "that the veto text referred to written and agreed to at Yalta was written into the United Nations Charter at San Francisco later without even the change of a comma or the crossing of a "t"."

Through and by the veto power agreed to at Yalta, Russia has been able to, and has prevented agreements on peace treaties with Germany and Austria, and has practically rendered the United Nations impotent to carry out its purpose and effort to bring peace to the world.

THE POTSDAM CONFERENCE

Mr. Speaker, at the Potsdam Conference, after the war ended, all the things we agreed to at Cairo, Egypt, Tehran, and Yalta were approved by President Truman, previously agreed to by the late President Roosevelt. At the conferences of Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam, history will record that Stalin and Russia gained the greatest victories at the peace table in the history of the world.

History will record that after the United States made it possible through manpower and the great loss of life and all the billions of dollars we spent for equipment in the defeat of Hitler, that we, as a leading nation at the peace table, really by our own acts were largely responsible for putting Russia in the driver's seat in western Europe. Put her in a position to prevent the agreement to peace treaties and the rehabilitation of Europe up to the present time. We hope not, but history may later record that we lost the peace of the world at Yalta.

Mr. Speaker, these mistakes were, of course, not in any way willful or deliberate. They were made because of overconfidence in the good faith of the Russian leaders. The President and the Secretary of State knew that Stalin, Molotov, and the 17 men of the Politbureau who run the Government of Russia with an iron hand, rode into power over a bloody trail liquidating and starving to death millions of Russian citizens who opposed them. It is hard to justify the overconfidence of those handling our foreign affairs in dealing with these men who sacrificed the lives of millions of their own people to obtain their positions of power.

Their past record should have been a warning to our officials in approaching agreements.

These mistakes were made, to some extent, through the influence of too many left wingers, and doubtless a number of real Communists who had during the struggle of war, worked their way into the State Department. Granted we had some able men at the top level in the State Department, yet we must realize top men must to some extent depend for information from those in the lower levels. These mistakes we made in part was the result of our consistent policy of appeasement to Russia. These constant mistakes were made because we had a woefully weak State Department at a time when we needed the strongest State Department in our history.

THE MORGENTHAU PLAN PREVENTED GERMANY'S RECOVERY

At the behest of Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau at a conference which he attended with Mr. Churchill, and the late President Roosevelt, at Quebec, while the war was on, they were persuaded to adopt the Morgenthau plan for the control of Germany after the war, which would prevent the recovery of Germany as an industrial nation and convert it into an agricultural nation.

Russia, which at Yalta, was given the breadbasket of Germany, had been placed in a position to starve western Germany and she did her best to do it. For over 2 years our Army of occupation attempted to carry out the Morgenthau plan, at a cost to the taxpayers of the United States for food to help feed the German people of over $500,000,000 a year.

Mr. Speaker, finally France, England, and the United States in late 1947, to a certain extent agreed to discard the Morgenthau plan, so that Germany might rebuild under proper safeguards for peace as an industrial nation. This section had always been the industrial part of western Europe and was never adapted to farming and agriculture. Through the Morgenthau plan we, in fact, held down and prevented the rehabilitation of Germany and Europe, and was thereby compelled to help feed her people for the past 3 years. There is now some hope for the recovery of Germany which is absolutely essential to a prosperous western Europe.

When Germany is allowed to manufacture, she can then feed her people through her exports and lift the burden from the American taxpayers.

After these major mistakes in foreign policy, one after another, one should not be surprised that out of many peace conferences we have subsequently held in Europe, no peace treaties or agreements worthwhile have been made with the exception of Italy. They have been failures because unwittingly we put Russia in a position of control where she compelled these attempts to be failures.

Realizing too late the great blunder in giving Russia such control, we have spent over a billion dollars on Greece and Turkey to try to stop the encroachment of communism. Over a billion dollars on Italy, billions to France and England, and finally twenty billions recently voted under the Marshall plan, for what? To try to stop the expansion of this giant we helped to build up through these mistakes.

Mr. Speaker, no one knows what the answer will be. I told you how we had helped to wreck China through our foreign policy. With the continued gains of the northern Chinese Communists largely supported by Russia in the background, the State Department recently suggested that we should now give China $800,000,000 and it was voted. Now when China is just about gone we try to help, rather than 3 years ago when much of the best authority on the Chinese question say it is now absolutely too late. That now all the millions we put in will not save the Chinese Government from communism. That is the result of our foreign policy in dealing with China.

The fact is we have had no consistent foreign policy.

Mr. Speaker, because of the major mistakes and by not having a strong consistent foreign policy we have traveled down the road toward the shadows of war, unfortunately out and away from the sunshine of world peace which we and the nations of the world thought we could build under the United Nations. Had we not helped Russia on to such a position of power at the end of the war, there would not be the threat of war today.

THE PALESTINE PROBLEM

We have changed our policy with reference to Palestine three different times in the last few months.

First. President Truman insisted on a partition of Palestine through the United Nations and forced it through largely against the advice of the military leaders of the Nation.

Second. Within a few months he decided that was a mistake and rescinded the action. He insisted, when the British was giving up its mandate, that the Arabs and the Jews must not recognize the former partition of Palestine, that the Jews must not set up a Jewish state. The Jews, naturally losing all confidence in our foreign policy, set up a Jewish state.

Third. The day before they set it up Secretary of State Marshall warned against it, and told them they were on their own if they did.

Fourth. At 6 o'clock the same date President Truman overrode the position of Secretary of State Marshall, and without any notice to the American delegates of the United Nations, who for days had been attempting to prevent this thing from happening, took upon himself the responsibility of recognizing the Jewish state, of course, apparently for political gain in the coming election.

The military leaders opposed the Palestine partition on the grounds of national defense and the recognition of Palestine as a nation for the same reason.

They pointed out that the greatest oil supply in the world which had been used in the last World War was located in the Arab and Moslem nations, in Arabia, Iraq, Iran and other Middle East nations. They and others in Washington who have pledged to send countless millions of barrels of oil under the Marshall plan to rehabilitate western Europe expected largely to use this oil. The military strategy of the United States and Great Britain was to keep on friendly terms and through American and British capital to continue to develop as they had in the past, this great oil production in the Middle East countries. In the event of a war with Russia they realized that we needed to keep on friendly relations with these oil-producing countries so that we could continue to get their oil.

Military men have said openly that we must have this oil for the American fleet, a part of which has been in the Mediterranean for months. Military men wanted to remain on such friendly terms with these Middle East countries that we would be welcome not only to the oil but to occupy bases from which we could operate bombing fleets in the event of a war with Russia.

I am not arguing the merit or the demerits of the creation of a nation in Palestine. I think the people generally would like to see a home for the Jewish people established there where they could develop the country and live in happiness and peace as a nation. Possibly that can be worked out; at least, I sincerely hope so. I only refer to this Palestine matter in an effort to show the inconsistency and lack of any stable foreign policy on the part of the State Department and this administration.

Everyone in Washington knows that the vacillating policy of this administration for the past 2 years on the part of the President is the result of political expediency. Those in the Zionist movement, the military officials, and all Members of Congress realize that the hope of votes has been the predominating factor with reference to our policy toward Palestine.

Mr. Speaker, I have done careful research in an effort to correlate and detail some of our major foreign policy moves so that the people may better understand why we have not made greater progress toward world peace. It is their government and they should have all the facts in looking to the future.

Regardless of these serious mistakes of judgment of the past, we must continue to hope for and work toward peace. I do not believe a nation that has spurned and turned its back against God and all the teachings of Christianity, in the final show-down, can or will develop sufficient strength to cope with or seriously challenge the Christian Nations of the world. Undoubtedly Russia in time will realize the stupidity and folly of such a course.

Statement by William T. Faricy, President of American Association of Railroads

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement by William T. Faricy, president, Association of American Railroads, before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, June 14, 1948, in connection with the national transportation inquiry:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my name is William T. Faricy. I am president of the Association of American Railroads. I appear here in response to the committee's invitation and to offer certain observations with regard to some of the statements made before your committee on June 8, 1948, by Mr. Robert R. Young. Mr. Young advocated as a major step to be taken in the interest of a railroad system adequate to the defense requirements of the Nation that the Association of American Railroads should be broken up. This makes it appropriate that I reply.

As targets for Mr. Young's criticism, the Association of American Railroads and the railroad industry are in very respectable company. In his single appearance before your committee, Mr. Young excoriated the President of the United States and his Cabinet, with special attention to the State Department, the Congress of the United States, and some of its most distinguished Members, both political parties and all the leading candidates for the presidency, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Office of Defense Transportation, and the Interstate Commerce Commission, the last of which Mr. Young said ought to be "wiped out."

The distinguished public servants and governmental bodies upon whom Mr. Young pours his condemnation need no defense at my hands. I shall, therefore, confine my remarks to facts within the field of railroading—facts which may be easily verified by all persons who, like the chairman and members of this committee, are interested in seeking the truth.

THE ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN RAILROADS

Mr. Young's contention that the Association of American Railroads should be broken up in the interest of the national defense makes it pertinent to inquire what the association is, what is does, and what was its record in the war just closed.

The association is the organization of the principal railroads for the more efficient handling of matters of common concern in the whole field of railroading. Overwhelmingly the greater part of its work is in the field of operations, maintenance, and research. The association does for all the railroads those things which either must be done by a common agency, or which can be done better, more efficiently, and more economically by such an agency than they could be by each railroad separately.

Mr. Young does not lack opportunity for acquaintance with this work of the association and its value. Chesapeake & Ohio officers are members of many of the association's committees, and take an important part in its activities. Indeed, except for public relations work, the Chesapeake & Ohio participates financially and otherwise in 85 percent of the activities of the Association of American Railroads.

In his capacity as chairman of the Federation for Railway Progress, Mr. Young has had equal opportunity to know the contribution of the Association of American Railroads to the defense of the Nation. The Federation for Railway Progress publishes a monthly magazine. Last year that magazine invited Maj. Gen. Charles P. Gross, Chief of the Army Transportation Corps during World War II, to contribute an article on the subject Importance of the Railroads to the National Defense. General Gross wrote such an article and submitted it. It did not appear as scheduled. Several months passed. Finally, General Gross inquired and was informed that the article would be published only if he would agree to the deletion of certain passages because they did not comply with the policy of the federation.

The parts the federation wanted to delete praised the job done by the railroads and the Association of American Railroads. General Gross refused to delete these paragraphs, so the article remains unpublished. Among the paragraphs which the federation sought to suppress are these, which I quote with the permission of General Gross:

"Although the American railroads had less equipment in 1941 than in 1917, it was better equipment. Their physical plant generally was greatly improved, and as an industry they were much better organized to meet the emergency. In particular, the establishment of a strong central organization, the Association of American Railroads, was a noteworthy improvement. This organigation, which had broad authority to act for its members, maintained headquarters in Washington so that ccoperation between the Army Transportation Corps and the railroads was greatly simplified. As a matter of fact, the association's military transportation section was located in the Pentagon and functioned as much as an agent of the Army as the railroads. This same close coordination existed between representatives of the AAR and the Transportation Corps throughout the country.

"In conclusion, it may be said that the American railroads fulfilled their transportation mission so well that the full war might of the United States as a Nation in arms was brought to bear on our enemies to achieve overwhelming victory. They took in stride the ever-expanding load clear through to the end. They overcame their obstacles by strongly united action and by constant improvements in efficiency. Courage, energy, initiative, decision, cooperation, the will to do, were in their fiber. They knew the vital character of time. They, too, had their Pattons."

As to whether the Association of American Railroads should be broken up in the interest of national defense, I really need do no more than quote this testimony of the distinguished soldier whose opportunities for observation of the contribution of our association to the successful prosecution of the war were unsurpassed. But perhaps the committee would be interested also in the equally positive words of Rear Adm. William B. Young, Chief of the Navy Bureau which dealt with transportation, who declared that "with the cooperation * * * of the Association of American Railroads, they [the railroads] performed wonders." Col. J. Monroe Johnson, Director of the Office of Defense Transportation, described the association as "indispensable," and the first Director of the ODT, the late Joseph B. Eastman, ascribed much of the credit for what he called the "excellent performance" of the railroads to the coordinating work of the association.

This coordinating work is essential in time of peace, as well as in war. It is not commonly realized to what an extent every railroad of the United States is in a very real partnership with every other railroad in the production of transportation service. From the 1860's, when freight cars first began to move off the lines of owning railroads, there has gradually evolved a system of handling through traffic in interchanged cars which has become the very foundation of the Nation-wide, and in fact continent-wide, commerce of North America.

This interchange of traffic would be impossible without cooperation in developing uniform standards and practices of many kinds, and without closely coordinated working arrangements of many sorts on all railroads. The necessity for such uniformity began to be recognized as early as 1867, when the first of the several organizations which finally came together to make up the Association of American Railroads was formed. The work of these coordinating groups which were responsible for such results as standard time, standard gauge of track, standard automatic safety couplers, standard brakes, and all the other standards in facilities and methods which it takes to have a continent-wide flow of commerce, is carried on today by the various departments, divisions, and sections of the Association of American Railroads. Without such coordination, we could not have the transportation which is at the foundation of our productive capacity, and certainly we could not put and keep these railroads in condition to meet the needs of national defense.

This association and its work have been the subject of constant misrepresentation at the hands of Mr. Young. A recent example is to be found in his testimony here on June 8. On the day before your committee had heard testimony from Dr. J. H. Parmelee, vice president of our association and director of its bureau of railway economics, and from Mr. J. H. Aydelott, vice president of the association in charge of its operations-maintenance department, as to the postwar condition of our railroads, and their readiness to meet their responsibilities in emergency. I shall not repeat what was said in their careful and accurate statements, other than to recall that they pointed to the need of the railroads for more cars and the strenuous efforts which the railroads are making to get them.

Mr. Young, as reported at page 249 of the stenographic transcript of his testimony, had this to say, with obvious reference to the statements of the representatives of the Association of American Railroads:

"And they came down here and testified yesterday that they cannot buy new equipment. That is not true. There is not a railroad in America today that cannot go out and buy all of the new equipment it wants and borrow all of the money it needs at 2¼ percent, almost as low a yield basis as the Government pays on its own bonds. Even the bankrupt railroads can buy all of the equipment they want. And when they come in here and testify that they cannot, they are testifying to something that is not so."

It is an all too familiar device to distort what has been said by others and then charge untruth. Neither Dr. Parmelee nor Mr. Aydelott testified that the railroads are unable to finance the purchase of new equipment. They did testify that the railroads are prevented by shortages of material from obtaining delivery of new cars in the requisite volume—a very different thing indeed. Thus, after stating that the railroads, at the close of World War II, "undertook a program of enlarging and improving their freight-car supply," Dr. Parmelee observed:

Mr. Aydelott pointed out to your committee that on June 1, 1948, the railroads and private car lines had 127,689 new freight cars on order, including programed production at railroad shops; that they had never had fewer than 100,000 cars on order at any time within the past 12 months; that a minimum of 12,000 new freight cars per month is required if the car supply of this Nation is to be revitalized within a reasonable period of time; and he added:

"It is evident, therefore, that the immediate and imperative need is the availability of steel for, and the construction of, at least 12,000 new freight cars per month—this is additional to the requirements of steel for current maintenance and repair." "Here," he said, "is the principal bottleneck which retards restoration of our transportation system to a condition suitable to the prospect of possible future national emergencies."

It is thus clear that the association witnesses truthfully portrayed the situation in their testimony and that Mr. Young's charge of falsification finds its only basis in distortion of what had been said by them. I do not wish to overemphasize this incident—we in the railroad industry have become quite accustomed to Mr. Young's disregard of any niceties in the direction of accuracy of statement. But it has seemed to me worth while to bring the matter to your attention as generally indicative of the degree of reliance to be placed on his testimony when he inveighs against the association and those who represent it before your committee.

I was not invited here, as I understand it, to repeat the testimony of those who have appeared for the Association of American Railroads and have so carefully and thoroughly dealt with the condition and requirements of the railroads. I am here to discuss the allegations and assertions of Mr. Young so far as they pertain to the association and its activities. In doing so, I shall have occasion to discuss a number of topics—railroad research, for example, railroad car supply and use, rates, and what Mr. Young calls conspiracies and combinations.

RAILROAD RESEARCH

Mr. Young claims for the Chesapake & Ohio a virtual monopoly of research in the railroad field. The facts are that the Association of American Railroads, and its predecessor organizations going back more than 60 years, have carried forward research into every phase of railroading. Today the association is carrying on some 300 specific research projects. In addition, individual railroads and groups of railroads are engaged in research on problems peculiar to their own particular operations. For example, a group of nine principal coal-carrying railroads, of which Chesapeake & Ohio is but one, are engaged in the development of a gas turbine locomotive to burn powdered coal. At the same time, another railroad, in oil-producing territory, is experimenting with a gas turbine locomotive to burn oil. I mention these merely as examples of the sort of activity being carried on by individual railroads.

As for the Association of American Railroads, it maintains a research center and laboratory in Chicago, which it is rapidly outgrowing. Plans are well under way to house the laboratory in its own buildings upon the campus of one of the midwestern technological institutions. This, however, is but the center of widespread activity, which includes experimental work being carried forward for the association in a number of university and commercial laboratories, in test installations at various locations over the country, and in the field.

Perhaps the committee would be interested in a brief outline of just one phase of one project as a sample of the sort of work which has been going on for years and is going on today more extensively and with greater intensity than ever before.

Nearly 20 years ago, the railroads and the steel companies undertook joint research into certain causes of rail breakage, with the laboratory work carried on at the University of Illinois and field tests throughout the country. As a result of this study, the rail being rolled today is only one-fourth as likely to break and its service life has been materially increased. At the same time, and working along similar lines, every other element of track structure has been under study. Laboratory work on track structure is being carried on for the association at four universities and technological institutions, and there are in service on many railroads experimental stretches of track in which these elements are under study. The performance of these test tracks under varying conditions is being carefully checked by research personnel of the Association of American Railroads, using the most complete and up-to-date electrical stress measuring instruments.

One more example. Some time this summer there will start running on a 68-mile stretch of track in Illinois a freight train which will include five cars equipped as rolling laboratories, filled with scientific observing and recording instruments. The train will be run at various controlled speeds up to 90 miles an hour. On each test run, a different type of freight car truck, with different devices for smoothing the ride of the car, will be installed. These AAR tests, which are a continuation of similar tests inaugurated before the war, but which had to be suspended during the war, will give us data, we hope, from which it will be possible to improve greatly the riding qualities of freight cars.

The real test of railroad research, however, is not what is done or not done about some specific item or part of the railroad machine. The real test is in the over-all operating results of the machine as a whole. It is significant that as a result of research carried on between the two world wars, and the investment made in improvements, the railroads were able during the Second World War to carry a freight traffic load 74 percent greater than that of the First World War and a volume of passenger traffic 100 percent greater, and to do it without the congestion and delays of the earlier period. They did it, moreover, with one-fourth fewer men, one-third fewer locomotives, one-fourth fewer freight cars, and one-fourth fewer passenger cars. But these fewer cars and engines were better cars and engines. They ran on better tracks. Their movements were controlled and guided by better signals and communications. They had the use of better terminals, and were serviced in better shops. The net result was that the average freight car during World War II produced twice as much transportation per day as in the First World War, while the average freight train for each hour it was on the road turned out more than twice as much transportation service.

And since the war the same sort of performance has continued. Last year the railroads loaded more tons than were ever loaded before in any year, whether in war or in peace. They moved more carloads of freight than in any of the war years, and did it with fewer freight cars. They moved more tons more miles than in any peacetime year, 46 percent more than in the prewar peak year of 1929. They moved more tons of coal than were ever moved before. Thy successfully moved, right up to the capacity of elevator storage, the greatest wheat crop in the history of the world, as right now they are beginning to move the second greatest wheat crop ever known.

This impressive record of railroad performance is the direct result of railroad research work, carried out intensively for many years, and still actively under way. Much remains to be done, but past achievements will be continued and surpassed in the future.

CAR SUPPLY AND CAR USE

Another group of Mr. Young's allegations centers around matters of car supply and car use. Mr. Young makes much of the point that there is no difficulty in financing car building through equipment-trust issues. Nobody disputes that point. He makes light of material shortages and production difficulties in the postwar period. For the relatively small production of freight cars he has a simpler explanation. "The same group that run the railroads," he says on pages 271-2 of the transcript, "run the equipment companies, and they want the steel to go to the automotive, automobile industry, and other industries, and they are deliberately keeping it away from the railroads." Such a charge, offered without any supporting evidence whatever, is not of a nature to deserve serious attention. It is interesting, however, to note that the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway, which Mr. Young runs, and which presumably he would exclude from his charge of deliberately keeping materials away from the railroads, has had no better fortune in securing the new equipment ordered since the war than have the other railroads of the country. Indeed, its efforts have been even less successful than those of the other railroads. At the end of the war the Chesapeake & Ohio had on order 3,000 freight cars and since then has ordered 10,690, making a total of 13,690 cars. Of these, it has secured delivery on 4,241, or 31 percent. The railroads of class I other than Chesapeake & Ohio—those which are alleged by Mr. Young to be averse to ordering cars and to be deliberately keeping them from being delivered—had 34,498 freight cars on order at the end of the war and have ordered 200,523 since, or a total of 234,991. Of these, they have secured delivery of 134,873, or 57.4 percent.

The facts of the matter are that the railroads, with the assistance of the Office of Defense Transportation and of Senator CLYDE REED'S subcommittee, have made and are still making every possible effort to secure the steel and other materials needed for building cars, both by the contract builders and in the railroads' own shops. The production of new freight cars has exceeded 9,000 per month, but has not yet reached the minimum goal of 10,000 cars per month. The goal ought to be at least 12,000 new cars per month. The bottleneck is steel, and if this committee can join Senator REED'S subcommittee and the Office of Defense Transportation in helping the railroads and the car builders get more steel, it will make an important contribution to preparation for any war emergency.

Mr. Young talked to the committee at some length about a standardized boxcar as a measure of improvement in the car supply. To hear Mr. Young tell the story, one would think that this was a Chesapeake & Ohio achievement. It was known in the railroad industry for some 2 years before such cars were ordered by any railroad that the builder was at work on such a design. Indeed, the Chesapeake & Ohio was not the first railroad which bought this particular type of car, and certainly is not entitled to claim credit for its origination.

Mr. Young imputes to the Association of American Railroads and the Interstate Commission "diabolical cleverness" in handling the subject of per diem car rental in such fashion as to "discourage car buying." Such a statement ignores the facts to which I have already adverted, namely, that the railroads now have on order more than 125,000 new freight cars and are unable, by reason of material shortages, to get delivery of as many as 10,000 cars per month. Certainly any deficiency in car supply cannot be attributed to a lack of buying orders.

If there be any relationship between the per diem rate of car hire and the acquisition or nonacquisition of new cars, there has been little opportunity for such relationship to assert itself for nearly 20 years past. In the decade before the war the existence of a large surplus of cars controlled the car-buying activities of the railroads. From the beginning of the war, to date, the railroads' orders for cars have consistently exceeded the ability of the car builders to supply them.

The per diem rental charge is, of course, a necessary incident to the free interchange of freight cars. The current rental rate for the use of a freight car, when on the line of a railroad other than the owning railroad, is $1.50 per car per day, which is 50 percent higher than the rate in effect as late as January 31, 1945. The rate was established by a vote of the individual railroad companies, taken through the machinery of the Association of American Railroads, with each company voting in proportion to its ownership of freight cars. Some railroads think it is too high; others, too low. There are cases pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission to resolve this question.

Mr. Young is equally misleading in his reference to the purchase of passenger cars. He states that in the past 12 months only 341 rail passenger cars were ordered by 131 railroads; that is, by all class I railroads other than the Chesapeake & Ohio. I do not know where Mr. Young obtained his figures, or to what period of 12 months they are supposed to apply. However, reports filed monthly by all class I railroads with the Car Service Division of the Association of American Railroads tell quite a different story. Briefly, the background of that story is this:

We start with the fact that on September 1, 1945, the first of the month following VJ-day, class I railroads, other than the Chesapeake & Ohio and the Pere Marquette, had 878 new passenger-train cars on order. These orders had been placed toward the end of the war with the hope of obtaining early delivery after the war was concluded. From September 1, 1945, to May 1, 1948, a total of 3,074 additional orders were placed. Thus, orders to May 1 of this year for new passenger-train cars for postwar delivery total 3,952. Of that number, 2,049 cars, or 52 percent, had been delivered and installed in service up to May 1, 1948, leaving 1,903 cars still on order. At the monthly rate of deliveries for the 12 months preceding May 1, it will take more than 18 months to obtain all the new pasenger-train cars on order by these railroads other than the Chesapeake & Ohio.

Turning now to the last 12 months for which we have complete figures, here is what we find: On May 1, 1947, railroads other than the Chesapeake & Ohio had unfilled orders for 2,069 new passenger-train cars. In the succeeding 12 months, 1,238 of these cars were installed, leaving 831 yet to come. However, on May 1, 1948, there were 1,903 cars on order, not including the Chesapeake & Ohio orders. By simple arithmetic, it appears, therefore, that 1,072 new passenger-train cars were ordered by railroads other than the Chesapeake & Ohio in the latest 12-month period of record. This is three times the figure given by Mr. Young.

It was not until 1947, after many other railroads had placed large orders, that the Chesapeake & Ohio entered the market in a substantial way for the class of equipment. This tardiness of Mr. Young's part in placing orders has put him even further behind the procession in securing delivery of new cars. Whereas the railroads which placed orders more promptly had secured up to May 1, 1948, delivery of more than 2,000 cars, or 52 percent of their postwar car orders. Mr. Young's road had secured delivery of only 24 cars, or less than 7 percent of its postwar orders. Mr. Young's most recent publicly announced action in respect of new passenger-train cars is to cancel one-third of his orders.

To hear Mr. Young, one might suppose that the modern passenger train originated with him, but the streamlined passenger train was first developed 14 years ago, among the western railroads. By the beginning of the Second World War, approximately 150 such trains were in service in all sections of the country. Their growth was interrupted by the war, but there are now about double that number, running at least 100,000 miles a day. The Chesapeake & Ohio has installed only two such trains, the Pere Marquette streamliners, which have been in service only since 1946, performing a total of 608 miles of service per day.

Mr. Young's protestations of leadership in the sleeping car field are equally hollow. Up to June 1, 1948, he had yet to put in service on his own railroad a single sleeping car of any type other than those which he denounces as "rolling tenements."

"COMBINATIONS" AND "CONSPIRACIES"

Mr. Young talked frequently and at length before your committee about what he called combines, which he said were trying to run him out of the railroad business. He even told an entirely fanciful story of how the Association of American Railroads "called in all of their 131 public relations experts a year ago and asked them to divert all their energies to killing off this new Federation for Railway Progress." At another point he announced to your committee that "they"—this mysterious "they" who he says have "been trying to get me out for 10 years"—"they are starting a new campaign that is about to break in tomorrow morning's papers, to get me out."

Melodrama of this sort is hardly to be taken seriously, but I should like to say for the record that there is nothing, absolutely nothing, in these repeated stories about the "131 railroad combine," the "131 monopoly," and the like. I presume that what Mr. Young means by the "131 combine" is the Association of American Railroads. I have told you earlier what that association is, what it does, and what its services mean to this country, especially in times of national emergency. Any charge that the association is Wall Street dominated, or banker dominated, or run in the special interest of any particular sectional, or other group, is absolutely false. There isn't a word of truth in it.

The association is in no sense a monopoly. It has no power to control its members, and no power to impose its will upon anyone else. Its governing body is a board of directors, chosen by the railroads of the eastern, southern, and western regions—six from the East, four from the South, seven from the West. On that board each member has a vote, and only one vote. The vote of a member from one of the smaller roads counts for just as much as the votes of the members from the very largest.

The board of directors cannot control the action of the membership, and neither the action of the board nor the entire membership can control or compel the action of any individual member. The plan of organization of the Association of American Railroads provides that:

"Nothing in this plan shall in any way prohibit or restrain any member road from acting individually and independently of the association or of any and all other member roads with respect to any of the matters covered hereby, and the right of individual and independent action is expressly reserved to each member road."

The per diem case before the Commission which I mentioned a few minutes ago is a concrete example of the unhesitating and unrestrained exercise of the right thus preserved in the plan.

Mr. Young alleges also some sort of vague and undefined conspiracy on the part of the railroads to divert wartime tonnage from the port of Boston and concentrate its movement through the port of New York. The distribution of war traffic among the several ports is a matter for determination by the military. The railroads do not determine where the tonnage shall move. Within the limits of available facilities, there is no railroad reason why any distribution of traffic among the ports which the military might determine upon should not be made. Incidentally, the figures on traffic through the port of Boston during the Second World War which Mr. Young furnished the committee are grossly in error. General export traffic through the port of Boston during the 4 years of the war amounted to 212,352 carloads. If the movement through Boston had been only one-half of 1 percent of the total through all ports, as alleged by Mr. Young, it would have amounted to only 28,694 carloads—approximately one-eighth of the actual movement. The traffic through Boston was some 700 percent more than Mr. Young would have the committee believe.

Probably the most extraordinary conspiracy which Mr. Young imagines in the railroad business is what he claims is a conspiracy to hold rates down. "If these 131 railroads that enjoy so much power in the cabinet," he said on page 266 of the transcript, "if they were really interested in higher rates, they could have gotten them." Mr. Young attributes the failure of the railroads to get the higher rates which he says they could have had to the alleged fact that most railroad directors "have their own money in the air lines, and the busses, and trucks." Such an allegation is on a par with his other statement, noted earlier, that the men who "run the railroads" are "deliberately keeping (materials) away from the railroads." Both are broadside charges of breach of trust and lack of integrity, put forward without a shadow of proof. They are such allegations as no responsible man would make unless he were in position to sustain them—which Mr. Young is not, because they have absolutely no foundation in fact.

In view of Mr. Young's insistence upon the importance of ownership and investment by railroad directors, it is pertinent to inquire into the nature and extent of Mr. Young's investment in his own Chesapeake & Ohio. As to that, I refer the committee to the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission in finance docket No. 14692, decided May 10, 1948, in which Mr. Young's application for authority to go on the board of the New York Central was denied, and also to the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway annual report to the Interstate Commerce Commission for the year ended December 31, 1947. From these two public documents it will be found that on December 31, 1947, the self-proclaimed apostle of ownership-management in railroading owned directly only 10 shares out of the 8,003,969 shares of Chesapeake & Ohio stock outstanding, and had an indirect ownership, through the Alleghany Corp. holding company which amounts to less than 1 percent of 3.34 percent of the total assets of the railroad.

RAILROAD RATES

In view of Mr. Young's allegation that most railroad directors do not want adequate rates on the railroads because of their alleged interest in other forms of transportation, the committee might be interested in what the railroads have done, and are now doing to obtain rates properly related to costs of operation as expressed in dollars of today's purchasing power. We know that we need such rates, and have so expressed ourselves to the Interstate Commerce Commission and to the public in the strongest terms at our command. When wages were increased at the end of 1941, the railroads asked for rate increases to cover the added cost. The Commission, in deciding this case, ex parte 148, granted a temporary increase in freight rates, effective March 19, 1942. This temporary increase was suspended by the Commission May 15, 1943, over the vigorous protest of the railroads. The suspension continued in effect throughout the war, notwithstanding renewed protest by the railroads.

On April 15, 1946, in view of the postwar increases in wages and prices, the railroads again applied to the Commission for increased rates, in the proceedings known as ex parte 162. An interim increase was granted, effective July 1, 1946, and the Commission continued under advisement the amount of the permanent increases, which were subsequently allowed, effective January 1, 1947. The railroads believed that the interim increase was insufficient to meet pressing needs, and that final action should have been taken sooner than it was, and so expressed themselves.

With the continued increase in operating costs in 1947—an increase so great that it could not be absorbed even with the high volume of traffic moving—the railroads once more filed proceedings for increased rates, which came to be known as Ex Parte 166. Under that application, the Commission has granted three interim increases and now has under advisement the amount of the final and permanent increase to be made. This history clearly demonstrates unremitting effort on the part of the railroads in seeking to have their rates increased to meet the rising cost of operation.

It is the belief of the railroads which I represent that in this time of rising wages and rising prices the procedures and decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission in general rate applications should be both prompt and adequate. This has not always been the case. We believe that improvement is entirely possible under existing law. It is our conviction that the future health and welfare of the Nation's fundamental and basic transportation depends on the railroads being given an opportunity to make earnings averaging not less than 6 percent on their net investment. To that extent we do not differ from Mr. Young. But it is one thing to be disappointed with the timing or the amount of a rate increase, and quite another to impugn the motives and attack the competence of the Interstate Commerce Commission, a body of hard-working, conscientious, well-qualified citizens upon whom there has been laid the responsibility of coping with questions of tremendous importance in a time of great difficulty, and who are earnestly trying to meet their responsibilities with fairness to all concerned. We disagree violently with Mr. Young when he recommends that the Commission be "wiped out," and we certainly do not subscribe at all to anything that, in the remotest degree, casts suspicion on that great tribunal which has a demonstrated record of accomplishment extending over 61 years.

Mr. Young is highly critical of what he says was a $500,000,000 loss in railroad-passenger business last year, which sum, he said, "had to be loaded onto the shipper, the freight shipper." Figures as to passenger earnings or losses are arrived at on the basis of division of costs among the several types of service prescribed by the ICC. There is some disagreement in railroad circles about the entire accuracy of the basis of division but the ICC does report a passenger loss for 1947, on preliminary figures, of $426,000,000—which is perhaps the basis for Mr. Young's statement of $500,000,000. Regardless of the exact figure, however, it is true that the railroads as a whole suffer substantial losses in this service. This is especially true of the Chesapeake & Ohio, which lost more on passenger business in proportion to its passenger revenues than any other of the 25 principal passenger-carrying railroads covered in the latest report of the Bureau of Transport Economics and Statistics of the Interstate Commerce Commission, dated May 11, 1948. Its passenger operating ratio—that is, its expenditures on passenger service in relation to its passenger revenue—was 192 in 1947, or $1.92 of expenditure for each $1 of revenue. The next highest among the 25 principal railroads reported was 165, and only four others were above 150.

Mr. Young claims to be the great innovator in passenger business. Yet it would appear that he is contributing more than his share to the passenger losses which he deplores.

RAILROADS AND NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. Young would have you believe that the railroads are not awake to the needs of our national defense. The railroads are alert to those needs. Other representatives of the Association of American Railroads have told you, and I repeat, the railroads must have more cars and they are doing all within their power to get them. The railroads need access to critical materials. They need opportunity to make the adequate earnings which will support further investment in railroads.

But with it all the fact remains that the railroads now have a larger number of serviceable freight cars, a larger number of passenger cars, and far better motive power—in short, greater carrying capacity—than they had at the time of Pearl Harbor. And they are gaining in efficiency and carrying capacity with every day that goes by.

They are concerned—deeply concerned—about the average age of their freight car fleet, in view of the intensive use being made of these cars. That is why they will never relax their efforts to obtain more steel for more freight cars until car shortages pass into history. Yet the worst of the war-weary freight cars have now been culled out and what remains are being repaired and rebuilt as fast as men, materials, and money are available. The railroads have not broken down and they are not going to break down.

I make here the same pledge which I had the honor to give within the last week to the Industrial College of the Armed Forces in a discussion of the organization and administration of domestic transportation in a war economy—a pledge that whatever the type of war, and whenever it comes, the railroads will do their utmost to see that nowhere in all the world will the military might of America be lessened or the striking power of its armed forces diminished by reason of any failure of rail transportation here at home.

The Flight of Risk Capital

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER A. LYNCH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, many persons who are familiar with the economic structure of the country are fearful of the continued disappearance from the money market of risk capital. They look with grave concern upon the increasing tendency of business enterprise to look toward insurance companies, particularly our life insurance companies for new money.

It seems to me that their fears are quite justified, because, in my judgment, a sound economy demands a broad base of ownership of industry as contrasted to a concentration of ownership, whether by corporations or individuals. Memory brings us back to the days of the depression, when much of the best agricultural land in the country became, through assignment or foreclosure, the property of insurance companies. It was not a healthy situation either for the country in general or for insurance companies turned farmer. I can readily envision a similar situation with other industries, when, in a case of general depression, or for that matter any other compelling reason, the large insurance companies, now engaged in loaning risk capital would become vital factors in the ownership of large segments of our industries. That to my mind would be calamitous.

This general subject was discussed before the Economics Club of Chicago at the Stevens Hotel, Chicago, Ill., on May 11th last, by Mr. Emil Schram of the New York Stock Exchange. I do not know whether Mr. Schram has the right answer to the problem but his long years of financial experience, his recognized reputation for sound judgment, his service in public life, and his presidency of the world's greatest stock market give great support to his views.

His speech, which I know will receive the careful consideration of the members of the House Committee on Ways and Means and which I believe will prove of real interest to the Congress in general, follows:

I would much prefer to address you today on the subject of farming which I know a little something about, principally the raising of corn and hogs, both of which I have shipped to the markets in Chicago many times and which I made my chief vocation prior to going to Washington with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. This being a gathering of businessmen interested in the economics of the Nation, and because of my position as President of the New York Stock Exchange, it is becoming that I talk to you about certain phases of our capital markets, which I deem of mutual interest.

I refer more specifically to risk capital. The need for an abundance of risk capital in the coming several years goes undisputed. Business management faces one of its most important problems in soundly financing its new money requirements. There are unnecessary obstructions in the path of the flow and function of risk capital that must be removed if, in the years to come, we are to avoid governmental interference in the conduct of business. I refer to the double taxation of dividends, the treatment of capital gains, and the discriminatory margin requirements of 400 percent.

I wish to open my brief remarks with a blunt statement of fact which I shall then endeavor to support. The life-insurance companies are making loans today which, in my judgment, belong in the commercial banking system, while the commercial banks, I think, are advancing credit where the funds should be obtained in the equity markets—and both these conditions have been forced upon these lending agencies because the capital markets have not been in a position to provide the necessary funds. I consider this condition and the trend which it has set in motion of vital concern. They are matters which should engage the study of our officials, the Congress, and the leaders of industry and finance.

The dependence of business enterprise on insurance companies, particularly life-insurance companies, for new money is a dangerous tendency. It is dangerous because our tax laws encourage the tendency of business to finance through debt securities. The continuance of this trend is likely to raise grave questions when business conditions are not as favorable as they have been in the past 2 years. In contrast, the diffusion of the ownership of industry among as large a body of individuals as is possible promotes flexibility for management and the spread of direct interest in and knowledge of the workings of business. In 1947, net new security issues, that is, new issues less retirements, amounted to $4,100,000,000. Life insurance companies purchased $3,000,000,000 of these securities, or approximately 73 percent of the total. In 1946, when new security issues aggregated $2,300,000,000, $2,000,000,000, or 87 percent, were acquired by life-insurance companies. When to this is added another large source of corporate funds, bank loans which amounted to $3,700,000,000 in 1947 and $1,400,000,000 in 1946, it is readily seen that after having painfully started to pare down the public debt and balance the budget, we now seem to be engaged in rapidly swelling the debt of business.

According to a recent report of the United States Senate Finance Committee, released in connection with the enactment of the Revenue Act of 1948—and I quote:

"Life-insurance companies are taking a very large proportion of the new securities, while individuals, who must be the chief source of risk capital, are buying a relatively small proportion. The life-insurance companies and banks, which must place their funds in securities with a low degree of risk, accounted for 83 percent of the net purchases in 1947 and were the only net purchasers in 1946. On the other hand, domestic individual buyers accounted for none of the net purchases in 1946 and only 17.1 percent in 1947. This is still another indication that those buying securities today are for the most part seeking relatively riskless investments."

I pause here to pay my respects to the leadership in the Congress that made possible a splendid beginning in correcting some of the injustices of our wartime tax structure.

I have dealt elsewhere on a number of occasions at some length with the broad question of double taxation of dividends, the need for stimulating the flow of savings that properly find their way into ownership securities and their activation in the capital market. Important benefits would be derived from changes in capital gains taxes in the direction of a liquid, orderly, and continuous stock market. This leads me to margin requirements because a 75-percent margin effectively adds to the mounting tendency to which I have already referred. It requires a little explanation to make it clear how the reduction of margin requirements would not aggravate inflationary pressures.

Let us take as an example a company with 500 stockholders which requires $5,000,000 in new funds. Right now it is attractive to borrow the money from an insurance company or from a commercial bank on a term-credit basis. Although we would always expect to have a differential between the cost of raising senior capital and equity funds, the difference is extraordinarily wide today because of the reduced incentives to participate in industrial ownership. However, even the reduction of margin requirements to 50 percent would be helpful because the sale of stock would shift the operation so that the debt created would be half of the $5,000,000, assuming the stockholders used their own funds to the extent of $2,500,000 and borrowed the same amount from banks. In addition to stimulating ownership capital and cutting down the amount of credit, the process would diffuse the ownership of the debt from one or possibly two institutions to the banks in the different localities in which the shareholders reside.

The Federal Reserve authorities at various intervals have spoken out on this question of risk investment in the banking system. The Federal Reserve bulletin of October carried the address of the former chairman, postwar bank credit problems, from which I quote:

"Maintenance of a high degree of liquidity should be encouraged; banks should be discouraged from reducing their large holdings of Government securities and cash assets in order to acquire less liquid and more risky assets.

"Supervisors should take a critical attitude toward any expansion of loans, unless they contribute directly to increased production and movement of goods. This attitude should apply particularly to consumer credit, real estate loans based on inflated values, loans to carry excessive inventories, and any loans for speculative purposes.

"As long as banks maintain their present large holdings of cash and Government securities, most of them are adequately capitalized. Banks with low ratios of capital to risk assets, however, should build up their capital. If banks persist in increasing their risk assets, they should be required to enlarge their capital accordingly by retention of earnings. If retained earnings are not sufficient, then additional stock should be sold."

It is all very well to talk about adding to the capital of our banks. I agree that the private commercial banking system is undercapitalized. This is especially true if we regard the present level of prices as a rather permanent fixture within our economic structure for many years to come. The fact is that there is scarcely a commercial bank stock that is not selling in the open market today for less than the known book value of the stock. This presents a decided difficulty on the part of the banks in raising new capital through their existing stockholders, and I might add that without prohibitive dilution of the present stock, it is impossible to attract new owners into the industry.

Ours is a great industrial empire that is capable of producing a vast amount of goods, an economy capable not only of supplying the wants and needs of one hundred and forty-odd millions of its own citizens, but capable as well of shipping abroad, on balance, surplus production. This empire has been built by private funds; that is the only way we want it and the only way we should have it. I make that statement with all the force at my command, even though at one time I headed the largest lending agency of the Government which came into being in an acute emergency, and which in my belief should function only in such a period. I am thoroughly confident that our corporate structure is in need of tremendous sums of equity capital if for no other purpose than to pay off private debt.

With our Federal debt in excess of $250,000,000,000 and the additional public debt (made up of States, cities, towns, and counties all over the land) totaling approximately $14,000,000,000, with a tax load that gives promise of exceeding $40,000,000,000 for the Federal Government in the coming fiscal year, and upwards of an additional $11,000,000,000 for the support of our States and their subdivisions—we should not build up the private debt of the country unnecessarily, except as a temporary accommodation. There is an exception in the case of the railroads and the public utilities, but as for the other business interests of the country, almost without exception, capital should gradually evolve into preferred and common stock, preferably the latter.

It is not only for the sake of our financial structure, public and private, that I make this point; it is because I am a firm believer in the rights and advantages of ownership on the part of all of our citizens, whether they be well off or of moderate means.

There is a certain something, by way of better citizenship, that accrues to the Nation from the privilege of ownership. That is why it is the duty and responsibility of every public official and of the Congress to safeguard and protect the property rights and rights of ownership if enterprise as we know it is to endure. The pay-off is in the pleasure of living in freedom and liberty.

We have Government agencies—the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Power Commission, the Securities and Exchange Commission, and other agencies of regulation such as the Federal Reserve Board—all of which I think go far enough in certain forms of regulation in the public interest. We are in an enormously expansionary period. We are dealing in astronomical sums. We have no past yardsticks with which to measure the future growth of this country. That is particularly true as we strive to improve the standard of living of our people. We must not harass the investor and place unnecessary obstacles in the path of the free flow of investment funds from one market to another. Our primary interest is the private placement of the Federal debt at a rate of return which the Congress thinks is sound and within the bounds of the budget. Once this is accomplished other parts of the capital and money markets will fall in line.

Our life insurance companies should lend the main support to this task, especially in the case of the long-term Government debt. The savings banks likewise should continue to filter their funds to the medium- and long-term Government indebtedness. Our commercial banking system is the logical chief buyer of short-term Government obligations. I want to see a broad active stock market reflecting our preeminent world position. This statement does not imply a rising and falling market. I am not here to predict the course of values. The stock market is the best confidence barometer we have in this country. On the New York Stock Exchange, the largest open free-capital market in the world, we have listed today almost 2,000,000,000 shares of the preferred and common stocks of 1,133 of our large, medium-sized, and relatively small-business establishments. These businesses employ millions of people at an investment of from $3,000 to $39,000 per employee.

I am unalterably opposed to a capital levy in the form of the capital-gains tax. It is a definite barrier to the fluidity of funds. To press the point, income is one thing—it is the earning capacity or power of every individual to make money, either through his personal efforts, by his mind, his hands, or his accumulated resources; and beyond that income he must rightfully pay his just taxes to support his Government. Once the citizen has paid his just taxes on his current annual income and is able, after paying his honest debts, to lay aside a nickel, that nickel should not be taxed during his lifetime if he is prudent and fortunate enough to double or treble it.

We must follow a policy of encouraging the broadening of the base of wealth of the country from which income springs. Tax the income, not the savings or principal, during the lifetime of the individual. Give him that much-needed tool to work with, for it is in the interest of every laboring man in this country that we save and that we put our savings to work productively. I want to see the capital gains tax reduced by this Congress in the coming several weeks, should the Congress enact a second tax bill, from the maximum rate of 25 percent to 12½ percent. I want to see margin requirements, or the privilege of an investor to borrow on the common stocks representing his ownership in American industry, reduced from 75 to 50 percent, provided the banker or lending agency will give him the 50 percent. The 75-percent margin requirement, is really 400 percent, for today you can only borrow $2,500 on $10,000 of collateral—and it is thoroughly unsound.

For the life of me I cannot understand why it isn't a better practice to have several thousands, in fact, maybe several hundred thousands, owing the banks $1,000,000,000, if you please, secured by $2,000,000,000 of common stock or ownership in American industry than to drive the companies who are ultimately the beneficiaries of the $1,000,000,000 into the insurance companies or the banks to borrow. In one case we have a distributed risk, while the other is bound to be more concentrated. In one breath, our Federal Reserve authorities state that the common-stock market is the healthiest spot in the economy, indicating that our common stocks are worth what they are selling for, and yet with no rhyme or reason, they stipulate that you cannot borrow more than 25 percent on your collateral at a time when no money to speak of is being borrowed on common stocks.

These two recommendations which I so heartily endorse will lend fluidity, continuity and orderliness to our markets. They will lend support in periods of weakness and I am confident will invite the sale of securities when they are in short supply or are being bid up in price in a moment of overenthusiasm.

The capital gains taxes of the Internal Revenue Code are not regarded as revenue-producing features of the tax structure. Although capital gains taxes produced various amounts of income, ranging from $2,000,000 in 1941 to three hundred-odd million dollars in an active year such as 1945, I do not believe they produced any revenue to speak of in 1947. If the Congress will adopt the 12½-percent rate instead of 25 percent, I think the lower rates will actually increase revenues in the coming fiscal year. Certainly we should get behind a proposal that is thoroughly sound in the first place and that in the second place will gain us some revenues at a time when the Federal budget is threatened with being unbalanced.

I am enough of an optimist and enough of a believer in the fundamentals of democracy to hold that lack of understanding of and sympathy with the capital markets and their problems are not on the main road of American thinking but a detour. I am convinced that if our course is just—and this I believe fully and profoundly—we can carry our message successfully to the public and our representatives in government. We can be strong in our cause and vigorous in our efforts because we are in the fortunate position of being able to serve ourselves and our country at the same time.

Labor Conditions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address I delivered before the convention of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers at Atlantic City, N. J., May 14, 1948.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Chairman POTOFSKY. We are privileged this morning to have with us one of our country's great statesmen. We have been speaking a great deal at this convention about the Eightieth Congress and its contemptuous disregard of the needs of the masses of the people of our country.

I want you to know—all of you do know—that there are some exceptions in the Eightieth Congress. Yesterday you heard the gallant voice of a Congresswoman, a woman who has carried on the fight for the people in the House of Representatives. This morning you will hear the voice of a Senator who has fought consistently against the Taft-Hartley bill, who has fought for the people on every occasion, who has championed our own minimum-wage law, and who is fighting against any effort of Senator BALL, Senator TAFT, and their cohorts to deprive the country of the progressive legislation adopted under President Roosevelt.

So, my friends, it is a great honor and privilege for me this morning to present to you a distinguished orator, a great statesman, a valiant crusader for the rights of the common people.

I know that you have the highest regard for this man. I heard him address the CIO convention last year, and he took it by storm. I told him then that what he had to say was a great lesson in civics, in Americanism, and I am very happy that he has accepted our invitation to appear before the Amalgamated Convention and give us his views on domestic and foreign affairs. I shall not restrict him as to what he wishes to say; we shall be privileged to hear him.

I do want to say to you, Senator PEPPER, in welcoming you to the Amalgamated, that you are speaking our language, the language of the common people of our great country.

Delegates, it gives me pleasure to present to you a great liberal, a great crusader, a great statesman, Senator PEPPER, of Florida.

Senator PEPPER. Mr. President, officers and delegates, members of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, my fellow countrymen:

The philosophy of Emerson teaches us that an institution is but the lengthened shadow of one man. No one thinks of the Amalgamated without revering the memory of one of the greatest of Americans, Sidney Hillman. And humbly, and out of the depths of my heart, I salute this morning the memory, the work and the union, and above all, the great widow of Sidney Hillman.

I am honored to come into your company and to receive the inspiration which comes from association with a body of men and women who, with all their hearts, believe in and practice democracy.

There never was a greater demand than there is today for the mobilization of the forces of democracy to preserve peace and to promote the prosperity and to preserve the welfare of the people of all the world.

We have not yet even made peace before we are finding ourselves again preparing for war. A world that has been broken by the greatest struggle in history is threatened with a repetition of one greater still. The weapons, even in so short a time as since the end of fighting hostility, has increased immeasurably in terror and in destructive power, and the mobilized might of the world becomes ever more threatening with each passing day.

And even here, in rich America, we still have a great part of the Nation, to use the words of that great leader of democracy, yet so vividly in our memories, "Ill-clad, ill-fed, and ill-housed."

And we see America today, the hope of progress and peace on earth, itself in the dead grip of reaction and selfishness, when monopoly rises higher and higher in its arrogance and the profiteer mounts to a yet loftier and loftier place of power and prestige in all America's economic life.

I declare to you also that before we can save democracy in the world, we have got to be sure that we practice democracy in America.

And today, what do we find? We find that instead of labor being strengthened that it might fight the cause of working men and women everywhere, this group in power has done everything in its capacity to strangle the effectiveness of every labor union.

The purpose and design of the Taft-Hartley bill, as you well know, was not to remove any wrongs that might have crept into labor policy, but to strangle the whole effectiveness of the labor movement and to beat wages down, so that the profiteer could profit more, when he was making the greatest profits in the Nation's peacetime history.

And today living costs rise higher and higher, living levels fall lower and lower, while the Congress refuses to give aid to preserve an American standard of living to the American housewife and robs the labor union of its power to give, through effective collective bargaining, that security that the worker and the home in America are entitled to enjoy.

I would suppose that labor, all over America—and I apply that to unorganized as well as to organized labor—would be asking these gentlemen who are candidates for the Presidency, on any ticket, "How do you feel about the repeal of the Taft-Hartley law?"

You cannot go wrong in making that the criterion on whether they are the friend or the enemy of the working men and women of America, because the Taft-Hartley law is the enemy of every man and woman who works in all this land.

And the moral atmosphere of Washington today, instead of being humanitarian, is selfish. Washington is the sanctuary and the happy hunting ground of the sinister interests who want what they can get from the American economy.

Until we change the whole moral climate of Washington we will never start forward again along that path on which we were so gallantly and so gloriously led by the greatest Democrat of our time, Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

What happened in the Taft-Hartley bill is carried over into other issues that come before the Congress. For example, we have been struggling to get a minimum-wage law. We had one, you remember, enacted in 1938—a minimum wage of 25 cents an hour. That got up to 40 cents an hour in 1942 or 1943.

We have been trying to move forward on that front. But we have been stymied and strangled, and now a gentleman, who stands in the door, and at the gate, to stop all labor progress in America, it seems, as chairman of a committee in the Senate in holding hearings upon this minimum-wage legislation, proposes to set the scale at 65 cents an hour, but to make that the vehicle to put every strangling provision that he can into the existing law.

So there is not very much encouragement that we are to get in the immediate future the kind of a minimum-wage law that the working people of this country are entitled to enjoy. Certainly, 75 cents an hour, if not a dollar, should be the minimum in the law of the land.

And in addition to trying to keep the amount down, today we are accosted by every lobby group to take out somebody who is already covered, to diminish instead of to broaden the coverage even of the law we have.

That applies to the National Labor Relations Act; it applies to the minimum-wage law and many other fields. The whole trend in Congress is backward instead of forward in terms of human progress and the promotion of the general welfare.

We have been trying, as you know, to get a housing bill enacted down there. We finally got one through the Senate. It is now stymied in the House. Every subterfuge has been resorted to, to prevent its passage over there. The real-estate lobby and the rent profiteers seem to have had the major voice in the councils of the Congress.

Nothing but the indignation and the united demand of the American people offers any hope whatever that there will be for the welfare and the sanctuary of the American family a decent home.

Well, you know we have also been trying to pass some health legislation. They raise a mighty, angry howl if a few hours are lost by strike. But few are willing to acknowledge the 600,000,000 man-days a year which are lost by illness and by preventable accidents.

The American family does want security against medical costs it cannot meet.

I have seen rural mothers in Florida, with their dead children in their arms stiffening as they sat in the lobbies and vestibules of hospitals which would not permit them to enter. Yet we who seek to find means by which they can let decent medical and hospital care are called by some undesirable and odious name.

We have been trying (and you have been magnificent in this field), to make it possible for every working man and woman, every average citizen to budget his medical costs by paying like he does for social security, contributing into a fund out of which will be provided the medical, the hospital, the clinical, the nursing, the dental service that all the people of America require to prolong their lives and to preserve their health.

But there again, we are paying in dead and in ill for what we do not do in our demands upon the leaders of the American Congress.

And you know we, as I said, have been trying to get added research funds. I favored most of the foreign aid program. I did support ERP. Five and more billion dollars may be well spent in helping Western Europe and in preserving democracy and human dignity, and in providing good customers for America's producers.

But it seems to me a rather niggardly comparison for 5,000,000,000 and more dollars in 1 year to go for even so laudable a purpose when we are only able to get $1,000,000,000 for research against all heart diseases, which kill one out of three and struck down your great leader when he was never needed more, or only $14,000,000 for research against cancer, which strikes down one out of eight.

And I have thought it was a little inconsistent and contradictory for five and more billion dollars to be granted to Western Europe, deserving as it is, but for those who obtained these billions in Congress to quibble and deny more than $15,000,000 up until a few weeks ago, to satisfy the challenge and the demand of the United Nations Children's Organization to feed 20,000,000 hungry children hobbling across the broken world today, seeking something to eat.

Today, while we are extolling civil liberties to all the peoples in other parts of the world, while we are speaking about human dignity and the fact that every mortal man has a part of the divine soul in him, that he is made in the image of one Almighty God Jehovah, sovereign American States demand the unrestricted right to perpetuate wrong to enslave and to lower the dignity of many millions of American citizens. And they even say that they can't fight together, they can't even die in the same trench, side by side if the color of their skins are different.

While we are talking about the freedoms which we hope to give to all men—and God speed the effort that is our destiny—day after day in the American Congress ingenious minds are trying to find some way to strike down the freedoms of the native-born or the naturalized American citizens, and today intimidation stalks across the American stage against any man who doesn't happen to agree with the majority.

My fellow citizens, in a democracy you have got a right to make a fool out of yourself.

You have got a right to be wrong.

Who are these arbiters who have the presumption and the presumptiveness to lay down infallible standards that they would claim the approval of the Deity for?

I am not afraid for America, I am not afraid of this country being overrun by anybody, so long as we have a citizenry that has a stake in this sacred soil, a citizenry that has something to fight for, a place to work, a place to live, neighbors with whom to visit, a church in which to worship, unions in which to gather to fight the cause to which labor is dedicated. And I don't want to stifle and strike down even extremists from the expression of their opinions and the enjoyment of civil liberties. I don't want to censor what they write, even in a corporation newspaper, and I am glad that a Federal judge has had the courage to strike down that vicious attempt to censor what was published about a political candidate or party in a labor newspaper.

My fellow Americans, I do not ascribe to Mr. MUNDT or anybody else the right to set a standard of my patriotism or my fidelity to the glorious ideals of our country, our Constitution, and our flag.

Today intolerance and bigotry and one form of totalitarianism or another really do threaten us. Yet we must not, even in the face of danger, allow our judgment and reason to be dethroned and our allegiance to a higher fidelity and patriotism to be impaired by these petty figures who would be Paul Reveres screaming their various alarms.

America was pretty safe before any of them came along, and America would be strong if all of them disappeared.

I think these great civil issues are matters about which, naturally, a group like yours is mightily concerned. I want every worker to see the wisdom of associating himself or herself with an organized-labor movement somewhere. I was so delighted when I got off the train and was met by several members of your Amalgamated in Florida. God progress your cause. I want to see you get more members. I am glad to have the honor of seeing the southern delegation. I am so glad you are here.

Continue to grow as rapidly as you can. I will help you in any way within my power. This thing democracy is the salvation of the world. I believe it with all my heart. But we've got to let the light of democracy in to many peoples of this earth who have never seen it and who have never known it. Through countless dark centuries people have lived a miserable, wretched existence under one form of tyranny or another. It was either an oppressive landlord, or an exploiting employer, or a tyrannical king or potentate. They never knew what it was to live like men, to walk the face of God's earth as if they were made in His great image. They sense that we live as we do, somehow, many of them, through curtains and through dark media; they have divined it with that intuitive sense that the people seem everywhere to possess. How many parts of the earth have witnessed that glorious struggle to break these shackles and move forward like freemen into the sunlight of a new life and liberty?

America cannot be too careful that she does not throw her great might across the path of that progress. America must be reflected and interpreted to those people as it is. I have been a little disturbed at what appeared to be the impression in Government circles that, in order to speak for America, you had to be several kinds of a millionaire. You couldn't be a diplomat, you couldn't be an Ambassador, you couldn't deal with the problems of the world unless you had money back of you; not only did you have to be a millionaire, but your father had to have been a millionaire before you, and your grandfather before him.

I still want to see America's Foreign Service, every aspect of it, open to every competent, capable American man and woman. I want to see the statesmen of labor, who have proved their right in the American forum, consulted upon these great issues, given an opportunity to translate America to these people in all parts of the world.

I will tell you, a good labor representative who knows democracy from the ground up and lives with people who are the people could do more to give assurance to the workingmen and women in other parts of the world of the real America that is speaking through these programs than a dozen of these striped-breeched, frock-tailed diplomats.

I will give you my solemn opinion: I don't believe that communism or fascism or any other kind of totalitarianism can stand up in any country of the world against the practice of democracy. But the question is going to be soon, whether those governments that we are helping over there take the aid we provide down to the people; whether they demonstrate in their domestic policies that they believe in democracy; or whether it is stolen by the corrupt or whether it is taken by those who have the opportunity for privilege in their land.

I believe today in China that if the National Government, or if a government would put into effect a decent land policy and give economic hope and political liberty to the people of China, they could drive out communism quicker than a hundred armies. [Applause.] The same thing applies to Italy. I doubt if there is a more indulgent or more luxury-loving or more idle aristocracy in the world than is today centered in some of the ornate villas and palaces of Rome, while many Italian citizens struggle for a piece of bread. Yes; let us help Italy to the limit. There is no more deserving people, no finer citizenry, but let us say to that Government, "We want to see you practice democracy at home in your domestic policy."

But, my friends, I say it, not in a partisan vein, can men who never voted for labor in the United States Senate or House, men who never sympathized with the ill, men whose hearts never went out to the poorly clad or the shabbily housed, men who have always been the spokesmen of big business, never of little, men whose whole political careers have been dedicated to the service of monopoly, not free enterprise, with the best of intentions and the greatest of exertions—can those men interpret and put into effect democratic policy to the peoples of the world?

I believe that prosperity and peace begin in America. I believe the kind of a world we have will largely be the image of the sort of America we are. I say, if America again is to rise to the great moral leadership that made us such a human champion in the glorious days of Franklin Roosevelt, we must first purify the streams of American political and economic life; that we practice before God and man in America, the sort of democracy that we preach to others.

There has been much obstruction in world affairs. I don't see, however, that there is any reason for apology or embarrassment if our Government is disclosed to have been making friendly overtures to any people anywhere to spare the human race the torture and the horror of war. Of course, we want peace, and we aren't ashamed of wanting peace. Many of you have a vacant place in your home and in your heart for a boy who didn't come back from the other war, and you would have more another time.

We need every bit of material and all the labor we have to build a greater America, and we must constantly strive for understanding and for peace—without appeasement. I favor every military proposal that has been made as to the size of the Air Force, as to the size of the Navy, as to the size of the Army, and selective service with which to provide adequate forces, but I do not subscribe to fastening upon peacetime America the European system of compulsory military training for every high school boy.

I favor this Nation following the policy that says to everybody, "You have the right to sell your ideas in the market places of the world. Nobody has a right to stop you from selling them there, but by the same token you do not have the right to enforce a sale upon anybody."

They tell us this is a revolutionary period. It is. Is America going to prove to be a decadent democracy, shorn of its ancient and erstwhile vitality, or is America going to prove that it is still fresh and consecrated to the old spirit, liberty, and the furtherance of the religion of democracy that we have inherited and that we practice at home? Are we still zealous to give to all men this democracy? Do we yet yearn to heal the hurt of their hearts, to stir within them new courage and inspiration?

So I say to you, great army of American opinion and of American democracy that you are, the way is forward and not backward, upward and not downward. Let the amalgamated continue to lead the hosts of American democracy to a better world.

Eagles' Conference on Employment of Handicapped

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, in collaboration with my eminent colleagues, Senators AIKEN, HILL, MCGRATH, MORSE, JOHNSTON of South Carolina, STEWART, MCFARLAND, FLANDERS, and MCCARTHY, I have introduced S. 2896, a bill to establish a Federal Commission on Services for the Physically Handicapped.

We cannot doubt but that our Nation is becoming health-minded. Almost every week we note conferences, covering various phases of this vital program. But there is still a lack of specific plans, in blueprint form, to point the way of how best to do the job of restoring our millions of handicapped people so that they may take their places as wage earners. I believe this bill provides the means for Congress to enact such a measure, at once economic and humanitarian in its effect.

Recently, I delivered an address before the Eagles' Conference on Employment of Handicapped, a splendid meeting attended by representatives of industry, business, labor, and other organizations, sponsored by the Fraternal Order of Eagles, Aerie No. 0137, under leadership of Mr. Robert W. Hansen, former grand worthy president, FOE, and now editor, Eagles' publications.

This great fraternity, which has sponsored so many measures, now part of our national program of social benefits, is squarely behind legislation for the handicapped. In my address to them, I endeavored to afford an outline of the present situation as affecting our handicapped citizens, and, as a part of my remarks, I am including that address.

Because of the necessity for broadening the scope of public understanding as to the purposes of S. 2896, I ask that it, also, be inserted, as a part of my remarks, along with an explanatory statement by Mr. Paul A. Strachan, president, American Federation of the Physically Handicapped, 1376 National Press Building, Washington, D. C.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN, UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM ALABAMA, BEFORE EAGLES' CONFERENCE ON EMPLOYMENT OF HANDICAPPED, MILWAUKEE, WIS., FEBRUARY 28, 1948

Mr. Chairman, prefatory to my address, I wish to say that the people of this country owe a great deal to the tireless efforts of Paul A. Strachan. When he became physically handicapped he probably would have died had he been an ordinary person—in fact, he did die, almost. He practically died and the doctors still don't know how he pulled through. He can't be beat.

I don't deserve any praise for introducing the previous bill, H. R. 5206. Paul wrote the bill. He would have worried me to death if I hadn't introduced it. He has a bulldog tenacity in fighting for the things he believes in, and for the physically handicapped.

He is sitting here, beside me, and hasn't heard a word I have said. But you have. And I hope you will remember.

More than 2 years after VJ-day our country is economically sound and employment stands at the highest level in all our history. Despite that latter fact it is distressing to note that there is still much discrimination against employment of our physically handicapped citizens, both military and civil.

We must face the appalling fact that for some years prior to World War II there had been an annual average of something like 800,000 citizens disabled in industry and agriculture alone, of whom only approximately 15,000 had been rehabilitated through governmental activities and another 15,000 by industry each year, leaving an army of 770,000 on the human scrap pile.

Today, disregarding entirely the military disabled coming out of World War II, reports for 1946 show that well over 2,000,000 workers were totally or partially disabled, with 16,500 killed. Preliminary estimates for 1947 indicate an equal, or even greater number. This shows that the annual toll of workers disabled in American industry equals the number of disabled veterans from four full years of fighting.

Further reports show that 43,000,000 days were lost by American workers in 1946 from industrial accidents, reducing their income by $1,500,000,000. This would provide jobs for 142,000 people for an entire year.

The cumulative effect in future years from accidents in 1946 alone would total 230,000,000 days, sufficient to provide a full year's work for 765,000 men and women. This takes into account the life expectancy of the 16,500 who were killed, the 1,800 with permanent total disabilities, and the 92,400 with permanent partial disabilities, such as lost legs, hands, fingers, eyes, etc.

That all this has been costly, no one can deny. In citing the above, the human side of the picture, I have not taken into consideration the tremendous sum of $2,000,000,000, and more, which industry paid out as its part of the cost of these same accidents.

This, then, is a many-sided problem. On one hand, we must continually strive to perfect safety methods, to obviate accidents; stimulate preventive medicine, etc., to eliminate, so far as possible, diseases, while at the the same time we make every effort to assist those who have been injured or diseased to recover, and to assume their rightful places as citizens of this great Nation.

As we read history, we know that each age produces its own quota of handicapped. We must recognize that fact and prepare accordingly.

While men have known of these matters for generations past, it is a sad commentary that they have not united, as they should, to take bold, drastic action to meet this problem. What has been done, in the public domain, has been done largely by organizations such as yours, fired by patriotic zeal to aid their fellow citizens, and to stamp out human misery and want wherever it is found in our Nation.

Of course, in the main, the chief people concerned are the workers themselves, and industry, as the employer. But there is a third party at interest, presumably striving to protect both workers and industry, and that is government—which, of course, also represents your interest.

That brings us down to Federal and State laws and municipal ordinances, etc. It is my conviction that to accomplish a real job, the Federal Government must take the initiative in this matter, beneficial to all handicapped in all States, and develop a program that will be inclusive of the several remedies leading to prevention of accidents suffered by workers from injury or disease resulting from their employment in industry.

Unquestionably, "National Employ the Physically Handicapped Week" has done more to arouse the public interest in the handicapped than anything else done in all previous history. By putting the emphasis on the economic aspects—where it belongs—we are, in pressing employment of handicapped, showing up, at the same time, all other phases of the matter. Certainly, if a man or woman cannot work, because of disability, then the need of such persons for essential and remedial medical care; education and training, or retraining; vocational guidance, and ultimate selective placement in work wherein their disabilities are not a factor, is crystal clear. So I firmly believe that stressing employment of handicapped will have corollary benefits to the whole program, and, by all means, should be continued, even increased.

In the war production record, we have ample proof that handicapped hitherto deemed unemployable were, in fact, nothing of the kind. When suitably placed, they held up their end well. The record speaks for itself: "Better absentee rate than nonhandicapped. Equal production—and in some instances even better production volume than nonhandicapped. Unquestioned loyalty to the job. And, best of all, they were found to be less susceptible to accidents than nonhandicapped."

The last is understandable. "A burned child dreads the fire." Naturally, those already disabled are careful not to sustain further disabilities, if possible.

The Social Security Board's report of a few days ago cites the shocking fact that on the average working day, between two and two-and-a-half million workers are off the job because of sickness or other temporary disability, and another 1,600,000 because of disabilities lasting 6 months or longer. A total of 4,000,000. Translating that into other terms: Suppose 4,000,000 workers were on strike every day—you can imagine what a public outcry there would be.

So, we must grapple boldly with this problem. We must implement, supplement, and complement the work of public and private agencies dealing with all phases of rehabilitation and employment of handicapped.

It is not a job for any one group. This is another time when the good old American spirit and team play can accomplish what single groups acting alone, or, individuals, cannot.

I believe we should overhaul our Federal-State program. Two years ago, I introduced a bill to establish a Federal Commission for the Handicapped. This bill was written and militantly campaigned for by the American Federation of the Physically Handicapped, and, among other groups, I was honored, by having the support of the Fraternal Order of Eagles.

Today, in the light of the great need, the bill, considerably revised, will soon be reintroduced, and I hope that the Eagles will give it the same support which they accorded the original measure. It will require the united strength of many organizations such as the Eagles, to secure enactment, and I feel that the Fraternal Order of Eagles, with its long and splendid record of achievements in the public-welfare field will be a valuable ally.

The Eagles are entitled to much credit for having aroused interest in and for securing enactment of the old-age pension laws. They merit congratulations, for there is no question but that we owe our aged citizens a decent honorarium upon which they may live in comfort.

In the present instance the FOE has a great opportunity for national leadership. Through its more than 1,500 aeries and 1,350,000 members it can spur the public from its apathy and arouse it to positive action. It can summon to its aid the employing groups through community institutes.

Business and the public, once they realize the terrific drain upon our Nation's resources, both economic and human, in permitting a condition to continue, fester, and grow worse, should have no hesitancy, now that the real facts are becoming known, to spend money to do this job. When we reflect that to keep a human being in idleness, who may be willing and anxious to work, but cannot, because of lack of means to repair an injury or cure a disease, such idleness is more expensive than actual rehabilitation. We know that today with the high costs of living, food, shelter, medicines, etc., would require at least $1,200 a year, to keep such a person on public assistance or charity basis, whereas if we could spend, say $500 to $600, we could put that person into working condition. At the same time we would take the load off the backs of his or her family, community, State, and Nation, and thereafter, that person would be a contributor to the general welfare and be a taxpayer, instead of a tax eater. That, to me, is sound American common sense.

A bill to establish a Federal commission on services for the physically handicapped, to define its duties, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby created and established an agency of the United States, to be known as the Federal Commission on Services for the Physically Handicapped, which shall administer the provisions of this act, and all activities outlined under the following titles:

TITLE I. PURPOSES

SEC. 1. The purposes of this act, in furtherance of the general welfare and security of the United States, are (a) to provide for maximum extension of medical services, education and training, vocational guidance, and full employment opportunities to citizens handicapped by physical or mental disability; (b) to provide for a more effective coordination of the functions of the Federal Government relating to the rehabilitation and employment of the handicapped; (c) to provide for cooperative enterprises for the handicapped; (d) to provide financial grants to handicapped who are totally and permanently disabled; (e) to provide educational grants to handicapped who require home or special training; (f) to establish an Advisory Council on Affairs of the Handicapped; (g) to establish a Federal Interagency Committee on Rehabilitation and Employment of the Handicapped; (h) to establish a National Commission on Employment of Handicapped, composed of organizations and individuals outside of Government, to encourage employment of handicapped; (i) to establish a Division for Handicapped in the United States Civil Service Commission; (j) to provide for safety and sanitary engineers to assist in eliminating and preventing accidents and conditions tending to promote disease in Federal buildings; (k) to provide for reports on the handicapped from the United States Public Health Service and the United States Bureau of Mines, and for other purposes.

TITLE II. ORGANIZATION

SEC. 201. The Federal Commission on Services for the Physically Handicapped (hereafter termed the Commission), shall be headed by an Administrator, who shall be appointed for a term of 4 years by the President, by and with advice and consent of the Senate. The Administrator shall be paid a salary of $15,000 per annum, and, after consultation with the Advisory Committee on Affairs of the Handicapped (hereinafter described), is hereby authorized and directed to perform all duties, functions, and powers vested in him by this act. He shall have power to issue such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary to effectuate the purposes of this act, and to fix the pay of officials and employees in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended. He may also employ such specialists and consultants as may be required, without reference to civil-service laws. Whenever practicable, persons appointed shall be drawn from otherwise qualified, but physically handicapped applicants.

SEC. 202. The functions of the Federal Security Administrator relating to vocational rehabilitation, and the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation are hereby transferred to the Commission, together with all funds, personnel, and records. Hereafter, the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation shall be abolished, and retitled Federal Commission on Services for the Physically Handicapped. The Commission shall administer the Federal Vocational Rehabilitation Acts heretofore administered by the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation, retaining the present personnel of that agency, and maintaining the present relation with the States, with such additional functions as may be granted by this act.

SEC. 203. There is hereby established an Advisory Council on Affairs of the Handicapped, to be responsible to the Administrator in the formulation of administrative policies, and to advise him on any matters relating to promoting the purposes of this act. The council shall consist of nine members, who shall be selected by the Administrator, as follows: Two to be chosen as representatives of the public; two, as representatives of employers; two, as representatives of bona fide labor organizations, and three who are, themselves, physically handicapped, from bona fide organizations of the physically handicapped. The Administrator shall be ex officio chairman of the advisory council, which shall act in an advisory capacity to the Commission, and shall meet not less than twice yearly, or oftener, on call of the chairman. Appointed members shall serve for a period of 3 years, and shall be paid traveling and other necessary expenses, and a per diem of $50 per day for each day of actual service.

SEC. 204. There is hereby established a Federal Interagency Committee on Rehabilitation and Employment of Handicapped, which shall comprise qualified representatives to be chosen by the heads of all Federal departments or agencies which now, or in future may have a substantial and significant participation in activities dealing with problems of the handicapped.

SEC. 204 (a). The Administrator shall serve as chairman of the Federal Interagency Committee; shall prepare agendas therefor, and shall effectuate, insofar as may be possible, the programs and policies developed by the committee.

SEC. 204 (b). The purpose of this committee shall be to effect more economical and efficient methods for the administration of activities relating to the handicapped, and to coordinate functions including development, through research, advanced programs for the blind, deaf, hard of hearing, cardiacs, tuberculous, arthritics, epileptics, poliomyelitics, cerebral palsied, amputees, diabetics, and any other large or distinct group of handicapped to—

(2) Collect, tabulate, and make public statistics pertaining to the physically handicapped.

(3) Ascertain what fields of employment are available to the physically handicapped and make such information public at least once yearly.

(4) Acquaint employers in private industry with the special capabilities of the physically handicapped, and encourage their employment, where feasible and practicable, on an equal footing with the nonhandicapped.

(5) To cooperate with public and private agencies, organizations, and individuals, in the medical and vocational rehabilitation and placement in suitable employment of handicapped persons.

SEC. 205. There is hereby established a National Commission on Employment of Handicapped, to consist of organizations and individuals outside of the Federal Government, representing industry, business, labor, veterans, farm, women, welfare, educational, civic, religious, fraternal, scientific, and professional, and other groups and individuals, which, upon invitation of the Administrator, acting for the President of the United States, may voluntarily cooperate, on a year 'round basis, in advancing employment of handicapped.

SEC. 205 (a). This Commission shall have the right to establish its own rules of procedure; designate, by proper election, its chairman and other officers, and the small staff required to carry on its work, as well as quarters, equipment, etc., shall be furnished by the Administrator.

SEC. 205 (b), The sum of $250,000, or such part as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated, each year, out of the Treasury, from moneys not otherwise appropriated, to carry on the work of this Commission on Employment of the Handicapped, and all funds shall be cleared through the Administrator of the Federal Commission on Services for the Physically Handicapped, upon proper certification by the duly elected head of the National Commission for Employment of Handicapped.

TITLE III. COOPERATIVE ENTERPRISES FOR HANDICAPPED

SEC. 301. The sum of $10,000,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for the fiscal year 1949, and $5,000,000 annually for each of the 5 years thereafter, for establishing and maintaining special industries for physically handicapped persons.

SEC. 302. Out of the foregoing sums the Commission is authorized and empowered to make loans, through its States' agencies and affiliates, to persons, corporations, States, Territories, or subdivisions, or agencies thereof, or limited dividend organizations organized under the laws of any State or Territory, for the purpose of financing work projects for physically handicapped persons, primarily drawn from the group termed "unfeasible for rehabilitation," who require special conditions of employment and training, such as is now afforded in a most limited way, by various so-called handicapped persons' industries, sheltered workshops, and so forth. No single loan shall exceed $20,000, and not less than 25 percent in amount of all loans shall be granted in rural areas.

SEC. 303. Such loans shall be made on such terms and conditions as the Commission shall determine; Provided, That all loans shall be self-liquidating in not to exceed 25 years, and shall bear interest at a rate equal to the average rate payable by the United States on its obligations, having maturity in 10 years or more, after the dates thereof, issued during the last preceding fiscal year in which any such obligations were issued, Provided, further, That no loans for the purchase, construction, enlargement, or operation of any plan shall be made without the consent of the State authority having jurisdiction in the premises, first being obtained.

TITLE IV. GRANTS TO TOTALLY DISABLED, UNFEASIBLE FOR REHABILITATION

SEC. 401. Physically handicapped citizens of the United States who, upon application to the Commission, are certified by it as totally and permanently disabled and unfeasible for rehabilitation, and are without means of livelihood or support, shall be paid, by the Bureau of Public Assistance of the Social Security Board, through appropriate State agencies, the sum of $60 per month, beginning with the month following that in which the Commission's certification is filed with the Social Security Board. Receipt of such $60 per month from the Federal Government by such unfeasible persons shall not debar them from applying for, or receiving benefits from other sources: Provided, That this section shall not include veterans who may be so provided for, under veterans' benefits acts.

SEC. 402. The Commission shall, through appropriate State agencies, at least once each year, make a thorough medical examination of such unfeasible cases, and in event it is determined possible to rehabilitate any of them by any means, including new or advanced developments in medical, surgical, or therapeutic sciences, upon such report and certification by the Commission, the monthly amount of $60 paid to such unfeasible cases, shall be discontinued and, in lieu thereof, the regular processes of rehabilitation shall be applied to such unfeasible cases.

SEC. 403. In event such unfeasible cases may be determined by the Commission as being potentially capable of rehabilitation, shall enter upon and pursue treatment or training designed to effect rehabilitation, and after treatment or training, fail to become able to care for themselves, or earn their own living, then, upon examination and certification by agents of the Commission, the Social Security Board, through its State agencies, shall reenter such unfeasible cases upon its registers, and the monthly payment of $60 by the Board shall be immediately resumed.

SEC. 404. The Commission shall report to the President, and to Congress, each year, upon the number and type of unfeasible cases, and the disposition made thereof.

TITLE V. EDUCATIONAL GRANTS FOR UNFEASIBLE CASES

SEC. 501. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000,000 for the fiscal year 1949, and $2,000,000 annually, thereafter, and from the amounts hereunder appropriated, the Commission is authorized and empowered, through its State agencies, to make outright grants to local nonprofit educational groups, including special services to handicapped by local school boards, organized with the objective of providing a means of teaching and training physically handicapped persons, commonly known as shut-ins, whose disabilities confine them to their homes, or beds. Grants shall be made pro rata on the basis of population: Provided, That not less than 25 percent of all grants in any fiscal year shall be made to groups located in rural areas.

TITLE VI. UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

SEC. 601. There is hereby established in the United States Civil Service Commission a Division for the Physically Handicapped, with a Chief, and such staff as may be required. It shall be the duty of the Division to deal with problems attendant upon the recruitment, examination, and appointment of physically handicapped applicants for employment in the Federal Civil Service. It is declared to be the policy of the Congress that no citizen, otherwise qualified, shall be denied the right to examination and appointment by reason of physical disability.

SEC. 602. The expense of the operation and administration of the Division for the Physically Handicapped shall hereafter be included in the regular appropriations for the Civil Service Commission. Such sums as may be necessary for the establishment and operation of the Division are hereby authorized to be appropriated.

TITLE VII. AID TO THE BLIND

SEC. 701. Operations under this act shall continue present aids to blind, through commissions, bureaus, or divisions for blind now established. Benefits now received by the blind shall not prejudice nor debar the blind from seeking or receiving such additional benefits as may be made available under this act, nor shall anything in this act be construed as abolishing or limiting any benefits now received by the blind.

TITLE VIII. SAFETY AND SANITARY ENGINEERS

SEC. 801. The Commission is authorized to cooperate with all Federal agencies in devising and arranging for proper safeguards to life and limb in public buildings, and eliminating and preventing conditions therein tending to promote disease or cause injury. It may employ safety engineers and sanitary engineers as required, who may, with the consent of the agency having jurisdiction, inspect and report on any and all buildings used by the Federal Government.

SEC. 802. The Commission may also cooperate with the American Institute of Architects and other interested groups and individuals, with a view to having public and other buildings constructed or remodeled with ramps, in addition to stairs and/or elevators, and with railings to facilitate the free and safe movement of lame and crippled persons, when designing and operating public and other buildings, institutions, parks, and conveyances.

TITLE IX. UNITED STATES PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

SEC. 901. The Public Health Service shall, through its field offices, report to the local agents of the Commission, as soon as possible after the effective date of this act, once monthly, the names, addresses, and other pertinent information, of citizens who, by reason of physical disablement, are in need of services to be afforded by the United States, under the terms of this act.

TITLE X. UNITED STATES BUREAU OF MINES

SEC. 1001. The United States Bureau of Mines shall, through its field offices, report to the local agents of the Commission, as soon as possible after the effective date of this act, once monthly, the names, addresses, or other pertinent information of all those who may be disabled by accidents or disease incurred in or around the mines, as soon as practicable after such accidents or diseases occur.

TITLE XI. GENERAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 1101. The term "States," as used in this act, means the States, Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands, or the District of Columbia.

SEC. 1102. For the purpose of administering this act and for the purpose of making the investigations, studies, publications, and reports herein provided for, including cost of personal service in the District of Columbia, and elsewhere; stenographic recording and translating service (by contract, if deemed necessary), without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes; traveling expenses by attendance at meetings when specifically authorized by the Administrator; supplies and equipment, purchase and exchange of medical and reference books, directories, periodicals, newspapers and press clippings; purchase, operation, and maintenance of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles; printing and binding (in addition to that otherwise provided by law), and for all other necessary expenses in carrying out the provisions of this act, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year such sums as the Congress may determine to be necessary.

SEC. 1103. The provisions of this act shall not apply and the Government shall not be liable for claims in the cases of persons who are well provided for, financially, by such as—

(1) Recovery of large amounts on suits for damages, in personal injury cases.

(2) Payment of special compensation for injury or disease, covered by State laws (but not by present Federal laws).

(3) Other conditions under which disabled persons are sufficiently provided for.

SEC. 1104. If any provision of this act, or the application thereto to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provisions to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 1105. This act shall be known as the Federal Aid to the Physically Handicapped Act.

SEC. 1106. All laws or parts of laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 1107. This act shall be effective 90 days after date of enactment.

STATEMENT OF PAUL A. STRACHAN, PRESIDENT, AMERICAN FEDERATION OF THE PHYSICALLY HANDICAPPED, INC., ON S. 2896—A BILL TO ESTABLISH A FEDERAL COMMISSION ON SERVICES FOR THE PHYSICALLY HANDICAPPED

The problems of our 28,000,000 handicapped citizens, many of whom are seriously disabled, fully warrant establishment of a Federal Commission to function solely in their interest. Their acute, often distressing problems are special problems which can only be dealt with in a specialized way, by specialists.

Administration of such an agency should be independent of other phases of Government activity because Congress, the President, and the public are entitled to know what is being done for the disabled; by whom it is being done; the cost, and the results. Today, agencies dealing with these matters are scattered widely; they have little or no coordination and there is bound to be duplication of effort and consequent waste of time and taxpayers' money, to say nothing of the fact that the present services, facilities, and personnel are wholly inadequate to the needs of the handicapped.

As stated, requirements of our millions of handicapped are growing more acute each day, particularly those who are civilians, and they cannot be adequately dealt with on any other than a basis of special service. If the transportation interests are serviced in Government by the Interstate Commerce Commission; banking interests by the Federal Reserve Board, Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and several other agencies; farmers and cattle raisers by the Department of Agriculture; working people by the Department of Labor; veterans, by the Veterans' Administration; those of road builders and construction groups by the Federal Works Agency, and many other special groups having their interests represented by special services of the Federal Government, then, in justice and equity, to say nothing of conservation of lives and human values, as well as strengthening the national security by improving the welfare of our people—the handicapped, who have few real champions, are fully entitled to a special agency in their own interest—properly manned by experts, and equipped with facilities and means sufficient to do a real job, instead of merely scratching the surface, as is now the case.

"Rehabilitation" is a meaningless term, because of the prevailing confusion as to the objectives it should accomplish. Therefore, to clarify and improve the understanding of the public, we propose changing the present Office of Vocational Rehabilitation to "The Federal Commission on Services for the Physically Handicapped" so that all people, and especially the handicapped themselves—at least 75 percent of whom, today, don't know what "Rehabilitation" means, after more than 20 years of effort to sell that name to them—will know exactly what the agency stands for, and what it is supposed to do.

Such a Commission would be able to cope more successfully with the multiple requirements of handicapped with any office or bureau. It should have independent powers, because it will deal with many subjects heretofore not part of the rehabilitation concept, which are necessary if the job is to be done right.

After 30 years' observation, study, and practice in this field, we firmly believe passage of this bill to be essential to the proper development of a program for the handicapped. We feel that the Congress can thus express its long-publicized desire and intent to afford better services for the disabled and by so doing concentrate sufficient of the present activities under one head so that better administration and more economy will produce greater results.

Obviously, Congress cannot be expected to be familiar with all details of a field which is now covered by some forty-odd Federal agencies, each of which has a part of the handicapped program. From time to time such agencies as are shown to be properly within its defined area could be integrated in the Commission until a well-proportioned whole is achieved.

We stress that the Commission would provide important and necessary services which are not now provided, and because of their lack make present operations of the program incomplete, awkward, and in many instances unworkable, all of which is a detriment to the Nation's welfare and particularly the welfare of the millions of handicapped who require such services.

TITLE I. PURPOSE

This outlines the scope of the act.

TITLE II. ORGANIZATION

This outlines and defines the functions of the Commission and the administrator thereof. Under this title, it is pointed out that much of the present duplication and waste of effort and money could be eliminated because the prime objective here is to coordinate many functions now scattered through various agencies. Also, present agencies lack requisite powers to educate the public, particularly employers, as to the value of handicapped as workers, and this title confers such powers upon the proposed Commission.

This title transfers the functions of the Federal Security Administrator relating to vocational rehabilitation and the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation to the proposed Commission, and henceforth all Federal vocational rehabilitation acts shall operate under the Commission. The present staff of the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation would be retained and the Federal-States relationship continue as under the present law.

It establishes an Advisory Council on Affairs of the Handicapped, composed of experts in this field, as a policy-developing unit, the need for which is very clear.

It provides a base for, and outlines the functions of, the Federal Interagency Committee on Rehabilitation and Employment of Handicapped, as a coordinating body, to bring order out of the present chaotic situation wherein approximately 40 agencies go in different directions at the same time. The proposed Commission is the logical place to coordinate such activities, and its composition thus would, doubtless, be the means of effectuating greater efficiency and economy in the operations of the various agencies involved.

It establishes a National Commission on Employment of Handicapped, to consist of representatives of national organizations and individuals outside of Government, to function voluntarily, on a year-round basis, to encourage employment of handicapped. This would provide a necessary and logical base, for example, for the activities of the present President's Committee on National Employ the Physically Handicapped Week, which has no present legal status, and which should, logically, be based in the Commission. Since the President's Committee on National Employ the Physically Handicapped Week presently has no funds to project and expand educational campaigns to promote employment of handicapped, this provides a relatively small sum for that purpose.

TITLE III. COOPERATIVE ENTERPRISES FOR HANDICAPPED

The Congress should remedy the present situation, wherein submarginal public assistance to handicapped does not provide them means to live, be treated, and trained so that they may earn their own living, and thus make substantial contributions to the national economy, if possible to do so, by learning trades or occupations, under conditions wherein their handicap is not a factor, or, at least, is properly evaluated and provided for.

Sheltered workshops are not a new concept. They have proven of great value in many respects. Yet they are too limited in number, have inadequate facilities and means, and in many instances lack business management. They offer a practical solution for the lack of training schools, as well as a means of affording income for otherwise capable but handicapped people, who have never had opportunity, especially when pitted against nonhandicapped in our rigid competitive employment system.

It is estimated by the Social Security Board that there are conservatively 3,600,000 totally and permanently disabled people in the United States. These, for the most part, are termed "unemployable and nonfeasible for rehabilitation." Many of them are bedfast or confined to wheel chairs, and a considerable number are destitute and wholly dependent upon an uncertain charity to sustain even the barest necessities of life.

In the light of continued improvement in medicine, surgery, and therapeutics, as well as discovery and application of new drugs and new type of treatments, it is reasonable to believe that many such cases rated unfeasible yesterday, or even today, may within a week, a month, or a year, or even longer, because of some new discovery become entirely feasible of rehabilitation.

On the other hand, when only superficial medical examinations or treatment are given, as, no doubt, in many instances has been the case when the applicant is termed "unfeasible," there is room for considerable margin of doubt, if not positive error, in such diagnosis and no medical examination should be accepted that is not thorough in every respect, and such examinations should be given at reasonably frequent intervals as a means of proper determination in any case.

The only practicable, just, and humane way to deal with this matter is, to see to it that such persons are afforded thorough diagnosis by qualified physicians, and if the findings show such persons to be totally unfeasible for rehabilitation, then, if such persons are destitute, or wholly dependent upon others for livelihood, who, themselves, are unable to bear the expense of providing a living for such unfeasibles, then, such unfeasibles should be certified by the Commission as being wholly unemployable, and provided a Federal grant, the moderate sum of $60 per month.

Operations under this title would act as a double check, most effectively, and would reveal, over the long run, a more accurate picture of the so-called "shut ins", and provide for their needs, however meagerly, by recognizing the Federal obligation to them by a small grant—if they are disqualified for rehabilitation.

Rehabilitation agencies would have the responsibility of periodically giving medical examinations to such unfeasible cases, so that the real objective would be carried out—"rehabilitation," and not, "grant, or pension," unless the latter is absolutely necessary. But, as an alternative, there would be provided a means of meeting the fear of poverty, illness, the misery of being wholly dependent upon others who lack means, themselves, in the minds of destitute and totally disabled handicapped citizens.

We urge upon the Congress the great need and desirability of approving this title.

TITLE V. EDUCATIONAL GRANTS FOR UNFEASIBLE CASES

Many handicapped, especially those in rural, sparsely settled areas, are denied access to educational facilities. In many cases, schools are located considerable distance from the homes of persons where, for example, there are handicapped children, and it is not practicable for such handicapped children, or even adults, to attend such schools.

This title provides a modest beginning on development of a great and essential program, that of teaching the home-bound handicapped. In the case of the "Shut-Ins," it would provide a godsend, indeed, as development of this program, within the next few years would, doubtless, bring all the latest and most scientific means of learning, right to the bedside, by radio, motion pictures, television, etc.

TITLE VI. UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

Growing requirements of civil service, dealing with physically handicapped people, necessitates establishing a regular division with the Civil Service Commission for that express purpose. The expense would be nominal; the effects far-reaching and beneficial, and operations under this title would implement the declaration of congressional policy, exemplified in H. R. 4236 (80th Cong. 2d sess.) which provides that no handicapped person, otherwise qualified, shall be denied examination or appointment to positions for which they may be fitted.

TITLE VII. AID TO THE BLIND

This continues and expands present means of assistance and rehabilitation to the blind. It provides some additional means of training, over the present set-up, of which blind may avail themselves, if they so desire.

TITLE VIII. SAFETY AND SANITARY ENGINEERS

This title provides for inspection services not now in general use, and which are needed, both from the standpoint of conserving the health of employees of the Government, and the public, using Government building, but, actually saving money for the Government by eliminating causes of accident and disease to Federal workers and others.

There is little need to dwell upon this matter, because it is manifest that the Federal Government should take steps immediately, to prevent acident, or illness, in the erection and reconditioning of buildings, and the equipping thereof, to provide such safeguards as may be necessary, upon recommendation of qualified safety and sanitary engineers.

TITLE IX. UNITED STATES PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

The United States Public Health Service already has physicians and surgeons covering all parts of the United States. There is no good reason why such agents of USPHS should not, as a part of their administrative functions, inform the Commission as to those handicapped within their respective areas who would be eligible for services to be performed by the Commission.

This is to eliminate much of the waste motion that now prevents speedy handling of cases, particularly in locating; having proper application made; processing and completing essential work on behalf of the rehabilitation of the individual.

With but rare exceptions, diseases and accidents, leading to a physical handicap, are not static, but dynamic. They get better, or worse, as the case may be, but they should be immediately treated, if the individual is to have a fair chance of full recovery. Therefore, in this matter, the USPHS can play a very important role in getting a case into processing, without so much lost time.

TITLE X. UNITED STATES BUREAU OF MINES

Accidents and diseases due to working in mines, often cause great disasters and loss of life and property. It is matter of record that many accidents cause numbers of men to lose the use of limbs; become paraplegics, amputees, victims of silicosis and consequent respiratory diseases, and so forth.

Quick rehabilitation processes must be applied, and since the Bureau of Mines already has a Health and Safety Service, it would be a comparatively simple matter for that Bureau to notify the Commission as to these accidents and disease epidemics, etc., so that prompt steps may be taken to treat the victims thereof.

TITLE XI. GENERAL PROVISIONS

This title provides for the appropriations which may be necessary to operate the Commission; shows what types of persons would not be eligible for the benefits administered by the Commission, etc.

Address of Hon. Lindsay C. Warren, Comptroller General of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GRAHAM A. BARDEN
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to include a speech made by the Honorable Lindsay C. Warren, who was for many years a most valuable Member of this body but who is at present Comptroller General of the United States. Mr. Warren delivered this speech on May 31, 1948, at New Bern, N. C., at which time a fine group of Coast Guard men were tendered a banquet in recognition of a heroic rescue performed by them off the coast of North Carolina. For many, many years the Coast Guard men throughout the Nation, and especially those stationed on the coast of North Carolina, have regarded Mr. Warren as one of the best friends the service ever had.

The speech follows:

I appreciate so much the invitation to join you tonight to honor men of the Coast Guard, a very great service which will always be my favorite one. From my earliest boyhood and on through the years, I have visited every shore station on the coast of our State, have known those who manned them, and formed many lasting friendships, and have thrilled over their daring and their exploits.

The Coast Guard, the oldest of all the services, looms high in the admiration and affection of North Carolinians. A dangerous and treacherous coast line brought the Coast Guard to us in the days of its infancy. It has been only in recent years that the inventive genius of man has contrived instruments such as the radio compass, radar, loran, and other inventions that has made sea travel less dangerous and at the same time has revolutionized the work of these ambassadors of mercy.

On account of this and to our regret, many of our shore stations have been permanently decommissioned and are no longer even owned by the Government. This, in my opinion, has impaired the service, has left sections of the coast unprotected if an emergency should arise, and has created a morale situation by taking men far from their homes. After all, a contented and happy man in a station near his home is the one who will render the best service, and I hope the officials will again recognize this salutary policy as they did several years back.

Just this last winter I read of the station in Massachusetts that had not received a sea assistance call in 23 years. But one finally came, and over a score of men are living today because that station was there. As one who helped to fight the battles of the Coast Guard in other years, and whose affection for it is deep-seated, I deplore the niggardly policy that has caused so many of these stations on the Atlantic coast to be closed. They should be kept open to stand there like a policeman on his beat, ready for a call if one should come.

I wish I could talk some about the activities of the Coast Guard, its far-flung operations, its Academy and its commissioned personnel, its cutter service, its aids to navigation, its iceberg and seal patrols, its air bases, its fine Commandant, and all the things the Coast Guard does in a day's work. But tonight we are paying tribute to those in shore stations, to the enlisted personnel, to those who move about the little communities in which they are stationed, and who are looked up to and respected because they have earned it as representatives of a noble service.

Looking over the list of those you honor tonight, I see names of men whose ancestors were always coast guardsmen. They were men who were born near the sea and who faced it with respect, but always unafraid. Read the log book of any station on the North Carolina coast and you will find in short and at times in simple and crude words hundreds of glorious epics of unexcelled heroism.

It was old Capt. Bannister Midgett, that tough, rough old salt, who 75 years ago, launching his boats from the beach at Chicamacomico, with only the strong shoulders and the brawn of his men to move them through a raging sea, recorded in his log the next morning this cryptic entry:

"We herd em, we seed em, and we went out and fetched em. No. saved, 63; No. lost, 0."

Not one word did it tell of the men who accomplished such a feat; not a word did it mention of their own suffering, nor was their heroism recorded.

About 20 years ago I attended a large dinner such as this at Elizabeth City when medals and promotions were bestowed on groups who had made two notable rescues of large numbers. The greatest commandant the Coast Guard has ever had, the friend and champion of the enlisted man, my own dear friend, the late Admiral R. R. Waesche, was there with many others to pay tribute to them. Many of you remember the late James Henry Garrish, of Ocracoke. Speeches had been made by all of the so-called notables when finally Admiral Waesche said: "Let's hear from Captain Garrish just how it all happened." We settled back in our seats prepared to hear a long and graphic story from the lips of a man who was there. He got up, straightened out his giant frame and sputtered: "Well, we went out and we brung them in." And then he sat down. How well that illustrates the modesty and brave men and those who saved the crew of the Norfolk would undoubtedly tell their story in the same modest language.

Semper paratus—always prepared, always ready, is their motto. It was old Capt. Pat Etherdige, that valiant officer in charge of the Nags Head station of yester-year who contributed a priceless saying that has become a legend in Coast Guard history. A wreck was offshore in the deep of the night. Frantic signals were coming in from the stricken ship. It was a sea in which only the stoutest boat could survive and only stout-hearted men could face. For a moment there was hesitation on the part of a newly married surfman who cried out: "Captain, none of us will ever come back." Old Captain Pat, stern old long bearded man of the sea, without education, replied that he would read what the regulations had to say about such a situation. The story goes that when he opened the book it was upside down. "The regulations say," said he, "when you get a call you must go out there. I can't find where they say anything about how you are going to get back. Come on, men, and follow me." And they went out and they brought back 32 human beings who were snatched from the jaws of death.

World War I and World War II came to the shores of North Carolina with a tremendous impact. We witnessed the wanton destruction of the lightship on Diamond Shoals by the submarines of the Kaiser. No history can ever tell of a greater story than that of the Mirlo, when Capt. John Allen Midgett and his men went through a wall of an ocean on fire and with an almost sublime daring accomplished the impossible. None know better than most of this audience that from Nags Head to Beaufort Inlet the last war struck in all its fury and brutality and that deeds of valor and sacrifice were daily occurrences. The wrecks of scores of our own merchant ships and many enemy submarines are silent reminders of how near this conflict came to our section.

When, beginning with Guadalcanal and continuing on with Tarawa, Iwo Jima, Bougainville and Guam, the fate of ruthless Japan was being sealed, it was Coast Guard boys from coastal North Carolina, the sons, and grandsons and great-grandsons of those who made the Coast Guard great, trained for the purpose, who piloted the first waves to the beaches. Such has always been Coast Guard spirit. Such was the spirit in March 1943 when one more marvelous rescue was added to the long list and 22 men of the motor vessel, Norfolk, were spared for their loved ones.

So, ladies and gentlemen, all hail to the Swansboro, Bogue Inlet, Cape Lookout and Fort Macon lifeboat stations, and their sturdy men, and all hail to the Coast Guard wherever they are operating, and in the words of the psalmist, all hail to:

"They that go down to the sea in ships that do business in great waters:
These see the works of the Lord, and His wonders in the deep."

Soil and Life Essay Program, Schools of Lord Fairfax Soil Conservation District

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BURR P. HARRISON
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I append an essay by Dane Mattos Long, of the Berryville Elementary School, Berryville, Va., on the subject of conservation:

1948 SOIL AND LIFE ESSAY PROGRAM, SCHOOLS OF LORD FAIRFAX SOIL CONSERVATION DISTRICT

(By Dane Mattos Long, Berryville, Va., seventh grade, Berryville Elementary School, Miss Garnet Levi, teacher)

Even since the early days man has realized that his life and that of his community depend on the soil and natural resources which surround them. He knows that from the soil come all the necessities of life for his standard of living. His food, both meat and vegetables, get their life from the soil. To be of real value they must come from a fertile soil—not one wasted by erosion. The plants or vegetables grow directly in the soil. From these or other plants the vegetarians or plant-eaters get their food. Upon these plant-eaters the meat consuming animals feed, and thus, directly or indirectly, all of man's food comes from the soil.

His clothing also comes from the soil. The cotton, which is the most important fabric in modern life, come directly from the soil. Wool which is sheared from sheep is another important fiber. The sheep get their food from crops which grow in the soil. Silk is a fiber which comes from the silkworm spinning its cocoon. These worms get their food from mulberry leaves. Linen, another fabric, is made from flax. All of these and other plants that clothe us get their food from the soil, air and water. Man can do much in soil and water conservation.

One of the most indispensable products in man's life gets its direct start in the soil. This product, upon which man depends so much, is wood. The products of wood, such as cellulose, wood pulp, plywood, and others, play an important part in any household. Just peek into the average home in America. When you enter you will step through a door of wood, step over a threshold of wood, and step into a floor also made of wood. Look around you and the number of wood products is almost endless. You might see a piano, which is made of tropical wood, mahogany. The keys also might be of a tropical wood, mahogany. The keys also might be of a tropical wood, ebony. Over in a corner you might see a chest; that, too, will be made of wood. You could go on forever with a list of wooden products which are found in the home and elsewhere. If something happened and all of the wood and its products disappeared from the earth man would probably find living almost an impossibility because we have become so dependent upon wood and its products to shelter and even partially clothe and comfort us. This all goes back to the fact that the standard of living is firmly rooted in the soil.

However, true all of this may be as we are still forgetting an important fact. This fact is that in the process of securing these necessities we are mistreating and abusing our soil. Many farmers, with their eyes on high prices, have planted crops where time, weather conditions, and the kind of soil are not suitable and conservation practices were not used. This may be profitable the first few years but later on it will catch up with them. The catching up will be in the form of erosion. Erosion, that is the combined agencies of wind, rain, and water, will descend upon the fields of these unwise farmers and gradually carry away the precious top soil and to the detriment of all—individuals and business alike.

Erosion might well be considered public enemy No. 1. Every year more than 500,000 acres of land are murdered. This land was murdered by the wind, the rain, or washed away by floods where careless farmers failed to use known conservation practices. Practices which give on an average one-third better yields and saves precious soil for future use.

Erosion, with all its dirty work, is robbing the world of its soil many times faster than nature can replace it. Erosion, even with its dirty work, does not get a start without our help. Careless farming methods, wasteful cutting of the forests, overgrazing, and all of the allies of erosion are causing us to lose about a half million acres of soil a year. Nature builds topsoil at the rate only 1 inch in 500 to 1,000 years. Mankind has less than 7 inches of topsoil between it and starvation today. It is against these kinds of circumstances that we must fight.

If we are to retain our health, prosperity, and freedom, we must keep our soil we now have left. To do this is simply a matter of patience and good common sense in the application of tested conservation measures now practiced by thousands of good farmers throughout the Nation and the world, where they use and conserve productive soil and rainfall.

There are many tools that play an important part in stopping erosion's dirty work. One of these is contour farming—crops rows on the level. This might seem a commonsense thing to do, yet the pioneers made it harder for themselves and their animals by plowing up and down the slope. Rows that go across the slope form little dams that hold the soil when it rains. In this way the water is allowed to soak into the ground instead of rushing down the rows, taking precious soil and seed with it. Part of this water which is allowed to soak into the soil is stored for later use by the crops, and the rest is added to the underground supply to feed springs, wells, streams, and ponds. Thomas Jefferson taught and practiced the art of contour farming. Beautiful patterns of contour and conservation farming are to be seen here in our Lord Fairfax Soil Conservation District. Still all too frequent is the ancient square farming with crop rows up-and-down hill, forming gutters to hasten soil and rainfall off the field.

When the pioneers were farming they made one crop their money crop. They planted this same crop over and over again on the same soil. When they wore out one farm they moved to another, when that one wore out they moved to still another. They could have avoided all the poverty and despair that their worn-out soil brought them if they had used a good crop rotation and other simple conservation measures. That means alternating production of various crops on a piece of land to keep the soil productive and to improve it. In a good rotation including grasses and legumes, one crop helps the next one. Crop rotation also can be combined with strip cropping, giving the crop rotation in a pattern of alternate contour strips, increasing yields and conserving soil and rainfall.

Strip cropping means planting alternate strips of crops. Strips of close growing crops like grass and clover between strips of a clean cultivated crop like corn in the crop rotation. The strips of close growing crops hold the water and keep it from eroding to the clean tilled crops below. The strips must be planted in accordance with the slope of the land; that is, the steeper the slope the narrower the strip. Contour strips on farms in our area are from 70 to 100 feet wide and are effective in conservation of soil and rainfall, giving larger yields of better crops.

Another method of soil conservation is terracing. Just imagine a flight of stairs up and down the hills—that is just what terraces look like. They are embankments built on the slope to check water run-off. A terrace with a slight grade slows down run-off water, and guides it to safe disposal areas or grassed waterways.

In places where there are strong winds trees and tall growing plants help hold down erosion. Trees planted in belts of several rows wide are used as windbreaks. These trees help to break the force of the wind and reduce erosion. Trees also help conquer erosion in another way. They send down masses of roots that help hold the soil in place. Careless farming and cutting practices add so much to flood damage each year. Without this protective cover of trees and close-growing crops the major floods would be even more disastrous. Simple conservation practices applied to a watershed may reduce floods 25 to 35 percent.

Lands that are steeply sloping and cannot be used for crops even with the most protective measure should be turned into pastures, woodland, or wildlife areas. These lands if managed right and not overgrazed will hold erosion to a minimum. If you mistreat the land it will soon be bare of all of its protective plants and erosion will start its dirty work. Look at the Navajo Indians' plight at this very moment. Their main source of income was from their sheep. They allowed the sheep to overgraze the land, that is, they literally grazed the grass cover right off. When this protective blanket was gone, the lands eroded severely which limits the number of sheep they can now have. This number is not enough to keep a good standard of living; consequently there is poverty and despair among these people. Many people of ancient days followed similar roads to destruction.

When a farmer harvests his crops, he is usually taking more from the land than he is putting back and erosion on fields cultivated up-and-down slopes lose from 10 to 21 times more plant food by erosion than by that removed by crops. If in the course of time he doesn't do something to protect and restore the fertility to the soil it will just wear out or die away. Farmers do put some of nature's food back into the soil in a number of ways. One is the use of 16,000,000 tons of commercial fertilizer annually to say nothing of large amounts of lime. These fertilizers are a mixture of chemicals required for production of larger yields of better crops for better living. Another method is the correct use of manure, crop residues, and cover crops. They add much plant food and organic matter. Every year millions of dollars are wasted by allowing manure to leach out in the barnyard and costly fertilizer, lime, and seed to float away in eroding topsoil. Most of this could be protected. Obsolete practices are aiding erosion to destroy faster than soil is being built and protected through practical, easily applied conservation practices.

Right now the United States is the most progressive and resourceful country on the globe, and we are now on a global basis, but we weaken that position as we continue to lose our soil as the pressure on our cropland increases. It is almost unthinkable that intelligent America should be losing, by wasteful practices, 3,000,000,000 tons of precious life-giving topsoil annually. Many countries are now studying in this country our patterns and practices of soil conservation and are asking for the help of our scientists trained in soil conservation. We are now forced to think on a global basis. Think of Japan with less than one-quarter acre of cropland per person, China with less than one-half acre, Africa and Western Europe 1 acre, United States and Canada with only 3½ acres.

In his code of agricultural ethics, Dr. M. M. Hargraves, Mayo Clinic, writes:

"A good agriculturalist recognizes the basic nature of the soil and its relationship to all life and the economy of living. He knows that all individual health, happiness, and accomplishment, as well as that of the community, nation, and the world goes back to this indispensable soil."

The Miles City, Mont., Veterans' Hospital

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I am inserting in the RECORD copies of correspondence between myself and the United States Army engineers relative to the building of the proposed veterans' hospital at Miles City, Mont. I do this so that the people of Montana will know what the situation is with respect to this facility. It is my hope that the hospital for veterans at Miles City will be a reality in the very near future.

MAY 6, 1948.

Gen. J. S. BRAGDON,
Office of Engineers,
Gravely Point,
Department of the Army.

DEAR GENERAL BRAGDON: Since the Miles City Veterans' Hospital was authorized in June 1945, I have been making every effort to further the construction of this hospital at the earliest opportunity because of the great need for this facility for veterans of eastern Montana and western North Dakota, but it appears nothing but delay has resulted since that time due to facts over which the Corps of Engineers, I think, would have some control but in the final analysis has done very little.

I was informed in 1945, that a Montana architect could not be considered because of the fact that he could not complete the plans within a 60-day period. I know that since that time it has taken more than 60 days to complete the original plans and I know at the present time it is taking a great deal more than 6 months to complete the new plans. It has been well over a year since the bids were first called for on the Miles City Veterans' Hospital and at that time the bids were turned down because they were too much out of proportion to the estimated figure in the Office of Engineers. This is, of course, understood. However, I was informed last summer that bids would be called for again at the first of this year but nothing happened at that time and since then the calling of the bids has been put off from time to time until now the earliest time, so we have been informed, at which the bids will be offered will be around September 1948.

I think there is no justification for the policy pursued by the Corps of Engineers in this respect and I have called your office on a number of occasions and have been put off all the time by promises of something happening in the immediate future As it is almost 3 years since the Miles City Hospital was authorized, I feel that the time is long overdue when construction should have been started on this vitally important project. I cannot understand why it is taking so long to call for bids on this project and I want to take this means to urge on you that this matter be given your immediate attention and that bids be called for at the first earliest date. By this I do not mean September 1948 or later. I do mean sometime sooner.

I would appreciate hearing from you as to what you intend to do on this matter because if nothing is coming from your office, I will push this matter to a head so that I will get action at the earliest opportunity.

Must close now, but expecting a reply from you about this very important matter in the very near future and with best personal wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

MIKE MANSFIELD.

P. S.—I am informed that when the original bids last summer were turned down that the cost of each room at that time was estimated at $10,000. I repeat, I find no fault with your refusing the bids offered then because of the fact that they were away out of line. However, it is my understanding that the cost per room in this unit since that time with the rising prices, and it seems that the prices will continue rising, is approximately $11,000. If this continues, the result will be that the hospital will have far too few rooms and far too little in the way of facilities needed. It appears to me that it is imperative if the veterans of Montana are to receive any benefits out of this hospital, that it must be constructed at the earliest moment.

M. M.

MAY 22, 1948.

Gen. J. S. BRAGDON,
Office of Engineers,
Gravely Point,
Department of the Army.

DEAR GENERAL BRAGDON: As a result of my letter to you of May 6, I had a conference in my office with Mr. A. V. McIver and associate who are drawing up the plans for the Veterans Hospital at Miles City. Mr. McIver informed me that he would do his very best to get the plans completed by July 23, 1948, if possible and certainly by August 1 at the very latest. He also stated that the 45 days waiting period and study by the Corps of Engineers would not, on the basis of information he had received, be applicable in this particular instance but that after the plans were completed, bids would be immediately called for and the contractors would have 30 days to study them.

On this basis, it would appear reasonably sure that one of the bids, if within the specified range, would be acceptable and a contract let for the construction of the Veterans Hospital at Miles City by September 1.

In view of the fact that I have received these assurances from Mr. McIver, I will be satisfied if bids are called for and if acceptable, the contract let for the veterans hospital by the first of September.

Must close now, but thanking you for your attention to this matter and with best personal wishes, I am

Sincerely yours.

Copies to Alfred S. Kurtz, Engineers, room 2629, Gravely Point; Col. William C. Hall, Engineers, room 2555 Gravely Point; Col. Emerson Itschner, Engineers, room 2433, Gravely Point; A. V. McIver, Strain Building, Great Falls, Mont.

P. S.—I would appreciate a reply to this letter and confirmation of the statements contained therein.

M. M.

DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, D. C., June 2, 1948.

Hon. MIKE MANSFIELD,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. MANSFIELD: Reference is made to your letters of May 6 and May 22, 1948, addressed to Brigadier General Bragdon, in which you urged that contracts for the construction of the Miles City, Mont., Veterans' Administration Hospital be awarded by September 1, 1948.

The status of the design of this hospital has been reviewed, and by modifying to some extent the normal procedure for the completion of the design and for advertising for bids, I hope to be able to receive bids about September 8, 1948. Technical experts from this office will visit the architect-engineer at frequent intervals to assist him in completing the design by about July 23. Furthermore, the 10-day period required for reproducing the plans and specifications after the design is completed will be reduced to 7 days, if practicable. The usual procedure of checking the plans in my office prior to advertising for bids will be waived in this case, and our review will be made during the bidding period. Such changes as are found to be necessary as the result of this review will be accomplished subsequent to the receipt of bids.

Maj. Gen. Lewis A. Pick, division engineer, Missouri River Division, Omaha, Nebr., informs me that a survey of prospective bidders indicates that not less than a 40-day bidding period will be required if reasonable bids are to be expected. This confirms my experience, as the average time required to advertise and receive bids on the 25 veterans hospitals awarded to date has been very close to 60 days.

If a satisfactory bid is received, I will request the Veterans' Administration to authorize the required funds immediately after the bids are opened, and the contract will be awarded as soon as the funds are authorized.

I assure you I will make every effort to complete the design by July 23, reproduce plans and advertise for bids by July 30, receive bids September 8, and award contracts by September 10.

I sincerely hope the above schedule meets with your approval and that you agree that no further shortening of the time periods is feasible or in the best interest of the Government. Your continued active interest in the Veterans' Administration hospital program is appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

R. C. CRAWFORD,
Major General,
Acting Chief of Engineers.

The International Wheat Agreement and the CCC

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT L. REEVES, JR.
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. REEVES. Mr. Speaker, Mr. S. C. Masters, one of my constituents, has written me an excellent and forceful letter on the subject of the proposed international wheat agreement and the proposed permanent charter for the Commodity Credit Corporation. Under leave previously granted, I am including as a part of these remarks the text of his letter. It is as follows:

MASTERS-KELLEY GRAIN CO.,
Kansas City, Mo., May 15, 1948.

Hon. ALBERT L. REEVES,
House of Representatives
Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. REEVES: The Associated Press this morning quotes Mr. Norris E. Dodd as making the following statement in his testimony yesterday before the Senate Foreign Relations Subcommittee: "Neither national agriculture relief measures nor bilateral trade agreements have proved effective toward world wheat price stability at levels reasonable to both the producer and consumer and in preventing the piling up of wheat stocks in exporting countries." Mr. Dodd makes this confession in urging ratification of the international wheat agreement. If you have followed his testimony, you will find that after admitting a failure of the national farm program on a national scale we would attempt to broaden the failure by making it international.

We have been examining the records, and find that since the national farm program was fostered and became a law in 1933, with the admitted attempt on the part of then Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace to socialize farming as a way of life, that there has been a continuous tinkering with agriculture prices and markets for the avowed purpose of securing prices equal to parity for farmers. After studying the socialistic intents of the national farm program, that purpose can certainly be questioned and appears to be entirely conducted for the purpose of social reform.

In any event, from 1933 until 1945 the price of wheat never touched parity except for a brief period of a few months in 1936. At the beginning of the program in 1933 all farm products averaged 59 percent of parity, and at the end of the prewar period in 1939 they were up to 72 percent of parity. In the meantime, wheat, which was one of the commodities most actively supported, averaged 55 percent of parity in 1933 and was only 57 percent at the end of 1939. Cotton was almost exactly the same, and corn, which experienced two droughts during the period, was only slightly better. However, the important thing is that wheat was 16 percent below the general average of all farm prices, and corn was 16 percent below the average of all farm prices at the end of 1939, while other commodities that were left alone fared far better. We believe you will find the records show that it was postwar inflation that finally returned better than parity for farmers for their grain and that the operations of the Commodity Credit Corporation have not only cost many millions of dollars in tax funds but have denied producers many millions more because their operations were actually price depressing instead of price supporting in their effects. The Congress has under consideration a permanent charter for the Commodity Credit Corporation and the Senate has under consideration ratification and of the international wheat agreement. I believe that both are socialistic and un-American to the extreme and feel that an examination of the facts would convince you that they are definitely contrary to the best interest of either producers or consumers. Therefore, I urge your most active opposition to these two bills.

Yours respectfully,

S. C. MASTERS.

The March of Militarism

OF
HON. MERLIN HULL
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 17, 1948

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, the presentation of this draft bill is the culmination of months of intensive promotion and propaganda by the Defense Department aided and abetted by General Marshall as Secretary of State. Backed by the special interests which seek this force measure upon our country, it has gathered momentum as those in high position have long demanded a huge Military and Naval Establishment to back their program and their operations at home and abroad. The same agencies of publicity have been subsidized handsomely from our Federal Treasury in the promotion of the Marshall plan for $17,000,000,000 in grants and gifts to foreign nations at the expense of our own people. Added to such propaganda has been the force of war scares and allegations of a crisis in world affairs threatening our national existence.

It is intended to fasten upon our country the same system of militarism which has brought ruin and disaster to so many countries of Europe and Asia. It is a system out of which wars have come and more will come.

Our Navy and our Air Force are able to maintain their forces by the traditional method of volunteer enlistments. It is only the Army which has manipulated its regulations to restrict enlistments which presses the demand for compulsory military training. The more men there are in the ranks the more the generals will augment their own numbers and their power.

No investigation has been made as to any crisis alleged to be imminent. Only a few months ago the generals were among those who advocated the Marshall plan as the guaranty of peace in Europe and a certain way of stopping the march of communism in the western European nations. Scarcely had Congress accepted their theory and their program than came the demand for "military might" to back up the expenditures.

Nor will the draft, with all its power and force, be sufficient to them. New and further demands will be forthcoming as each staged crisis is played up as a new danger to our liberties. Promising peace and at the same time promoting wars to destroy all peace is not consistent.

For years the brass hats have sought in every possible manner to obtain compulsory military training in peacetime. The plan often has been changed as our people and their Congress refused universal military training. Then came the peacetime draft proposal to keep our armed forces up to the mark which the saber-rattling generals demand.

Every amendment offered to this bill and adopted by the House will be swept aside by the military crowd which seems to dominate the situation. The bill will eventually pass and in the form the military manipulators demand. Let nobody be fooled that the draft is necessary for our safety or that it will end the increasing powers of the schemers who preach patriotism for their own professional glory.

This measure will set up anew the draft boards and the entire system of enforcement which was necessary for the war. It will require the registration of all young men between 19 and 31 years from which will be drawn inductees for the Army as the Federal agencies demand. There will be exemptions, but 400,000 or more young men just starting out in life will not be exempt. They will serve the full terms the generals demand. The medical profession will be drawn upon for inductees as will the other professions which serve the health of our people. Every community and many millions of families will be drawn upon to gratify the insatiate demands of the military masters.

I am opposed to this measure. I shall vote against it. I am firm in my opinion that in opposing it I am reflecting the sentiment of 90 percent of the people of the district I represent and probably even a larger percentage. Our people are tired of war. They want peace and prosperity. They have seen the spread of militarism in other countries and the terrible consequences of it. They want none of it here.

The Rider Racket

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington News of Thursday, June 17, 1948:

STOP THIS RIDER RACKET

President Truman was on solid ground when he vetoed the $975,914,700 appropriations bill for the Federal Security Agency because it carried a rider transferring the United States Employment Service from the Labor Department to the FSA. It is too bad his veto was overridden.

Without arguing the merits or demerits of the Agency's transfer, we contend legislation such as this should be required to stand on its own feet. It should not be tacked onto an appropriation bill.

An appropriations bill should be only that—a measure making certain funds available for some governmental purpose.

The use of legislative riders has reached a new peak of absurdity in this Congress.

That odd product of North Dakota, Senator LANGER, tried to tie the civil rights bill to the measure repealing taxes on margarine. The subjects, of course, had nothing in common.

The Interior Department appropriations bill as it passed the House carried five pages of riders, some of which amended laws in effect since 1902. All of these were eliminated in the Senate except the most objectionable one. This was an amendment, sponsored by Senator SHERIDAN DOWNEY, Democrat, of California, designed to oust two Government officials, Michael Straus, Federal Reclamation Commissioner, and Richard Boke, a regional director of the Reclamation Bureau.

It provided that the commissioner, assistant commissioner, and regional directors must be engineers, with at least 5 years of engineering experience. This was an irrelevant requirement introduced to punish the two officials because they had applied acreage-limitation provisions of the reclamation law to California's Central Valley.

This unfair measure, too, is a fit subject for a Presidential veto. But more than the possibility of a President's veto, which may not be sustained, is needed to protect the public from the rider racket.

Congressional procedure should be revised so as to limit each piece of legislation to one subject and to prohibit legislation of any kind in an appropriations bill. Without these safeguards, it has been demonstrated that a single Member of Congress can attach vital legislation to a pending measure in the closing days of a session simply by threatening to filibuster against all other bills on the calendar until his individual demands are satisfied. That isn't majority rule. It is one-man government, of a most dangerous and irresponsible kind.

Work of the Eightieth Congress

OF
HON. A. L. MILLER
OF NEBRASKA
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, at the end of each session of Congress it has been my custom to make a report, through you, to the people of my district on its accomplishments. While the Chief Executive has severely criticized this Congress because it has not carried out his recommendations for the reenactment of all wartime controls over our economy, I personally feel that under your leadership we have made great progress in solving the problems that confront the country. President Truman has vetoed 140 bills to date and promises more vetoes. This is a record. Some of the legislation had to be passed over the veto of the President. There really has been very poor cooperation with Congress, by the administration. Its long term of power has made it deaf to the will of the people as expressed by their elected representatives in the Congress. It occurs to me, Mr. Speaker, that no administration can stay in power for 16 years without developing the feeling that its judgments are wiser than those of the people. This attitude results in corruption and bad government. While I personally believe the next administration will be Republican, I do not want it to stay in power for such a long time. I fervently hope that the States will ratify the action of this Congress to set a limit of two terms for any man to serve as President for I feel that the most of our troubles today stem from the breaking of that precedent.

GOVERNMENT EXPENSE

I have been greatly discouraged by the fact that we have not been able to cut Federal Government spending and reduce the number on the Federal pay roll to what they should be in time of peace. In the fiscal year 1933, the last before the New Deal, there were 572,091 persons on the Federal pay roll and the total appropriations for that year were $4,325,140,000. By 1940 the number of Federal employees had risen to 1,014,117, and Federal appropriations had reached to $9,127,374,000. At the present time there are well over 2,000,000 on the pay roll Appropriations for the fiscal year 1948 made by the first session of the Eightieth Congress were $35,000,000,000. The public debt on March 4, 1933, when the New Deal took over was $20,900,000,000. On December 7, 1941, it had reached to $55,200,000,000. Today our debt is approximately $252,000,000,000. The administration is today adding 500 new employees per day to the pay roll. The difficulty that Congress has had to face in trying to cut Federal spending is caused by the administration sending up demands for new expenditures which are so vague it is impossible for experts to determine whether or not they are needed. In spite of this, however, the first session cut appropriations for the fiscal year 1948 about $5,000,000,000 under the President's budget estimates. The saving will not be as great this year because of the war scare that has been engendered by the administration to justify greatly increased demands for appropriations. This much can be said: The Eightieth Congress has arrested and reversed the trend that was destroying the system of government that has made our country the richest Nation of all times. The trend is for less spending, less debt, and less taxes. The budget has been balanced, the first time in 16 years. We have made a good beginning but there is much more to be done. Certainly we cannot do much more until we are rid of the administration whose policy is to spend and spend, tax and tax, elect and elect.

HIGH COST OF LIVING

Living costs have continued to rise even though the removal of Government controls has resulted in a great increase in the production of goods. I am convinced that the chief cause of this increase is the huge amount of goods we have exported to foreign countries through our various relief programs. I realize that we need some export trade but for the past 6 years it has been entirely out of balance. Inflation is nothing more than having more money than goods. The way to cure it is to have more goods than money. This cannot be done if we continue to ship out of this country the goods manufactured by our labor and industry and not keep enough to meet our own needs. The President has asked for power to put rationing and price control in force. I cannot support this program. It slows production, creates black markets, and means complete regimentation. It just will not work.

FOREIGN AID

Mr. Speaker, I have supported appropriations to feed the hungry and to send them the necessary clothing and medicine. I have not been happy about the Marshall plan. I am sure that this country cannot continue to squander its resources without a fair return and at the same time remain economically strong. We will profit nothing if we waste all of our resources and bring ourselves down to the level of European and Asiatic countries. Now that the plan has been approved by the Congress I feel that it should keep a constant check on the expenditures of funds to diminish the chances of waste that has characterized all other foreign-aid programs. It must be watched, otherwise the plan will become a world-wide WPA program.

UNITED NATIONS

I have always been in favor of the United Nations. I am disappointed that the principle of the unlimited veto was adopted at San Francisco and that it has been used so often by Russia. I have always felt that the United Nations should have a military force to back up its decisions. As it is now constituted it is nothing more than a debating society. Very little has been accomplished. The division of Germany into four sectors was a grave mistake. The Palestine issue has been badly handled and I hope that the present armistice will prove to be permanent. If the nations of the world are ever to get back to a permanent and a just peace they must adopt the fundamentals of Christianity which inevitably lead to peace.

DEVELOPMENT OF OUR NATURAL RESOURCES

In his recent swing through Nebraska the President took occasion to charge that Congress had not supported his recommendations for the development of our natural resources. The record of the Eightieth Congress belies this charge. It has made more liberal appropriations for public power, rural electrification, irrigation and flood control than has any previous Congress. It has not followed his recommendations for a Missouri Valley Authority or some of his extravagant, unsound requests.

Large appropriations have been made to carry out plans for flood control, power development, and irrigation under the Pick-Sloan plan for development of the great Missouri Valley. This is a sound, constructive approach. Before I came to Congress very little had been done to make surveys in central and western Nebraska provided for in this plan. I am glad to know that surveys are now being made in the Platte, Loup, and Niobrara Valleys so that work can be pushed ahead. Money for high-power lines from Gering through Bridgeport, Sidney, North Platte to Sterling, Colo., and from Bridgeport through Alliance and Chadron, Nebr., and from O'Neill, Nebr., to Fort Randall, S. Dak., has been provided. The Eightieth Congress has appropriated more money for the expansion of the REA program than has any four previous Congresses. The money appropriated for the development of our natural resources cannot be considered as an ordinary expenditure. Much of it will be used for REA loans which are repaid with principle and interest. All of it will produce national wealth which will increase the income of the Government.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

The passage of the Taft-Hartley law in the first session of the Eightieth Congress has, contrary to predictions of its opponents, reduced work stoppages in industry due to strikes with its resultant loss of production and the wages of workmen. It has encouraged the settlement of controversies by negotiations to the benefit of workers, management, and the public. While experience with the operation of the law may indicate the necessity for amendments I am convinced that the great majority of workers approve of the law.

FEDERAL ACTIVITIES CURBED

This Congress has refused to carry out the administration's socialistic proposals and demands for interference with private enterprise. It has refused to permit the wasting of more money in large-scale public housing while it has continued the policy of mortgage insurance to encourage building by private industry. This policy has produced the largest home-building program in the history of our country.

Congress has resisted the heavy propaganda barrage aimed at forcing it to enact a so-called national-health program which is just another name for socialized medicine.

INCOME-TAX REDUCTION

The Congress passed, over the President's veto, a bill to reduce income taxes. This has brought most welcome relief to the people. It has freed 7,400,000 people for paying any income tax at all. It provided special relief also for the blind and aged. Seventy-one percent of its benefits have gone to taxpayers with incomes of less than $5,000. It further provides the incentive for men and capital to work together for needed industrial expansion, greater production, and more jobs for people.

MORE BENEFICIAL LEGISLATION

The Eightieth Congress has passed much other important legislation. It created a joint commission to study the reorganization of the executive branch of the Government to see where we can cut back the regular expenditures of Government. It will recommend what functions should be returned to the States and local governments, or to the people themselves. It will recommend plans for eliminating overlapping and duplication in Federal functions and for cutting out those that are unnecessary. This reorganization of Government will be the big task for the next Congress. I really believe that with a change of administration the now 1,200 Government agencies can be cut in half with a great saving to the taxpayer.

It has been generous in its treatment of our war veterans and has increased social-security benefits for more than 3,000,000 needy children, the aged, and the blind. It has established a National Heart Institute for research on diseases of the heart and circulatory system. It has been more than generous with measures to provide for an adequate national defense. While the job is not finished, this Congress has taken measures to root out of our Government service the Communists and fellow-travelers who have worked their way into it.

RETURN TO MY DISTRICT

Mr. Speaker, as is always the case the Eightieth Congress has had to adjourn leaving much unfinished work. Some of the action taken in haste in the closing week does not meet with my approval. I expect to go back home this summer and visit in every one of the 38 counties in my district. I like to meet and talk with the people. I get new ideas and a fresh viewpoint. It renews my faith in the common sense and good judgment of the people of Nebraska. It has been impossible for me to discuss all the legislation that has come before us. Most of it will be of interest to some individuals and groups. I will be glad to answer their questions for they have a right to know how their Representative voted on them. They then will be the judge as to whether or not they want me to come back here to represent them in the Eighty-first Congress. If they send me back I will continue to follow the pattern I have laid down to guide my action in the three Congresses I have served them. The RECORD will show that I am among the upper 5 percent of those who answer all roll calls. I have studied the legislation, listened to the debate and then voted the way I felt would be for the best interests of all the people. I may have made some mistakes but if so they have been of the head and not of the heart.

I have great hopes that our country will continue to be a strong Nation. We have the resources, the factories, the man-power and the know-how. There is no reason why we cannot get our economic machine in balance. Our people should go on to a happy and contended life. We should be able to build a peaceful world for the enjoyment of ourselves and our children.

Government in the Wheat Market

OF

HON. ALBERT L. REEVES, JR.

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. REEVES. Mr. Speaker, is the Government really buying wheat for export or for the purpose of holding prices up or forcing prices up? Mr. Harold A. Merrill, one of my constituents, has posed this question in a letter which I include as a portion of these remarks. It is as follows:

KANSAS CITY, MO., May 26, 1948.

Representative ALBERT L. REEVES, Jr.,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE REEVES: I enclose a market letter received from Harris, Upham & Co. this morning. The contents of this should be valuable information for you as it brings out the question mark in the trade's mind as to why the Government continues to buy grain. You will note that this letter states this continued buying suggests either an effort to bolster prices or a further raise in the export quota, stating further that the latter seems unnecessary in view of the excellent new crop prospects abroad.

Last week Broomhall News, of Liverpool, England, stated that the crops of France, Italy, and even Germany would be about normal, which would eliminate the necessity of any quantity of imports. The present administration keeps talking about being against inflation but all their actions indicate otherwise. The loan put on different farm crops is ridiculously high. The percentage basis of the loan is a wartime basis and was instituted as a wartime measure to increase production. Since the war is over it is high time that the loan level be reduced to a more sane basis, otherwise grain prices will be held high which will cause big production throughout the world and eventually a debacle.

Congress certainly should look into the Government grain buying program at this time and see that it does not buy to hold prices up or force prices up. The people abroad will take whatever we give them on a gratis basis just as long as we give it to them, but with their crops back to normal we should be able to stop this at once and let prices in this country go down so that living costs go down which is what we need above everything else at this time. The continued spiral of increased wages on account of increased living costs must be stopped, and now is the time to stop it by stopping the Government buying of foodstuffs as this is not necessary because of the normal crops abroad. For your information, a cable was received from Italy today by one of the members here stating that barley harvest was starting there. This means that wheat harvest is only a few weeks away in that country, which means that the other European countries will be harvesting their crops in a few weeks, which should eliminate any necessity of further grain shipments from this country. I am a raiser of both grain and cattle but I am not in favor of the present high prices as I believe in the long run they will prove detrimertal to we producers.

Therefore, will appreciate it if you will continue your efforts to control this Government food buying program and hold it down to the absolute minimum amount.

Yours very truly,

HAROLD A. MERRILL.

Mr. Speaker, is it not time that we restrict Government wheat purchases in view of the fact that grain crops are virtually normal in the countries to which we are about to export our own wheat? I also include in these remarks excerpts from market letters furnished by Mr. Merrill which emphasize the excellent crop prospects abroad:

MAY 25, 1948.

The Government continues to take sizable quantities, apparently greatly in excess of its announced export goal of 402,000,000 bushels. Last week CCC bought 8,499,295 bushels of wheat and 504,753 bushels of flour in wheat equivalent, and this continued buying suggests either an effort to bolster prices or a further raise in the export quota. The latter seems unnecessary in view of the excellent new crop prospects abroad. Yet the authorizations for the first quarter operations of ECA demonstrate the emphasis being placed on foodstuffs. Washington advices indicate that the estimates of European requirements of other goods under ECA have been heavily overstated by the State Department and that American shipments abroad under ECA will fall way below the appropriations allotted for the first quarter of operations.

JUNE 14, 1948.

The executive assistant to the Secretary of Agriculture, Nathan Koenig, in an address in New Jersey, said that western Europe's crop prospects have improved to a point where United States shipments of grain, beginning July 1, will probably be reduced about 20 percent below those of last year and that shipments of fats and oils may also be cut. He called attention to the survey made by the Department of Agriculture that shows that broad grain production in ERP countries is expected to be less than 2 percent below prewar. While coarse grain production is expected to run 3 percent above the prewar level.

JUNE 15, 1948.

The wheat that is being sold is going largely to the Government which last week purchased 11,642,368 bushels of wheat and 1,777,090 bushels of flour in wheat equivalent, a total of close to 13,500,000 bushels. Much of the wheat being harvested in Oklahoma is moving toward the gulf rather than to Kansas City, its normal outlet, because of the attractive prices being paid by CCC for wheat in that position.

JUNE 16, 1948.

The CCC advanced their buying price to 2.29½ for Chicago July, up 2½ cents from yesterday, but the basis for June and July 15 delivery at the Gulf and 17 cents over the June delivery at Philadelphia was unchanged. Considerable attention was paid to a statement by the Secretary of Agriculture, admitting that Government purchases would probably tend to advance food prices in this country. The necessity of such buying is questioned by trade interests and many Members of Congress and this doubt will be intensified by a report current near the close that France had failed to accept offerings of flour from this country on the ground that they had enough wheat of their own to supply them.

Political Side-stepping

OF

OF WISCONSIN

Wednesday, June 16, 1948

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, after 18 months of the present Congress, the Committee on Ways and Means has reported a bill to add 3,500,000 people to the rolls of social security. Whatever may be its merits and its shortcomings, neither will be dwelt upon at any length in the closing hours of Congress. It will not pass both Houses of Congress. No opportunity will be offered for change or amendment. It will be whisked to the Senate where it will be quietly pigeonholed and the measure will cease to be. Nobody will be added to the rolls of social security. Nobody will be benefited by the committee's action. Like many other important problems awaiting consideration it will end as unfinished business.

There is no reasonable excuse for the failure of Congress to take up and solve the question of assistance for the aged, the blind, and orphaned children. For more than a dozen years honest and earnest men have urged congressional action only to be denied the privilege of a hearing at which they and their constituents might appear and exercise their rights to present their views before the committees. The Townsend organizations, representing millions of good old people, have sought for more than a dozen years to have Congress consider their plan and vote upon it, without success. The thousands of lobbyists which appear before committees of every Congress are heard, no matter what special interests they represent. Only the old folks who have helped make our country great, whose lives have been spent in aiding its progress and development, are thus discriminated against. Now another Congress is about to end, and with the same record for disappointment to the aged.

In their endeavors to obtain recognition in advancing the just demands of the older folks, 174 Members of the House have signed a discharge petition to bring the Townsend bill to the floor, and thus open up for discussion all the measures now pending before the committee. Under the rules of the House, 218 signatures are necessary to complete the petition.

But the fault lies not in the earnest endeavors of the 174 representatives who have labored so consistently to bring about the desired results. It lies with those in power who refused consideration and the many more who refused to sign the petition from lack of interest in the problem.

The fight will go on. The cause of the aged and the blind is just. It must eventually win not only the recognition of Congress but the passage of legislation which will bring relief.

The cause not only concerns those drawing the meager and insufficient allowances now provided by the Federal, State, and county governments. State and county resources are proving insufficient to meet the increasing demands for relief. A Federal law providing real relief is necessary.

Our Federal Government has given away $20,000,000,000 for postwar relief to European and other foreign countries. Congress has authorized the expenditure of $17,000,000,000 more. For the next fiscal year our defense program will cost another $20,000,000,000. With all such enormous allowances of funds of our taxpayers, Congress fails to even consider what should be a fair support allowance for its own aged people.

It is high time that Congress turned its attention to the problems of our people and to stop squandering billions abroad, including many millions to kings and their corrupt courts and agencies.

Hon. George A. Dondero

OF

HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to pay my respects to the distinguished chairman of the Public Works Committee, the Honorable GEORGE A. DONDERO, of Michigan, under whom it is my privilege to serve as a member of that committee as well as chairman of the Subcommittee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

In this period of recognized need for improvements in the various phases of our Federal works program, and with the realization that construction costs are nearly prohibitive, I fully realize the tremendous pressure that has been placed on the chairman of our committee. Congressman DONDERO'S record will justify the statement that he is one who believes in economy and yet one who recognizes the needs in the various areas of our country. Even in these trying times, he has been most courteous and considerate, not only to witnesses before the committee for and against legislation, but has always recognized the rights of the individual members and has always favored us with the opportunity to express ourselves whether in accord or in discord with his own views as chairman.

Congressman DONDERO'S record, as chairman of the Public Works Committee, in this first Congress under our reorganization plan, will be considered outstanding even in years to come.

Report on the Eightieth Congress

OF

HON. A. L. MILLER

OF NEBRASKA

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, it has been my practice in the closing days of a session to report to the people of my district the things the Congress has accomplished and the position I have taken on the issues that have come before it. The Fourth District of Nebraska is primarily agricultural and is naturally concerned with the things Congress has done to encourage and make possible a healthy agricultural economy. This interest is not wholly selfish since no country has ever prospered when its agriclutural economy is depressed. A prosperous agriculture brings prosperity to every phase of a nation's economy. Recognizing this fact the Republican majority in the Eightieth Congress has promoted a strong program for the development of our great agricultural resources. Needless to say, I have aggressively supported this sound program.

CONSERVATION

Our basic resource is the soil. Before the war erosion was making heavy inroads on our soil and during the war we further seriously depleted our agricultural lands in attempting to feed the peoples of the world. The need to repair the damage is obvious and Congress has met this need by appropriating increasing amounts to furnish technical aids and payment for sound soil-saving practices. It seems to me that the future of our country depends upon how we conserve and utilize our soil and we must of necessity produce more and more to feed our increasing population. To do this we must have a program to conserve, preserve, improve, and properly use our land, water, and other resources. This will bring added wealth to our country.

To maintain our standard of living and meet the demands of the increasing population we must bring into cultivation our arid lands through irrigation and reclamation. The Congress must be liberal in providing funds for expanding this program. The people of Nebraska have been particularly cheered by the support Congress has given the coordinated plan for the development of the great Missouri Valley known as the Pick-Sloan plan. While we in this valley will derive great benefits the whole country will profit from this development.

Mr. Speaker, I was born on a farm homestead in Nebraska and lived all of my early life there. My father, at 85, still lives on this farm. I can tell you with some degree of understanding that the farmers of this country are the real backbone of our economy. Farm economy must be kept healthy or the rest of the country will be sick. Farmers do need good roads, development of REA, soil conservation, and a price for the things they produce which reflects fairness in comparison with the things they must buy. It is to be noted that manu-

RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

Mr. Speaker, I am indeed pleased that this Eightieth Congress has seen fit to give liberal support to our REA program. This Congress has appropriated $800,000,000 for REA. This is 42 percent of all the funds voted in the 15 years of its history. No previous Congress has voted as much. I am pleased to state that the record of repayment of loans to the REA districts is impressive. It must be remembered that this money is being repaid in principal and interest. It is so different from the moneys we spend in the far corners of the world. Development of REA and our resources adds great wealth to the whole country. There has been some lack of generating facilities and inability to get material, which has held up some of the REA and flood-control programs. I believe this condition is now changing and this fine development can go forward. The initial appropriations were made in the Eightieth Congress for a high-power line from the Kortes Dam in Wyoming, to Gering, Bridgeport, Sidney, Alliance, and North Platte, Nebr. This continues on to Sterling, Colo., and will connect up with the Big Thompson project in Colorado. Appropriations are also included to begin work on the line from O'Neill, Nebr., to the Fort Randall Dam in South Dakota. The appropriations carry money for the needed substations to distribute this electric energy throughout Nebraska. It is interesting to note that 16 of the 22 REA districts in Nebraska serve as a whole or in part residents of the Fourth Nebraska District.

FARM PRICE SUPPORTS

The program for supporting the price of leading agricultural products on a 90-percent of parity basis has been extended for another 2 years. I introduced a bill for this purpose early in the session. While some consumer groups may complain that this program adds to the cost of living let me point out the great spread between the price the producer gets for what he raises and the price the consumer pays. I am convinced that this spread is excessive and have constantly urged a complete investigation of this situation. The farmer needs a parity price which will include labor and all production costs.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE

An ominous threat has been hanging over this country—a catastrophe that might easily wipe out our meat supply. I refer to the dread foot-and-mouth disease that has rapidly spread through cattle herds in central Mexico and was threatening to spread to the great herds in northern Mexico. If I had it would be almost impossible to keep it from infecting the herds in our own country. Fortunately, the present epidemic seems to have reached its peak and, with the aid this Congress has provided, seems to be receding. Although the danger seems to be passing right now we can expect another outbreak unless other means are found to combat it. You, as Speaker of the House, made it possible for me to make two trips to Mexico to inspect this disease in that country. I have from time to time made suggestions to this Congress about what should be done to keep foot-and-mouth disease out of this country. I am happy to have had a small part in getting a laboratory established which will engage in research on this problem. I am convinced that the scientists can discover a vaccine which will not only cure but prevent the disease. It is interesting to note, Mr. Speaker, that the Fourth Nebraska District has the largest livestock population of any district in the United States. It behooves this Congress to work in close harmony with the cattle industry and to do everything possible to wipe this disease from our continent.

RECIPROCAL TRADE

Another issue coming before the Congress with far-reaching implications for agriculture is the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. Under the Roosevelt and Truman administrations, a large percentage of the items on which tariffs were reduced were agricultural products that furnish direct competition to our own. For that reason I supported the bill to extend the act for 1 year with the provision for transferring the authority to study and report the effect of the proposed changes from a committee within the Department of State to the United States Tariff Commission. I realize, Mr. Speaker, that we must have some trade, but this should not be a one-way street with the farm products of the Nation taking the brunt in all the tariff reductions. Other countries can produce food much cheaper than we can. The farmer needs protection just as much as the big industries need protection.

EUROPEAN RECOVERY PLAN

On the urgent insistence of the Truman administration the Eightieth Congress passed the so-called European recovery program which practically obligates this country to spend $17,000,000,000 of the taxpayers' money over a period of 4 years for the aid of 16 European nations. While, as a result of the propaganda methods used to sell the idea to the American people, it would have been much easier to support this legislation, I opposed and voted against it as did all members of the Nebraska delegation in Congress. My principal reason for doing so was the fact that with the help we had previously given them and through their own effort these nations have achieved more than 90 percent recovery of their national economy as of the year 1938. Most of the money to be immediately provided by us would be used by these nations to bolster their socialist experiments. Later, the money would be used to reestablish their armed strength. It seems to me to be wholly reprehensible to take in taxes from the people of this country the money they have earned under our system of individual enterprise to support a system in direct contrast to our own and if it achieves recovery, is bound to compete with us in foreign markets through Government-owned cartels.

The items to be procured from this country are already in short supply and will inevitably raise prices to our consumers and make it more difficult to get the things they need. I have supported aid in the form of food, clothing, and medicine to the needy in Europe.

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that you cannot buy friendship with money. When this program stops, these countries may well hate us for upsetting their own economy. I have been long concerned about this country bleeding itself white. We must remain strong at home if we are to meet our own needs and part of those of the world. We cannot continue to waste the resources of our own country all over the world, without the promise of a fair return. It just is not fair to the citizens of our own country to send so much material to Europe when those same materials are in short supply at home.

LABOR LAWS

Mr. Speaker, I supported the passage of the Taft-Hartley law. I did believe there was a great need for a balancing of power between industry and the powerful labor leaders who held the workingman in their grasp. The law has been in operation for some time. The grave predictions of the labor czars have not come true. The laboring man is given more freedom than he ever had before. The law brings about equality and best of all it does help to protect the public. I am sure the great majority of workers approve the law.

RETURN TO MY DISTRICT

Mr. Speaker, as is always the case the Eightieth Congress has had to adjourn leaving much unfinished work. Some of the action taken in haste in the closing week does not meet with my approval. I expect to go back home this summer and visit in every one of the 38 counties in my district. I like to meet and talk with the people. I get new ideas and a fresh viewpoint. It renews my faith in the common sense and good judgment of the people of Nebraska. It has been impossible for me to discuss all the legislation that has come before us. Most of it will be of interest to some individuals and groups. I will be glad to answer their questions for they have a right to know how their representative voted on them. Then they will be the judge as to whether or not they want me to come back here to represent them in the Eighty-first Congress. If they send me back I will continue to follow the pattern I have laid down to guide my action in the three Congresses I have served them. The record will show that I am among the upper 5 percent of those who answer all roll calls. I have studied the legislation, listened to the debate and then voted the way I felt would be for the best interests of all the people. I may have made some mistakes but if so they have been of the head and not of the heart.

I have great hopes that our country will continue to be a strong Nation. We have the resources, the factories, the manpower, and the know-how. There is no reason why we cannot get our economic machine in balance. Our people should go on to a happy and contented life. We should be able to build a peaceful world for the enjoyment of ourselves and our children.

Enrollment at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis

OF

HON. ALBERT L. REEVES, JR.

OF MISSOURI

Friday, June 18 (legislative day of Thursday, June 17), 1948

Mr. REEVES. Mr. Speaker, not long ago my attention was called to an editorial entitled "A Challenge to Service Schools," which summarized the criticisms directed at the United States Military and Naval Academies because of their short enrollments and unfilled vacancies. Under existing procedure, in a large measure the fact that there are unfilled vacancies in classes at the Academies may very well be the responsibility of Congress itself. The editorial in question was inspired by an article appearing in the October 1947 issue of the Atlantic Monthly, written by a midshipman at the Naval Academy who had resigned in dissatisfaction.

I sent a copy of the editorial to the Honorable John L. Sullivan, Secretary of the Navy, requesting his comments. His replies, and that of Admiral Holloway, Superintendent of the Academy, so completely disposed of the criticisms which had been expressed that I am including both letters as a portion of these remarks. The letters are as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, December 9, 1947.

Hon. ALBERT L. REEVES, Jr.
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. REEVES: The following will amplify my previous acknowledgment of your letter of October 6, 1947.

Recent publicity in regard to the Naval Academy which resulted from the article in the October issue of the Atlantic Monthly has received the thoughtful consideration of the Navy Department. Your letter expressing concern over this matter evidences sincere interest in the Navy and is much appreciated.

The number of midshipmen at the Naval Academy authorized by law is 4,382 (excluding 20 authorized from the American Republics). However due to attrition and other causes, it would be impossible ever to attain the above number. The present enrollment of 2,865 is close to the maximum overload capacity of the Naval Academy. The normal capacity is 2,500, which has been increased by putting three bunks in double rooms; the maximum that can be accommodated by such doubling up is approximately 3,100. The conditions for study under these circumstances are not as good as are considered desirable. In view of the existing deficiencies in capacity and an expected enrollment of 3,500 midshipmen by 1950, the Superintendent of the Naval Academy has submitted plans to remedy the situation, which will be submitted to the Congress. These plans are now under study in the office of the Chief of Naval Operations.

When the existing deficiencies have been liquidated, it will be possible to increase the number of midshipmen without undue crowding. It is believed that existing legislation covering the presently authorized number of appointments is sufficient for the foreseeable future. Therefore, the Navy Department does not plan at this time to submit recommendations to the Congress for legislation to increase the number of appointments.

Adverse publicity concerning the Naval Academy has been aimed at hazing, the curriculum, the instructional staff, and regulations and traditions.

Neither the Navy Department nor the Naval Academy approves the practice of hazing. From time to time midshipmen have been dismissed from the Academy for the commission of this offense. Upon becoming the Superintendent of the Naval Academy in January 1947, Rear Adm. James L. Holloway, United States Navy, took positive steps to eliminate the hazing. In connection with the Atlantic article, Admiral Holloway said on October 23, 1947, "I will state categorically that the practice of hazing is nonexistent at the Naval Academy now. It is contrary to every principle and policy associated with my administration of the Naval Academy. This policy has the full support of the officers and instructors on duty here and the positive and dynamic support of the first, or senior class, at the Naval Academy." Further, the basic principles of the senior class policy reiterates this statement: "We, the members of the class of 1948-B intend to develop discipline based upon mutual respect. * * * We hold that instruction by example is vital to the organization and the administration of any military unit."

The curriculum of the Naval Academy has been revised and these revisions were put into effect at the beginning of the 1947 academic year. This curriculum is designed to give a broad general education strongly pointed to naval life. It hews closely to the fundamentals of the humanities, the sciences, and a basic knowledge of the naval profession. This curriculum represents the concerted efforts of well-qualified naval and civilian educators. Dr. A. John Bartky, the dean of education of Stanford University, a man well known and highly respected in the educational field, has said of the Naval Academy's new course of study, "It would be exceedingly difficult to develop a curriculum that would satisfy all midshipmen's and the Navy's needs any better than the 1947 Naval Academy curriculum does."

The faculty at the Naval Academy is composed of 40 percent civilians and 60 percent naval officers. This percentage compares favorably with that of the ratio of cultural instructors to technical instructors in the best professional schools of America. The Board of Visitors (1947) noted with approval the strengthening of the teaching force at the Naval Academy by the addition of well-qualified civilian instructors and by the careful selection by the Bureau of Naval Personnel of commissioned officers as teachers. Every effort is being made by the Navy Department and by the Superintendent of the Naval Academy to insure that the best educational methods are used at the Academy. The Naval Academy is kept abreast of modern educational techniques in two ways: First, by bringing outstanding educators to Annapolis for observation of the instructional methods in use and for conferences and critiques thereof, and secondly, by the assignment to the Naval Academy of certain naval officers who have had postgraduate instruction at civilian educational institutions.

The paramount aim of civilian schools and colleges is education for democracy. Thus, democratic practices are evidenced on every hand in school systems. A military organization in a democratic state zealously guards the integrity of the individual and the sacredness of personality, but it must nonetheless continue to be a military organization. Strategy is formulated at the highest level, rather than by the majority, and tactics are executed by those who may not know why the move is being made but who have implicit confidence in and respect for their leaders. Criticism of the Naval Academy as the citadel of a tyrannical set of traditions and needlessly irksome regulations stems from failure to understand this fundamental difference between civilian and military schools. The mission of the service academies differs from that of civilian schools, and practices must be consistent with the mission. Without violation of personality, the midshipman is subjected to strict discipline in which implicit obedience is the order of the day. He is deliberately plunged into a highly military pattern of living with all the traditions and customs that go with it.

Dr. Bartky discusses the relationships of a military organization to a democracy in the following words: "We insist that the primary objective for all education shall be that of preparing the individual to live in our democratic society. Leaders of a military society must be as thoroughly familiar with the peculiarities of that society as leaders in a democracy. There is only one way to learn about a cultural pattern, and that is to live it. Hence, it becomes the obligation of institutions, that prepare military leaders, to provide every opportunity to them to live a military life.

"This does not mean that the faculty at Annapolis avoid any reference to democratic ideals and procedures. It is recognized that all naval officers are American citizens, and as such have responsibilities that transcend their military obligations. An examination of the curriculum will reveal that the Academy offers many experiences that parallel those included in citizenship training for civilian schools."

Tables 1 and 2, attached as an enclosure, show by percentages of the student body the voluntary resignations of midshipmen in the years preceding, during, and immediately following the two World Wars. Although there has been a sharp rise in the number of resignations following both wars, it is noted that the percentages following the recent war are considerably less than those following World War I.

I trust that the above information will clarify any questions which you may have had concerning either present operation of the Naval Academy or the plans under consideration for filling vacancies. You are extended a most cordial invitation to visit the Naval Academy at your convenience and will be accorded every courtesy.

With particular reference to sentiment created by the article in the Atlantic Monthly, authored by former Midshipman Ralph Smith, I am enclosing copies of letters written by naval officers which I think you will find of interest.

I would not send you a letter of this length if I did not appreciate your deep interest in the matters discussed.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN L. SULLIVAN.

UNITED STATES NAVAL ACADEMY,
Annapolis, Md., January 19, 1948.

Hon. ALBERT L. REEVES, Jr.,
Member of Congress,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. REEVES: I have a copy of your letter of January 8, to the Secretary of the Navy. Be assured that we are only too happy to send you material which will indicate the general pattern of policy, method, and objective here at the Naval Academy.

This pattern is far afield from that portrayed in such articles as the one appearing in the Atlantic Monthly. All the articles I have seen or heard of during the last year of the nature of the Atlantic Monthly article have dealt with a period at the Naval Academy prior to the time I assumed duty as Superintendent. As I have no first-hand knowledge of this period, I felt that I could not with probity offer comment as to facts. I am convinced, however, that the situations described are largely distortions. Of course, we know that it is conceivable that the plebe system has been abused to the point of hazing in days past. Laws are violated in all strata of society from time to time. However, as I have stated categorically to the Secretary of the Navy, the practice of hazing does not exist in the Naval Academy today.

You may be interested in the matter of vacancies at the Naval Academy. It has been inferred that the Naval Academy could conceivably have an enrollment now of 4,406 midshipmen if all appointments prescribed by present statute were filled. This number has been used in comparison with the current enrollment of 2,857 to indicate that an unusually large number of appointments to the Naval Academy are going begging. This is completely in error in both concept and fact.

Actually, the figure 4,406 entirely disregards all attrition and is based upon fulfillments of appointments, which do not become available in full under present law until 1950. Based upon experienced attrition rates at the Naval Academy, considering normal percentage of enrollment to existing vacancies which has been established over the last 20 years (77 percent), taking into account the nonavailability until 1950 of a total of 510 appointments provided by the Congress, and accounting for approximately 113 appointments lost in the division of the class of 1948, the normal expected enrollment of the Naval Academy is 3,211.

Actually, the enrollment as of October 1, 1947, was 2,875, 336 below normal expectancy—or 11 percent. However, 270 of these should not be charged to lack of interest in the Naval Academy. As indicated in enclosure, over 100 vacancies occur because most of the Enlisted Reserve appointments, recently increased by law, were not utilized. The fact that the Naval Reserve was not completely organized in the first postwar years explains the fact that these appointments were not filled. Furthermore, over 100 disappeared with the 3-year graduation of one-half of the class of 1948.

It is the estimate at the Naval Academy, pursuant to close analysis, that the congressional vacancies now unfilled are only a total of some 66 below normal expectancy.

Early in this new year we hope to have ready for distribution to all Members of Congress, to all high schools and junior colleges of the United States and others having an interest, a new catalog outlining the methods and objectives of the Naval Academy and incorporating all factual material concerning methods of entry, entrance requirements, curriculum, and way of life at the Naval Academy. This catalog will be well furnished with pictures so as to give the youthful aspirant a genuine over-view of what he will find here.

Of course, as you know, the Naval Academy is primarily an institution of obligation; that is, in training in accordance with the primary conception of obligation and service to one's country. That conception is paramount over that of opportunity, although the latter is certainly present in the opening up of a noble career to these young men.

Under separate cover I am sending you certain material which will indicate the pattern of concept, method, and objective here. It will appear voluminous but if you will glance over the titles, the nature of them will be indicated, and I hope you will find certain of them of particular interest.

Finally, Mr. REEVES, I want to assure you of our great appreciation of your interest in the Naval Academy.

With best wishes, I beg to remain,
Sincerely yours,
J. L. HOLLOWAY, Jr.,
Rear Admiral, United States Navy,
Superintendent.

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, January 7, 1948.

Hon ALBERT L. REEVES, Jr.,
Congress of the United States,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. REEVES: In your letters of December 16 and 22 you stated that you would be glad to receive additional information concerning the United States Naval Academy and the contribution of its graduates to the national defense.

In view of the fact that your original letter to me was inspired by the article "Why I Resigned From Annapolis" in the Atlantic Monthly, I am sending you copies of two letters from naval officers to the editor of the Atlantic Monthly.

As regards the contribution of the Academy to the national defense, I concur with a recent statement by General Vandegrift, Commandant of the Marine Corps, that "success in war can be achieved only with an able, efficient, intelligent corps of Regular officers. I attribute the outstanding success of the Marine Corps during the late war to the fact that the Marine Corps started the war with an adequated nucleus of Regular officers." This same is equally true of the Navy. Without such a highly trained nucleus of Regular officers, the civilian component would be unable to approach its outstanding accomplishments of World War II.

I am sending a copy of this correspondence to Rear Adm. J. L. Holloway, Superintendent of the Naval Academy, with the request that he send direct to you any other material which he thinks might be helpful.

Sincerely yours,
JOHN L. SULLIVAN.

In time of peace as well as in time of war, Mr. Speaker, we are dependent upon our Navy to perform a major role in assuring our national security. It seems to me that every Member of the Congress ought to feel keenly the responsibility to strengthen our service schools and encourage public interest and confidence in their work.

Pay of Postal Workers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARROLL D. KEARNS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to express my esteem to the chairman and the committee who sponsored H. R. 6916, the bill that raised the pay of postal workers $450 yearly.

I have always been highly sympathetic with the cause of the postal workers, especially the letter carriers; and I know that this permanent yearly increase will be greatly appreciated by these men and women throughout the United States.

Most of us held the hope that this increase would be $600, and I would have supported an increase in that amount. However, I know everyone is thankful and grateful to this committee for their successful effort to have this legislation passed by the House on Friday, June 18.

Taft-Ellender-Wagner Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAY LeFEVRE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. LeFEVRE. Mr. Speaker, one of the most controversial questions that came before the Congress this year was the so-called T-E-W bill, which has been proclaimed by some as the solution to the immediate housing problem. The propaganda emanating from the proponents and opponents of the T-E-W bill did little to clarify the real issues involved, but only tended to confuse the American people.

Congress was deluged with letters, telegrams, and telephone calls from people who were for or against the legislation. The arguments on both sides were highly emotional and supported by very little fact. There was only one common theme that I could find in the correspondence coming into my office. Almost without exception people were asking Congress to enact some type of legislation that would result in more housing in the lower-price field in order to satisfy the demands of the middle- or lower-income groups. There is nothing peculiar in such a desire. I personally am sympathetic with the idea of obtaining more for less.

With this in mind, I undertook a study of the housing legislation pending before Congress, which included, of course, the so-called T-E-W bill which has been proclaimed by many to be the immediate solution to the housing problem. This study extended over a period of 1 month and after careful inquiry and consideration I concluded that of all the measures pending before Congress at that time, that the T-E-W bill was the less apt to produce any immediate solution to the housing problem of all the legislation pending.

Even the proponents of the legislation admitted that the T-E-W bill would have no effect upon the immediate problem. Some of the proponents admitted openly that it would neither solve the slum-clearance problem or the problem of housing the very lowest income groups. The most they contended was that it was a step in the right direction. The proponents of the bill on the floor of the Senate stated that there was no intention and moreover no possibility of carrying out any of the long-range program within the next year or two. Moreover they conceded that it was never the intention to house the very lowest income groups in public housing projects because if they were to do so, the projects would become poorhouses.

In other words, any public housing projects that might be erected under the T-E-W bill were for people who had steady jobs and could afford economic rents. The proponents of the legislation also conceded that 500,000 units of public-housing projects built by the T-E-W bill would only house a very small percentage of the class of people that it was intended for. In other words, if public-housing projects were intended for people who had incomes of from $75 to $150 per month—taking arbitrary figures—the 500,000 units would house only a very small percentage of the people earning incomes within these brackets. The large percentage of the people earning incomes within these brackets would still have to pay taxes directly and indirectly to support the favored families occupying the 500,000 units.

This means that a large percentage of people in one income class must subsidize a small percentage of people within the same income class or you must build enough units to satisfy all people within that income class. In other words, you either have a discrimination within a class or you have to have a program five or ten times as large as the program proposed by the T-E-W bill. Discrimination would be utterly unfair and an enlarged program would be so costly that it would further endanger our economy and destroy the value of the American dollar.

I have no quarrel with the avowed objectives of the T-E-W bill. I believe, as every proponent of the T-E-W bill believes, that we should do everything possible to improve the living conditions of every class and segment of the American people, but there is a big difference between avowed objectives and accomplishments. Let me give you one or two examples to clarify this point.

If the Federal Government spends money to build houses for a very small segment of one income group of our population, we have to collect taxes to pay for that program. Now a lot of people would say: "Let's tax the rich and the big corporations." That all sounds very simple, but it doesn't work out quite so easily. Let us assume we tax General Motor, General Electric, and other big corporations to pay for this housing program. I hope no one is so naive as to believe that those corporations absorb that tax, even if they could afford to absorb it. What actually happens is that the tax is added to the cost of the commodity sold by that corporation so that the cost of this housing is reflected in the cost of living.

The large buying power of the American people lies in the hands of the lower-income groups because they are the ones who consume the largest percentage—being the largest groups—of the commodities produced in this country. Therefore, the poor and the lower income groups pay for the very housing which they thought they were getting at a reduced price. Not only do the people living in the project pay through this indirect method, but also that portion of the lowest-income groups who were discriminated against because there were not enough houses to house all of them. Moreover, the very lowest income groups, who were excluded from the units because they were the type who would make the units poorhouses, have to foot the bill because they, too, must buy the basic commodities of living. Some may accuse me of oversimplifying the problem, but example after example can be given to demonstrate and support the position of many who claim that the whole bill was a fraud on the lower-income groups.

Upon reaching the conclusion that the T-E-W bill would not accomplish its avowed purpose, I then turned to other legislation pending before Congress and being considered at that time, and I concluded that the bill introduced by Congressman WOLCOTT, chairman of the House Banking and Currency Committee, held out the greatest hope of producing more housing and especially more housing in the lower-price brackets of any housing legislation pending before Congress.

Congressman WOLCOTT's bill, H. R. 6959, for which I voted and which passed the House of Representatives on June 18, extended financial assistance to the construction industry in order to keep up the momentum of housing construction. This momentum of construction is now unprecedented in the history of our country and unless something unforeseen happens, the construction industry should produce 1,000,000 units in 1948. The quickest and surest way to assure the American people lower price houses—and for any other commodity—is to produce a sufficient number of units to create competition in the market so that the buyer is able to dictate the terms and not the seller. In other words, if we have more units than are needed, then the buyer can be selective and dictate what price he will pay.

The Wolcott bill, H. R. 6959, contains new provisions differing from previous housing legislation and these new provisions can do much toward inducing the construction industry to produce more homes in the lower-priced brackets. Before discussing these features, however, I want to point out that the Government's own statistics dispute the allegations that houses have only been produced for the people with high incomes.

A recent analysis of individual incomes throughout the Nation related to the prices of new homes, indicates that homes are being built for Americans in all income brackets except the lowest tenth, those receiving less than $1,000 per year, and the highest fifth, those receiving over $5,000 per year. Twenty percent of the homes built fit family incomes between $1,000 and $2,000 per year; 23 percent of the homes built are for family incomes between $2,000 and $3,000 per year; 25 percent fit family incomes between $3,000 and $4,000 per year, and 18 percent of the homes built fit family incomes between $4,000 and $5,000 per year. Only 14 percent of the homes built are for incomes in excess of $5,000 per year. Mark you, contrary to the popular impression, far less homes are being built for incomes in excess of $5,000 per year than for the other income brackets. This statement is based on the standard yardstick that a family can afford a house costing 2½ times the annual income—based on Bureau of Labor Statistics, news release, March 2, 1948.

Admittedly these figures include homes built in rural areas where labor and other costs are not as high and therefore tend to bring down the average price. It also includes homes produced in the southern areas not confronted by weather factors which increase the cost of homes in the northern areas.

Coming back to the provisions of the Wolcott bill which will induce the construction industry to build in the lower-income brackets, I would like to emphasize one particular provision which has not existed in previous legislation. This provision provides for 95 percent FHA insurance on mortgages not exceeding $6,000. Today FHA insurance is limited to 90 percent on any type mortgage and the tendency in the urban areas has been to build in the $7,000 to $12,000 brackets. With this new provision in the legislation banks and other financial institutions loaning money to builders and home owners will direct their capital into lower-price houses carrying mortgages not in excess of $6,000. This should result in diverting capital away from the more costly projects and induce the builders to reach down into the lower brackets, which will provide more housing for the lower-income groups.

The bill also contains another major change extending and increasing the program for the construction of homes in the suburban areas, the mortgages on which would not exceed $4,500. These are commonly designated as title 1, class 3, FHA insured homes.

In one particular project already constructed under the old legislation, a home owner with a $400 lot and with an additional $450 down payment, was able to buy one of these houses at 90 cents a day. This is even cheaper than living in a subsidized housing project. If the Federal Government would push this program, many people could live in the suburban areas and afford to have an automobile or an extra automobile for transportation. This has the added inducement of permitting the people to own their own homes and live outside the congested areas and enjoy the fruits of suburban life, the most important of which is fresh air and pastoral surroundings.

It was these and other things which induced me to turn from the so-called T-E-W bill to Mr. WOLCOTT's bill, H. R. 6959. I did so in the honest belief that more would be accomplished in the shortest possible time for the greatest number of my constituents and for the American people as a whole. I did so after careful consideration and I am willing to stand on that record. If I was wrong it was because no one came forward to show me wherein I was wrong.

Disbursements From Coal Miners' Fund

OF
HON. THOMAS E. MORGAN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, today will be a very important day to over 146,000 crippled and injured coal miners, destitute widows, and orphans of miners. Justice Goldsborough will rule in the district court whether actions and disbursements from the 1947 fund by the trustees are controlled by majority vote of the three-man board or whether there must be unanimity of decision. In all fairness, he should consider the welfare of these crippled soft-coal miners and members of their families and rule the American way of majority rule and grant the additional funds needed from the 1947 contract to carry on the United Mine Workers welfare and retirement fund.

Because of the dispute over pensions, negotiations for a new contract to replace the present one which expires June 30, are deadlocked. In order to reassure the Nation and to insure an adequate supply of coal after July 1, however, the United Mine Workers of America has proposed that subject to acceptance by the bituminous coal operators and the approval of the mine workers' national policy committee, the negotiating representatives of the United Mine Workers of America will recommend that all bituminous coal mines remain in operation after the end of the vacation period on July 6, 1948, under the terms, conditions, and rules of existing agreements, pending negotiation of a successor contract; with the understanding that any changes or improvements negotiated, affecting wages or conditions of employment, will be made retroactive to July 1, 1948, inclusive, provided (a) that this arrangement may be subject to cancellation by either party thereto, upon 5 days' notice; (b) that the bituminous-coal operators will cause their trustee representative on the United Mine Workers welfare and retirement fund, under the existing contract, to permit forthwith the administrative activation of said fund, and that the business of the fund and the disbursements of its moneys be governed in all matters by the majority decision of any of its three trustees; namely, Messrs. Bridges, Van Horn, and Lewis, or their respective successors.

Under leave, I am inserting in the RECORD an editorial from the June 18 issue of the Washington Evening Star, which pursues this matter:

THE COAL ISSUES

The controversy over use of some $40,000,000 in the United Mine Workers' welfare and retirement fund of 1947 comes up before Justice Goldsborough in district court tomorrow, and it may be the most important coal case that he has been called upon to decide.

Of most immediate importance, there is a crisis boiling up in the coal fields which, if allowed to come to a head, will tax the full resources of the Government to quiet down. Thousands of disabled miners, dependents, widows, and orphans of miners—probably 100,000 persons in all—are faced with loss of benefit payments upon which they have been subsisting. A wise determination of the issues involved is needed to prevent a crisis that may be too much for authority of the President and the courts, by way of injunction, to handle.

The miners and dependents have been receiving distress benefits from a $26,000,000 welfare fund accumulated during the 13 months the Government operated the mines. The fund will be exhausted in about 10 days, and will fall short by about $20,000,000 of meeting the commitments to those already receiving the payments.

John L. Lewis insists—and Senator BRIDGES, the third and neutral trustee, agrees—that the mine operators should allow the 1947 welfare fund to assume the obligations the old fund is unable to meet. The operators and their fund trustee, Ezra Van Horn, have refused. They say benefits have been granted improvidently from the old fund and to ineligible people.

The specific case before Justice Goldsborough tomorrow involves Mr. Van Horn's suit to invalidate the Bridges-Lewis plan to pay $100 monthly pensions to miners. But the issues in the case are nearly identical with those in the controversy over continuance of distress benefits.

In the main, it would seem that the two most important points the court will be called upon to decide are (a) who are eligible for the pensions, and (b) whether actions and disbursements from the fund by the trustees are controlled by majority vote of the three-man board or whether there must be unanimity of decision. Mr. Van Horn claims that he, the management representative, must concur for any decision of the trustees to be legal. He has dissented numerous times from decisions of Mr. Lewis and Mr. BRIDGES.

Negotiations for a coal-industry contract to replace the present one, expiring June 30, are deadlocked because of the dispute over pensions and distress benefits. But the matter of a new contract seems relatively unimportant compared with the more immediate problem of what to do about the thousands whose welfare benefits are about to be shut off.

Veterans' Legislation

HON. CARL ALBERT
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I am happy that the House passed this week H. R. 3748 to increase the compensation of widows, orphans, and dependent parents of veterans of World War I and World War II. I was particularly pleased that this measure passed unanimously. With increased living costs this legislation was absolutely essential.

Being a veteran of World War II myself, I have favored every piece of legislation brought before this Congress for the benefit of the veterans of all our wars. These include those few survivors of the Civil War, our Spanish-American War veterans, ond our veterans of both World War I and World War II. I supported the legislation to pay terminal-leave bonds in cash. I supported legislation to increase subsistence payments to veterans in schools, in our veterans' agricultural training, and in our on-the-job training programs. I have sponsored legislation to increase the pensions of Spanish-American War veterans and have introduced legislation to extend pension benefits to veterans of World War I. I have supported legislation to give our veterans the same monetary benefits that have been extended to military personnel on duty after World War II. I believe in the principle of adjusted compensation for war service. Above all, in my humble judgment, we must continue to improve our veterans' hospitals to take care of the sick and the maimed. We can never do too much for those who carry the wounds of battle and for the widows and orphans of the fallen.

The Eightieth Congress

OF
HON. EMORY H. PRICE
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. PRICE of Florida. Mr. Speaker, during the last 6 years there has come before the Congress more important matters than ever before in the history of the United States of America.

We have won the most devastating war the world has ever known; therefore, while our country was waging this war, our people were necessarily mobilized and regimented to a point where their lives were almost entirely controlled by their Government.

American people resent regulations and control; therefore, emergency laws and Presidential directives caused much dissatisfaction, unrest, and resentment. Because of these emergency measures, the task of representing your constituents became more and more difficult. Now, since the actual fighting has ceased, the confusion and delay in getting back to any semblance of normalcy has added to the unrest of our people. We now find ourselves in the midst of many difficulties and faced with vexing problems.

Since I came to Washington, many history-making events have occurred. I have seen the inauguration of the only President of the United States who has been elected to not only the third but to the fourth term. The atomic bomb has been produced and used, and we have seen the mass destruction of human lives reach a level that passes all the wildest dreams of a raving maniac. They claim the latest bomb's destructive force would make the shambles of Hiroshima look as if some frolicsome junior high school had staged its initiation there, compared to the damage that would have been done had one of the newest bombs been dropped. For 6 years the world has seen millions of human beings cremated alive and millions of others put to such inhuman torture that a few years ago no one in the whole civilized world would have believed it possible. The world today is staggering from the shock of such terrible things and naturally the vibrations are felt all over the universe and especially in the Capitol of our great country, or, to be more specific, in Congress.

Thus it has been not only an honor and a privilege to serve in Congress during this time, but it has been a grave responsibility. In my opinion I have had the good fortune to serve with some of the most able men that were ever sent to Washington, for which I am grateful.

I wish to pay tribute to my colleagues in the House from Florida. They diligently serve their districts, their State, and their country, and I am sure the people of Florida are to be congratulated on selecting such able men to represent them in the United States House of Representatives.

At this time I would like to pay tribute to the Honorable JOE HENDRICKS, who is voluntarily retiring from Congress. I must say that the country, and especially the State of Florida, is losing one of its most valuable Representatives. It will be many years before a man from Florida can possibly reach the position on the important Appropriations Committee that JOE now holds and to acquire the influence and prestige that he now enjoys.

In the last 6 years the Congress of the United States has passed many laws providing benefits for the veterans of World War II, the most outstanding of which has been for their education and vocational training. It has been my pleasure to assist in the passage of such laws for their benefit, and I hope that Congress in the not-too-distant future will make some provisions to relieve the needs of our veterans of World War I.

It has been a pleasure for me to assist in passing legislation providing for a reforestation program which includes forest management, fire prevention, and experimental work in forest products. I have also taken an active part in providing for rural electrification and soil conservation. After World War I our farmers of America were the forgotten men, and my ambition has been to prevent a recurrence of events which led to the mass foreclosure on our farms after World War I.

There are 16 counties in my district and I have made an honest effort to represent every county and to look out for the interest of my constituents in each county.

At the present time we are hearing a great deal about the Veterans' Administration's inability to take care of the mentally ill veterans whose disability is non-service-connected; therefore, it is a source of genuine pleasure for me to know that I was instrumental in securing a 1,250-bed NP hospital for Alachua County during my service in Congress.

Then, too, I am pleased to know that my effort contributed materially to the selection of Green Cove Springs as a site for the largest laid-up fleet of combat vessels in the world.

One of the most difficult problems that has confronted this country in the last 6 years has been the labor-management troubles that we have had throughout the country. During my service in Washington I have consistently voted for legislation that I considered both fair to labor and management, and I believe the laws enacted along these lines, perhaps with some amendments, will eventually solve many of the problems confronting these groups. The labor-management troubles are vitally important because millions of our citizens who are not directly connected with management or organized labor are the innocent victims when labor and management cannot agree.

In leaving Congress, I wish to thank the Members of the House for the fine cooperation they have shown me and to say that to know and associate with so many outstanding men and women from all over the United States has been an experience and a pleasure which I shall never forget. Here I would like to include in the RECORD the thank-you ad I put in the newspapers of my district:

THANK YOU VERY MUCH

DEAR FRIENDS: To those who supported me I am grateful. To those who thought it best to support my opponent I respect you as good citizens who have voted your honest convictions.

It has been an honor and a privilege for me to serve as your Congressman.

Rural Electrification for Arizona

OF
HON. RICHARD F. HARLESS
OF ARIZONA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, until recent years many ranch and farm people of Arizona had no electricity. At that time they supplied their basic necessities by use of individual generating plants, which were costly to maintain and operate. However, with the enactment of rural electrification laws we have made tremendous progress, especially since the establishment of the Rural Electrification Administration in 1935, even though we were late in getting started. In that year 5,557 of Arizona's 18,824 farms, or 29.6 percent, were electrified. Arizona then ranked twelfth among the States in this respect. Very little was done in this field between 1935 and 1940. While the national percentage of electrified farms had increased from 10.9 to 30.4, the percentage in Arizona increased less than 1 percent to 30.4 percent. At the time of the 1940 census, Arizona ranked twenty-fourth in the Nation; it had fallen back 12 places.

However, by 1940, a real start had been made in bringing the REA program into Arizona. By 1945, as shown by the agriculture census for that year, 8,603 Arizona farms were receiving central station electric service. More than half of the farms connected to high-line service during this 5-year period were being served by REA-financed systems.

The 1945 census reports a total of 13,142 farms, a net decrease of 5,326 from the 1940 census report. A careful check of the census report shows that the greatest decrease appeared in Apache, Coconino, and Navajo Counties. For reasons which do not appear, the 1945 census shows 6,075 fewer farms in these three counties alone than are shown in the 1940 census. But in each of the three counties the 1945 census reports greater land area in farms than does the 1940 census. Further examination discloses that the 1945 census reports 21,116 farm-dwelling units in the State as compared with 32,163 farm-dwelling units reported by the 1940 census. The decrease in number of farms and farm-dwelling units reported in the 1945 census must be attributed to a change in census definitions or method of counting.

Whatever the reason is for the shrinkage shown in the census reports for 1945 for farms and farm-dwelling units, it is apparent that in measuring the size of the rural-electrification job remaining to be done in Arizona, we must take into consideration this shrinkage in the census report of total number of farms. Whether the establishments involved be considered farms or not, they have the same need and desire for electric service. Being located in rural areas, they are entitled to participate in the benefits of the REA program.

The REA program in Arizona was substantially accelerated in the postwar period. From January 1, 1945, to June 30, 1947, the number of electrified farms in Arizona increased by 2,526 to 11,129. Of this increase, the greater proportion is attributable to REA-financed systems.

On January 1, 1945, there were four REA borrowers in Arizona holding loans totaling $1,326,000 for the construction of 849 miles of line and related facilities to serve 3,025 consumers. On that date, REA had advanced to these systems $1,105,078 and they were operating 635 miles of REA-financed lines, serving 2,102 consumers.

By April 30 of this year, REA loan commitments to 12 borrowers totaled in excess of $6,000,000. These loans were to build almost 2,300 miles of line and related facilities to serve approximately 8,400 consumers. On that date, REA had advanced almost $3,500,000 and its borrowers were operating 808 miles of line serving 4,117 consumers.

Included in these totals are the two systems which have fully paid off their REA loans, totaling approximately $245,000 plus interest, and two systems whose loans were rescinded in whole or in part because of certain uncontrollable events.

Since April 30, REA has made additional loans of $1,295,000 to two of its borrowers for the construction of 302 miles of line and related facilities to serve 807 consumers and for generation and transmission facilities. Three Arizona electric cooperatives have applications pending before REA for loans totaling $1,415,000 to build 239 miles of line and related facilities to serve 288 consumers and for needed generating facilities. Two have applications under survey for $850,000 to build 300 miles of line and related facilities to serve 750 consumers.

This is indeed a program of substantial magnitude, already involving over $6,000,000 and rapidly expanding to the $10,000,000 mark. All of these loans are self-liquidating and interest-paying. They create wealth by bringing the electric energy needed on our farms and in our rural areas to our rural people at prices they can afford. They make it possible to pump the water, without which Arizona agriculture cannot live, and they are the agencies which can most effectively bring to the rural people of Arizona the benefits of the public-power developments on Arizona's rivers.

The biggest problem they face today is the power shortage which has plagued all of Arizona the past few years. Some of the rural electric cooperative systems have found it necessary to generate their own power. It is a tribute to the hard-headed planning of the farm people who organized these enterprises that only two of them have been unable to survive.

The cooperatives have banded together in a State association which is jealously guarding the advantages already gained and is militantly fighting for the continued existence and prosperity of the cooperative rural-electrification movement in the State. In 1947 this organization successfully sponsored in the legislature an Electric Cooperative Act providing for the organization and operation of electric cooperatives. The bill which was passed in 1947 is by no means perfect. It requires strengthening. I assure the association and all of its member organizations that I will support them in their endeavors.

The cooperatives have all filed with the Arizona Power Authority and with the Bureau of Reclamation of the Department of Interior their preferential claims for the power which will be developed at Davis Dam. They are urging the construction by the State authority and by the Federal Bureau of the necessary transmission and feeder lines to bring them this power.

The power shortage in Arizona and all that it means in terms of agricultural and industrial loss and retardation of development cannot be solved overnight. However, there is no question that the electric cooperative groups are making a very great contribution and furnishing at least an interim solution by building their generating plants to make power available until the power resources of the Colorado River are brought to their door.

I have already pointed out that the recent census count of farms is no true measure of the job yet to be done in electrifying rural Arizona. The magnitude of the program which has been laid out by the rural electric cooperatives demonstrates that they have the vision and the determination to see that every rural family has its share of our natural heritage of power. By bringing electric power and energy into areas which have never enjoyed it before these cooperative systems are advancing and accelerating the reclamation program in our State. They are making it possible to cultivate lands which could not be previously cultivated because there was no available power with which to pump the waters flowing underneath the soil. There is no measure of the number of farms which can be reclaimed in our State. No one can say what the limit of development is. The development of the central Arizona project alone will give a tremendous impetus to the reclamation and settlement of lands now lying idle. The REA program in Arizona offers the greatest promise of assistance to the pioneers who wrest these lands from the desert and convert them into productive agricultural uses.

I sincerely believe that the solution of our Indian problems will be materially advanced by the carrying forward of REA's area-coverage rural electrification program. These underprivileged citizens can be educated in the use of power so that they can contribute to their own elevation from the economic morass in which they are mired.

I have vigorously supported the national REA program. As a member of the Federal Power Subcommittee of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in the Seventy-ninth Congress, I stood firm with the friends of REA in all legislation furthering its advancement.

I realized full well the importance of this fight to the REA program and particularly to the electric cooperatives in Arizona. It was clear that losing this fight would be a death blow to the REA program in Arizona. We won that fight then and we are continuing to resist any and all limitations and restrictions which the adversaries of REA would like to have imposed.

In that same fight, the claim was advanced that the job of rural electrification was substantially completed and that REA needed no more funds. I knew how far this was from the truth and was not deceived for one moment by the distortions of facts and figures presented to our committee.

The Seventy-ninth Congress not only rejected outrageous proposals but also appropriated to REA the largest loan fund authorizations in its history. I supported each and every one of these appropriations. The record will show that on May 28, 1947, and July 28, 1947, I voted to increase the REA loan authorization from $225,000,000 to $250,000,000, restoring the $25,000,000 cut from the budget estimates by the Republican majority in the Appropriations Committee.

On February 23, 1948, I introduced a bill, H. R. 5489, to appropriate $300,000,000 additional for loans for fiscal 1948. And on February 24, 1948, I voted "yea" on a motion to provide a deficiency appropriation in this amount, a motion which lost by a narrow margin. On April 1, we won out in our fight for more loan funds when we provided a deficiency appropriation of $175,000,000.

I have always supported liberal administrative fund appropriations for REA because I know we need a strong, adequately staffed agency to administer this important program. As recently as June 16, 1948, I voted to increase REA's administrative expense item by the relatively small amount of $450,000 which is sorely needed to discharge its greatly increased responsibilities. The Congress had increased REA's administrative expense fund for 1949 only 9 percent after increasing its loan authorizations by more than 200 percent over 1948. We lost on that vote by the narrow margin of five votes. I sincerely hope that the Senate will take appropriate steps to rectify that blunder.

In all of these undertakings and contests in which I have engaged, I have fought for power for Arizona's progress. I shall not cease that fight until the people of Arizona have all the power they want, where they want, and at a price that they can afford. I am mindful not only of the benefits which will accrue to our rural people as one of the fruits of victory but also of the benefits that will result to our urban areas which always profit when agriculture prospers. There is also to be considered the tremendous impetus which the REA program has given Arizona's copper industry. Copper is electricity's highway to our cities and farms.

Overriding the Veto

OF

HON. ERNEST K. BRAMBLETT

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. BRAMBLETT. Mr. Speaker, under permission of the House to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial by Mr. Allen Griffin, publisher of the Monterey Peninsula Herald, Monterey, Calif.:

OVERRIDING THE VETO — INDEPENDENT CONGRESS—RETURN TO TRADITION—WHAT'S THE MATTER?

President Truman's veto of the social-security bill passed by Congress did not have time to cool off before both Houses overrode the veto the same day the President stated his objections to the bill.

The vote was better than 5 to 1 in the Senate, almost 4 to 1 in the House, thus indicating that most of the Democratic Members joined with Republicans in riding down the veto.

The President's veto had no constructive meaning, as it was legislatively impossible for Congress at this late period of a concluding session to revamp the measure and introduce the considerable changes that the President demanded. Most of all, it was politically impossible, and certainly the President knew as much.

No doubt the Congress was also impelled to a quick overriding of the veto by President Truman's recent excoriation of Congress as the "worst ever," an opinion not shared by most of his own party followers who serve in the Eightieth Congress.

What is the matter with this Congress?

Something, of course, because there is something the matter with every Congress.

What seems mostly to be the matter, from the Presidential point of view, is that this has been the first independent Congress since 1932.

During his terms as a Senator, Mr. Truman never had the experience of serving in any Congress that wasn't a rubber-stamp of the Chief Executive.

Mr. Truman came to the Senate from Missouri as a result of the 1934 election. The New Deal was in full swing, and each election confirmed the authority and appeal of the late President Roosevelt to the public. Members of the House and of the Senate rode the tide of electoral votes hanging on to FDR's apron strings.

President Roosevelt had a way of appeasing most of the southern politicians and kept them lined up by making it profitable to them. Northern Democrats were largely confirmed New Dealers. A substantial working majority existed, and the President's wishes in legislation were carried out with a minimum of debate.

That sort of a situation couldn't exist forever.

In 1944 the change began to set in, although the minds of the Congress and the President were as one in the conduct of the war.

In 1946 a considerable change was confirmed.

The Eightieth Congress assembled in Washington not in a rebellious mood but with an air of independence and a Republican majority.

It was a Congress determined to exercise its full legislative prerogatives and responsibilities. It has been, on the whole, a canny and conservative Congress, resentful of attacks made on its authority.

That is a return to a tradition, a very sound constitutional tradition.

Mr. Truman had never experienced that tradition as a legislator; and it comes hard to him to meet the Congress as a branch of the Government equal to him rather than as a subordinate—which is what it was during his terms of office as Senator.

The public attitude toward the Eightieth Congress was tested recently in numerous primary elections, and the vote generally upheld the position of the Congress.

In California the reaction was remarkable, in that the eight Republican incumbents seeking reelection won the Democratic as well as the Republican nominations, three Democrats also winning on both tickets.

Although the assumption is generally held by political observers that a Republican President and a strong Republican majority in the Eighty-first Congress will be the result of the November general election, it is certain that the new Congress will retain its independence and that a Republican President will not find it to be a rubber-stamp association.

The period of the domination of the executive over the legislative branch of the United States Government is definitely over. From now on, for an indeterminate period of time, the President will have to make his case rather than merely state it and have his emissaries cause it to be carried out by an acquiescent Congress.

We are satisfied that such is the outlook. We only hope that in matters of foreign policy the association of the President and the Congress will be sufficiently intimate, that this country will show to its friends as well as to its adversaries that there is unity and a common purpose in the front we present to the world. That we need, and that the people must insist upon, for a firm, dependable, sustained, and resolute attitude on the part of America is a powerful position from which to uphold peace in the world.—A. G.

Old-Age Assistance

HON. CARL ALBERT

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that this Congress before adjournment has finally consented to do a little something for the old people of our country. I am happy that Federal funds for old-age assistance have been increased, effective August 1, 1948, by an amount equal to $5 per person on the basis of present State old-age assistance rolls, $5 for the blind, and $3 for dependent children.

In my judgment these increases have not been sufficient. It is common knowledge that old-age assistance in these times of high living costs are hardly enough to keep body and soul together.

There is a dire need for more stability in our old-age assistance laws. There is something wrong with any system which continually keeps old people in doubt as to whether they might be eligible from month to month to remain on the rolls. There is something wrong with a system which subjects every old person who seeks the benefits of laws enacted by our Congress and State legislatures to inquisitions by investigators who have the power to cut them off the rolls. There is only one way to do this, and that is by basing eligibility on age and citizenship rather than on need. To take care of this situation I have introduced H. R. 5804. I claim no particular pride of authorship, but I do think a bill lowering the age limit for old-age assistance and increasing the amount of payments in view of the increased cost of living is very much in order at the present time. This is an American program. It is a program for the fathers and mothers of our country.

From Cotton Mill to Oxford: Story of South Carolinian

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, as the Representative in Congress of the largest textile district in the world and as a worker in the cotton mills of my district for many years, I take great pride in inserting herewith an excerpt from the Christian Science Monitor of Saturday, June 19, 1948.

Within the span of my memory, miraculous changes have taken place in the living and working conditions and opportunities in our mill communities.

While the young men referred to in the accompanying article are outstanding, they are by no means the only ones who have attained distinction. The very finest opportunities and advantages are now available and are generally being utilized by the people engaged in the textile industry. I proudly call attention to the unusual accomplishments of John Q. Hill and James E. White, who are typical representatives of the fine people who live in our congressional district:

FROM COTTON MILL TO OXFORD: STORY OF SOUTH CAROLINIAN

(By Henry Lesesne)

LYMAN, S. C.—John Q. Hill, a cotton-mill worker, who is embarking this fall upon 3 years of study at Oxford University, never saw inside a schoolroom until he was 11 years old.

And when he did go to the six-teacher, seven-grade school near his parents' farm home in Cherokee County, he managed, somehow, partly because of his age and size, to get into the fifth grade.

His mother had taught him to read, and he had read quite a bit. But he couldn't write, not even his name, and arithmetic was a mystery to him. He says today his teacher must have had the patience of Job.

WENT TO WORK

He finished high school at Gaffney, the county seat, and then went to work in Pacific Mills at Lyman, a little textile community between Greenville and Spartanburg, because an older brother worked in the mill there. His brother was a loom fixer. Soon John himself became a skilled worker, a card grinder.

At 19 he married a Lyman girl, Vonnie Lee Hilliard, and they have a 9-year-old daughter, Lynda Donna. The worst part of winning the scholarship, Mr. Hill says, is that he must be separated from his family for 3 years. The annual stipend of a Rhodes scholar is about $1,600.

Mr. Hill got his education by working the second shift—3 p. m. to 11 p. m.—and going to college during the day. For a year he went to Spartanburg Junior College, paying his way out of his earnings. The next year, at Wofford College, in Spartanburg, he won a scholarship. Then came a year in the Marines. His last year at Wofford he was under the GI bill.

He was graduated last year, making straight A's on all subjects. Since then he's been a cotton mill worker at night and a college professor by day, teaching at Wofford.

You talk to young Mr. Hill, you hear his remarkable story. You say to yourself, here is an amazing story. And when you convey something of this thought to the young professor, he shrugs and says: "You ought to see my brother; you'd get a real story out of him."

He was referring to the older brother who was working in the mill when he came to Lyman, fresh out of high school. That brother, J. M. Hill, didn't begin his formal education until he was 28 years old. But he was hardly a man totally without education, for he entered the eighth grade, right off.

BROTHER A PASTOR

He was graduated from Wofford a few years later, in 1942. Then he went to the Southern Baptist Seminary and also to Cambridge, where he studied philosophy. He was a chaplain in the Army. Now he's pastor of the Tiger Baptist Church at Tigerville, S. C.

Oddly enough, John Q. Hill is not the only worker at Lyman to attain a high scholastic honor recently. A fellow worker, James E. White, was appointed to Annapolis.

Last year at the University of South Carolina, Mr. White, a freshman, made a straight "A" average. An appointee of Representative BRYSON, Democrat, of South Carolina, to Annapolis, couldn't make the grade because of a physical disability. The Congressman heard of Mr. White's accomplishment and arranged a last-minute appointment. Mr. White, at that time, was back at his old job in Pacific Mills working to earn sufficient funds to resume his education.

The Airplane Accident at Mount Carmel, Pa.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARROLL D. KEARNS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to say that the entire United States was shocked over the tragedy of the DC-6 that fell at Mount Carmel, Pa., on Thursday, June 17, carrying 43 people to their untimely death.

I think it is time that the Congress requests the Air Safety Board to cease their opposition to passengers carrying parachutes in commercial planes. The argument that people must be taught how to descend is highly questionable. The DC-6 that was destroyed Thursday was flying at an altitude of 17,000 feet when trouble was first detected. All the passengers aboard would have had ample time to parachute to safety had they been so equipped.

The air lines are to be complimented on the job they are doing; however, we must take steps to help them in providing further safety measures that will prevent such needless loss of life.

New Look in the South

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BURR P. HARRISON
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I append the following editorial from the Rockbridge County News, Lexington, Va., entitled "New Look in the South":

NEW LOOK IN THE SOUTH

Some farms in Rockbridge County have been greatly improved in recent years by using strip-farming methods. Much of our land is steep and should not be plowed at all. If it must be, soil-preserving methods are essential. In spite of this fact, the old-time methods of plowing the steep hillsides continues to a great extent. The result is that much valuable Rockbridge County farm land is fast becoming worthless or of little value. This fact was commented upon recently by a member of the county reassessment board who had reason to look over much Rockbridge County land. What he saw in parts of the county was a distressing sight.

The New York Times recently published an editorial concerning a Virginia farm under the title of this article that sounds like a fairy tale. But it is not. It is perhaps an extreme case of what rehabilitation methods can do, but it is of interest to many of our people and is published below:

Miracles really do not happen to gullied and eroded land, so that overnight a run-down farm trebles in value. Yet what transpired recently on the 105-acre farm of a 57-year-old widow, near Lacrosse, Va., savors of the miraculous. The farm of the widow and her son (a veteran of the war) was chosen by veterans taking agricultural training in the area for a demonstration of what could be done with a treatment program for an old worn-out farm, if all available resources were used.

"One morning, soon after dawn, a cavalcade of conservationists swarmed over the place. Many tractors dug deep into the wasted land; posthole diggers, fertilizer spreaders, and a bulldozer battled the red clay. Jeeps jumped over old furrows as expediters of commands. Landscrapers limed the lawn and planted shrubs. A dejected farmhouse got a spray of white paint. The fields of the farm were laid off according to a model plan. Just for good luck an acre pond was measured off for fishing and recreation. When the conservationists began to go over the topsoil in the morning the farm was said to be worth $4,000. A soil conservationist said he would give $15,000 for it after the day's work.

"The farm is located in what used to be the center of the bright Tobacco Belt of the South. What happened there made news for many farm owners who only recently acquired their land. For thousands of farm owners of the South have come up from tenancy and sharecropping in the past decade or so. If we go to the deep South, where tenancy and sharecropping were once entrenched, even there we find a marked change for the better. In Mississippi in 1935, 69.8 percent of all the farms were operated by nonowners, but in 1945 the number operated by tenants had decreased to 59.3 percent. In South Carolina the number of tenant-operated farms decreased from 62.2 percent of the total in 1935 to 54.2 percent in 1945. In North Carolina much less than half of the farms are operated by tenants, and in Virginia nearly 80 percent of them are owner operated.

"In the early 1930's, when farm ownership in the South began to show a steady increase, 22,000,000 acres had been destroyed by wind and water erosion and by plows wantonly guided by unskilled hands, in 11 States of the region. Farm ownership is the best barrier against the tides of waste, for the owner has a vested interest in soil conservation. He is not, like so many tenants, 'aiming' to move next year.' "

Power for Arizona Progress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD F. HARLESS
OF ARIZONA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, Arizona stands on the threshold of its period of greatest development. But in order to achieve its rightful place in the family of States—the place to which it is entitled by reason of its great natural resources and physical advantages—Arizona must obtain its fair share of two of its resources—water and power.

Without these basic ingredients, Arizona cannot continue and accelerate the rate of advancement which the last decade has witnessed. They are indispensible t both her urban and her rural development, to her industrial and her agricultural progress.

Arizona abounds in water and power resources. But so far these resources have been developed principally for her neighbors. The waters of the mighty Colorado whose main stream courses principally through Arizona have already been developed as a major source of water and power for the Far West. The massive structures at Boulder and Parker stand as a symbol of man's domination over the forces of nature and their utilization for human progress. But for Arizonans, unfortunately, they are still only a symbol and not a tool with which to forge Arizona's destiny.

It is useless to recount opportunities lost and advantages never realized. We must look forward to the creation of new opportunities and the realization of future advantages to be derived from them. We must be alert—never again to allow to be taken from us our birthright—our fair share in the bounty which Nature has so lavishly bestowed upon us.

Ever since I came to the Congress in 1943 I have fought, often against very heavy odds, to prevent this from happening. The struggle is by no means over; the fight is not yet won. My colleagues in the Congress have stood shoulder to shoulder in the contest to preserve Arizona's inalienable rights—always with the encouragement and able assistance of that great indomitable spirit, our late and beloved Gov. Sidney P. Osborn.

On the Washington scene two great Federal agencies are the instrumentalities which we must use to secure and hold Arizona's heritage—the Bureau of Reclamation of the Department of Interior and the Rural Electrification Administration in the Department of Agriculture. At home our Arizona Power Authority, the public power and irrigation districts, and the rural electric cooperatives are the agencies through which our heritage of power and water can be brought to the people of Arizona for their benefit and advancement.

The Bureau of Reclamation has made two great steps forward in harnessing the Colorado River, our greatest natural asset in terms of water and power. Boulder and Parker Dams are towering symbols of man's mastery over and utilization of our natural resources. But they are only the beginning. A few more years will see Davis Dam in place and, I sincerely hope, Bridge Canyon Dam begun. Their completion will mark the end of one long struggle and the beginning of another.

The securing of funds for construction of Davis has been indeed a series of struggles. We had to fight for practically every dollar we asked for so that construction might be accelerated to make up for the time lost by reason of the interruption required by the war. On May 14, 1946, I urged an increase in the 1947 Interior Department appropriations of $12,000,000 to expedite Davis construction. We did not secure anything near as much as we needed for fiscal 1947, but the record will show that I made a determined bid for it. I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for May 14, 1946, at page 5019:

Mr. HARLESS. We are delaying the completion of an important part of the Colorado River project. I feel that what I have to say here is important to you, especially those of you from the East, because unless you have been in the Western States you cannot appreciate the fact that we must have irrigation to continue to expand. We have been absorbing the excess population as it has drifted westward. If another depression comes in this country, you will be very glad that there is a place for people to go to make their homes, so that you will not have an excess population here in the East.

You have made it possible by your appropriations to start projects, but now you choke off these projects by curtailment of these appropriations. May I emphasize that all of these projects pay for themselves. Members of the House sometimes protest that we are expending public funds, but the people who buy and use this irrigated land pay back this money. In addition, we must have the electricity to support the irrigation projects.

I particularly regret that this point of order has been made because I have in mind that the $15,000,000 will include some $3,000,000 to build a power line from Parker Dam, which has already been completed. The power is now wasted. We could build that power line into central Arizona and help pay for the construction of Parker Dam.

Unless you have been there, unless you have seen these projects, you cannot fully understand them. Unless you go ahead with the appropriations to complete these irrigation projects, you have in effect nullified the previous appropriations for the irrigation districts in the West.

I trust that when this appropriation bill goes over to the Senate they in their wisdom will restore these funds, and when it comes back here we will be able to recede and concur, because we must go ahead with the development of that country if this great Nation of ours is to realize its full heritage.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Permit me to say at this point that the gentleman is making a very persuasive argument, as he always does. I cannot resist the temptation to say that the distinguished gentleman is not only one of the ablest Members of Congress, but one of the most effective, a man whom the committee is always delighted to have come before the committee.

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. As evidence of the gentleman's great work, let me say that the great State of Arizona could well afford to pay him and his colleagues many times the salaries they are now receiving because Arizona gets more money for irrigation and reclamation than several dozen other States that I could name.

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. I thank the gentleman. If we get the money, I want to remind my distinguished friend who is so generous in his comments, all that money will be repaid. The only reason the appropriation is made is because we are one of the younger States in the Union. We have a great deal of desert country. We have a lot of fertile land and all of our future lies ahead of us because we are just beginning to realize our resources. We are a growing State. That is the reason we must come to Congress for help. I want to stress the idea here that we must have the help of the Nation to expand because when we expand the Nation expands with us.

Again on April 25, 1947, I fought to secure adequate appropriations for the Davis Dam project and for other Arizona reclamation project, including the central Arizona project surveys. Exponents of false economy had cut the budget estimates for Davis of $18,000,000 back to $6,000,000. We finally secured an increase of $3,700,000. For fiscal 1949, we finally secured more adequate recognition of the need and obtained an appropriation in the House of $18,000,000 which the Senate increased by almost $5,000,000. It has indeed been a long, strenuous grind, but I believe the end is in sight.

Our fight for construction of Bridge Canyon is well under way. It is already apparent that completion of Davis will by no means solve the water and power problems of Arizona. In the Seventy-ninth Congress and again in the Eightieth Congress, I introduced bills to authorize the construction, operation and maintenance of the Bridge Canyon Dam. This development, which is the heart of the central Arizona project, will do more to satisfy Arizona's needs than any development to date. We are still a long way from having this development but substantial progress has been made.

As recently as April 12 of this year, I took the floor to condemn the Hitler tactics employed by the propagandists for certain California interests to convey to the general public the impression that Arizona was raiding California to gain a water project for itself. I pointed out, as emphatically as I could, that the streams of Arizona make up a large part of the flow of the Colorado River and that the Colorado itself lies largely in Arizona or on its borders. I reiterated my view that thus far, Arizona's share out of this great river has been a mere pittance and that Arizona receives an infinitesimal portion of the water diverted from the river and of the power produced at its dams.

This reckless propaganda will never deter me, wherever I may be, from continuing my fight for the Bridge Canyon Dam. I have high hope and invincible determination that it will be built in the not too distant future to satisfy the needs of Arizona for water and power. And when it is built, I pledge myself to protect the interests of Arizona so that we will not have a repetition of what has happened at the Boulder and Parker developments.

I have already stated that the completion of these great developments will also mark the beginning of another struggle. We are already in the middle of a fight to preserve the benefits conferred by the irrigation reclamation laws. In January of this year the House of Representatives considered and passed amendments of the Reclamation Project Act of 1939 which would not only retard progress on new developments but would materially raise the cost of power developed at all reclamation dams. On January 21 of this year, I took the floor and opposed these amendments as vigorously as I could. At page 414 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for that date, I said:

Mr. HARLESS Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is agreed to it will cripple the Bureau to the extent that we cannot have continued expansion in the West. I know there are some people who would move their lips in friendship for irrigation and reclamation in the West but deep down in their hearts they do not want to see the West developed because they are afraid there might be some competition. But let me point out that we do not grow the same products out West that are grown in the Middle West. We buy the manufactured goods from eastern plants. When we develop one of these irrigation and reclamation projects it results in our buying large amounts of electrical equipment and farm equipment, which are produced in the East; therefore, it is to your advantage to see that this portion of the United States continues to develop. To shoot a hole in this particular law is to destroy the progress already made in the western part of the United States. Leave the law intact. For 22 years it has been working well. * * *

This law has been working well and for anyone to come in here with these amendments is to destroy its whole effectiveness. Please do not meddle with the law at this time. There are no instances mentioned here where there has been an abuse of authority. There has been a group of generalities. Leave the law as it is and let the Bureau of Reclamation and Irrigation continue to function. They function as efficiently as any department. These projects pay back to the United States all money invested. In addition thereto, I have in mind a project near my home town of Phoenix. We pay more money each year in income taxes from the resources that we get out of this project than was paid to construct the project. It is to the benefit of all of us. Let us not poke holes in this law. So, I plead with you, do not adopt any of these amendments.

These crippling amendments were adopted in the House of Representatives. I am confident that they will not pass the Senate. But we may as well face the facts—the fight to emasculate these laws is on. I pledge my continued, unabated opposition to this campaign of destruction at every possible opportunity.

We must be on guard at all times against loss of the benefits we are entitled to from the developments which have been completed. The States of California and Nevada have already made claim to all of the power which will be developed at Davis. Fortunately, Arizona has also filed its claim to this power and is taking appropriate steps to protect that claim.

Under the reclamation laws, public bodies and cooperatives have preferential rights in the purchase of power generated at reclamation projects. Unfortunately, the Arizona public's interests were not adequately safeguarded when Parker power was distributed. Not only did Arizona fail to secure its fair share of Parker power, but it failed to take appropriate measures to see that the people of Arizona benefited from the Parker power which did come into the State. Instead, for the most part, a few large private interests have enjoyed the benefits of this development.

As for the Boulder project, the other large development on the Colorado, we all know that until 1944 no action was taken by Arizona to secure its statutory share of the power generated at the tremendous power plant. Under the leadership of the late Governor Osborn, the Arizona Power Authority Act of 1944 was enacted, and for the first time Arizona had a State agency through which it could claim its share of Boulder power. Only in recent months have the necessary formal actions been taken to recapture for Arizona the Boulder power which belongs to it. I have noted with great regret that there still remains a need for further State legislative action to perfect the Arizona Power Authority Act. When Governor Osborn signed the original authority bill he requested amendment of certain provisions. In 1947 certain amendments were passed which considerably weakened the effectiveness of the Authority as an agency for bringing the benefits of cheap and plentiful Colorado River power to the people of Arizona. I am convinced that it is necessary that this act be further amended by the Arizona legislature to remove the defects, and to perfect it as an instrument which will best achieve the objective of bringing to the Arizona people the tremendous benefits and advantages of cheap, plentiful power.

There is also the need for State legislation to safeguard the people of Arizona from extortionate power rates. If necessary, the corporation commission's regulatory powers must be strengthened and the Commission given legislative direction, and the power to prevent the marketing of public power to enrich a few special interests. Too long have the people of Arizona been paying tribute on power generated at public developments and transmitted over public facilities, all built with public funds. There is needed also State legislation establishing an effective workable condemnation law which will permit municipalities and other public bodies to take over electrical properties required in the development of their power programs. The recent decision of the Arizona Supreme Court invalidating existing condemnation laws insofar as they relate to electrical properties, points up the need for such legislation.

I pledge my support for the enactment of all legislation required to meet these objectives.

National Conference on Community Improvement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK L. SUNDSTROM
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. SUNDSTROM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following address by Carrol M. Shanks, opening the National Conference on Community Improvement:

Last summer there was a rather informal meeting here in Washington of people active in community work; mostly people connected with national organizations which concern themselves with community-improvement programs of various types.

It was their feeling that community work needed more coordination—that some communities had strong, well-coordinated, progressive programs—but that in many parts of the country the growth in the central power of the State and National Governments had weakened community self-reliance.

They thought the time had come to organize a national council, the function of which would be (1) to provide assistance to local groups through interchange of information on successful community programs and (2) to stimulate communities throughout the land to adopt progressive community activities on a self-support, local basis.

The council has been established. It should be understood, clearly, at the start, that the National Council for Community Improvement will not supersede or interfere with or infringe upon established organizations working in this field at either the national, the State, or the local level.

The council is established to serve and assist all organizations which devote themselves to community work.

The purpose of this conference has been stated in the announcements you have received.

We have gathered leaders in various fields of community activity for discussion and exchange of information.

Through this conference, through the stimulation we hope you will get from meeting together on matters of common interest, through a widespread interest in community-improvement programs—we hope to arouse a determination on the part of American citizens to solve their community problems themselves.

We live in freedom—in a representative democracy—our Republic. That freedom, together with the initiative, self-reliance, and individual acceptance of responsibility which make it possible and the opportunities and incentives which accompany these qualities, have given us a dynamic quality which has stimulated production and brought a rising standard of living.

With all the imperfections of our system, no other system has ever approached it in bringing a bettering standard of living to the common man.

Our freedom and individual initiative, self-reliance, and acceptance of responsibility make it possible for us so largely to supply the world in time of war and so largely to feed, cloth, and equip it in time of peace.

Individual initiative, self-reliance, and acceptance of responsibility can be brought to bear effectively, however, only at close range, in the neighborhood and the community.

The force of these qualities has built our Nation. They are lost, muffled, or dissipated when employed at State or national levels—many times removed.

This conference may go down in history as a great rallying or turning point in bringing the solution of problems back to the neighborhood and local levels where our historic, dynamic qualities can be brought to bear upon them.

If we can help local initiative and activities—if we can aid in the coordination of local attacks on problems—then we will have done much to strengthen and bring to bear the basic forces of our Nation.

No nation is stronger or more vital than the communities of which it is made. The purpose of this conference is to aid and stimulate communities and neighborhoods to solve their own problems and build their own strength. The Nation will wax strong with the communities.

Socialized Medicine Would Lower the Standards of Medical Care and Retard Medical Progress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, it seems that many of those who have advocated socializing the practice of medicine in the United States are individuals who have not too much knowledge of the science of medicine. The great majority of doctors are convinced that the plan to socialize medicine in the United States would be a great detriment to their profession. Who are better qualified to determine the effect of this plan on medical practice than the doctors themselves? Really, doctors of medicine are those of our citizens who have devoted their lives to the study of medicine. No one is better qualified to determine the best plan on which that science should be based. They are best qualified to determine whether it is better that medicine be practiced on the individual and professional basis or whether it is better that the Government run the practice of medicine. They understand the elements involved—individual initiative and responsibility and a high sense of professional honor.

I wish to include in my remarks herewith the conclusions and recommendations of a recent study made by Drs. Lewis Meriam and George W. Bachman in behalf of the Brookings Institution. Dr. Meriam has made surveys of medicine of several State governments. Dr. Bachman has had a very wide experience in medical research and public health, both in this country and abroad. He has served on the faculties of Chicago, Johns Hopkins, and Columbia, where he undertook the organization, financing, and development of the School of Tropical Medicine in Puerto Rico. The following are their conclusions and recommendations on the subject of socialized medicine:

CONCLUSIONS

The conclusions based on this foundation are:

1. Probably no great nation in the world has among its white population better health than prevails in the United tates. A few small homogeneous countries, such as New Zealand with respect to its white population, are slightly ahead of the United States as a whole, but certain States of the United States with larger populations equal them.

2. It is apparent that the United States under its voluntary system of medical care has made greater progress in the application of medical and sanitary science than any other country. This progress is now reflected in low mortality and morbidity rates of infectious diseases and in increased life expectancy. There is every reason to believe that these trends will continue unabated under our present system of medical care.

3. The nonwhites in the United States have materially poorer health than the whites, but the evidence does not indicate that this condition is primarily or even mainly due to inadequacy of medical care.

4. The advances in health among both the whites and the nonwhites that have been made in the United States in the past four decades do not suggest basic defects in the American system.

5. Although the statistics resulting from the administration of the Selective Service Act—the so-called draft statistics—have been widely used to show bad health among the American people and the need for revolutionary changes in arrangements for medical care of individuals, they are unreliable as a measure of the health of the Nation and cannot be used to show the extent of the medical needs of the country as a whole.

6. Present medical care in the United States compares favorably with that which existed in other leading nations prior to the Second World War.

7. The conditions in extremely poor rural areas that lack the resources to support adequate public services, such as health work, education, and highways cannot be satisfactorily solved by subsidies. This problem calls for a radically different approach, either bringing in new or improved economic activities or getting the people to more favorable and administratively less expensive areas. This condition has been accentuated by the emigration of youth from these areas to urban communities.

8. The United States has some individuals and families not possessed of the resources to enable them to pay for adequate medical care. In the future, as in the past, provision must be made for them through public funds or philanthropy. The evidence suggests that many of them are elderly, impaired, or underendowed or are widows or deserted women or their dependents. It is doubtful if they could be effectively covered by compulsory insurance because they would lack the means to attain and maintain an insured status. The large majority of American families have the resources to pay for adequate medical care if they elect to give it a high priority among the several objects of expenditure. The issue is not whether they can afford medical care but whether they should be compelled by law to pool their risks and to give payment for medical care a top priority. The major alternative for people with ability to pay is to leave them free to determine for themselves what medical care they desire and whether they will pool their risks through voluntary arrangements.

9. Compulsory health insurance would necessitate a high degree of governmental regulation and control over the personnel and the agencies engaged in providing medical care. This field of regulation and control would be far more difficult than any other large field previously entered by the Government, and past experience with governmental regulations and control in the United States causes doubt as to whether it encourages initiative and development.

10. The problem of eliminating politics from Government administration is extremely difficult. It does not seem probable that politics could be eliminated from medical care supplied under a governmental system.

11. Compulsory insurance would inject the Government into the relationship between practitioner and patient. A real danger exists that Government actions would impair that relationship and hence the quality of medical care.

12. The administration of compulsory insurance would require thousands of Government employees for accounting, auditing, and inspection, and investigation.

13. The cost of medical care presumably would increase because of (a) administrative expenses; (b) the tendency to insured persons to make unnecessary and often unreasonable demands upon the medical care services; and (c) the tendency of some practitioners and agencies to take advantage of the system for their own financial advantage.

14. The adoption of compulsory insurance would not immediately make available adequate service for all, because there are not at present the facilities nor a sufficient number of trained and experienced physicians, dentists, and nurses to meet the demand which would result from compulsory insurance.

15. Proposals for compulsory insurance provide for payment of practitioners under one or all of three methods: (a) fee for service, (b) per capita, or (c) salary. Use of the fee-for-service device represents the minimum degree of socialization, but it is administratively difficult. Administrative difficulties would probably result in the adoption of the per capita system which represents a higher degree of socialization or even in the salary system which represents practically complete socialization. It seems questionable whether a country which once embarks on compulsory insurance can turn back but must attempt to remedy defects by more complete government control and administration.

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. For the present, in our judgment, the National Government would be wise to leave to the individual States the question of whether compulsory health insurance is to be adopted or whether the provision of professional services is to be left in the realm of free enterprise. It seems highly probable that in many communities the intelligent cooperation of consumers and practitioners will develop satisfactory arrangements that remain subject to their own control without National Government administration. It seems highly improbable that this experimentation—possible under our Federal form of government—will ultimately develop a single pattern that is applicable to all sections of the country and is desired by a large majority of the people. If such a pattern should develop, it will doubtless then be adopted with a great degree of unanimity. If compulsory insurance should be adopted now by a narrow vote in the Congress, thousands of persons who are opposed to it would start hostile to the whole undertaking.

2. For the time being the National Government and many of the State governments may well devote their resources and energies to:

(a) Research and developments in the fields of public health;

(b) Health education at the school level;

(c) Teaching of preventive medicine;

(d) Assisting in the acquisition of physical facilities and training of personnel.

(e) Providing systematic care for the indigent and the medically indigent. In some States careful surveys of existing conditions will be required to furnish the basis for developing a comprehensive and coordinated program.

3. From the standpoint of public relations, governments might be well advised to leave adult educational campaigns for the control and prevention of disease to the national, State, and local voluntary organizations which have been able to enlist the active cooperation of leading laymen in most section of the country. It must be remembered that good health is not exclusively a matter of medical care; it also impinges upon causative factors that are nonmedical, such as food, shelter, vice and crime, transportation, and industry. Its maintenance depends also upon the intelligence, interest, and cooperation of individuals, families, and local communities.

These recommendations are not widely at variance with those of the majority of the Committee on the Costs of Medical Care, arrived at in 1932 after a comprehensive study. The report of the committee says:

"The majority of the committee does not endorse the recommendation which would make health insurance a legal requirement for certain sections of the population. These members realize that such a step may ultimately be necessary and desirable in some States, but they believe that for most States and probably for almost all of them at the present time, it is much more desirable (a) to encourage voluntary measures for protection against wage loss during sickness, and (b) to develop voluntary insurance for medical care in conjunction with group practice, with hospital service, and with the related measures recommended on the preceding pages. They are of the opinion that the difficulties of these plans can be controlled by a combination of professional and community effort, and that these plans hold the promise of steady extension in scope of service and in proportion of the population served. These members believe that the various payment plans (aside from compulsory insurance) if fully carried out, would: (1) Largely solve the problem of hospital costs which constitute about 50 percent of the average family expenditure for the care of sickness; (2) provide adequately for many rural areas in which serious deficiencies of facilities exist at present; (3) make more nearly adequate provision than exists at present for the "indigent" and for the care of certain diseases of public importance; and (4) provide, through voluntary cooperative insurance * * * medical service to a majority of the 70,000,000 people living in industrial communities and in cities." (Medical Care for the American People, the final report of the Committee on the Costs of Medical Care, October 31, 1932, p. 130.)

The years since 1932 have witnessed—

1. A great growth in voluntary insurance both for hospitalization and for medical services.

2. State experimentation with compulsory health insurance in Rhode Island and California.

3. A growing willingness on the part of practitioners to cooperate in the development of prepayment plans and other devices to enable patients who so desire to regularize their payments for medical care.

4. A profound change in the amount and distribution of the earnings of the American people. This change greatly reduces the number who cannot afford adequate medical care if they desire to purchase it.

The experience of the United States since 1932 seems to have demonstrated the wisdom of these recommendations of the majority of the members of the Committee on the Costs of Medical Care. It would seem unwise at this time to substitute for these developments a system of compulsory health insurance by national law which would have the unfortunate tendency to freeze policies and eventually retard medical progress.

Hon. Chet Holifield, of California

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Congressman CHET HOLIFIELD, of California, has served the Nineteenth District of California as their United States Representative for the past 6 years. During that period of time he has risen to important standing on two of the most important committees of the House, the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy of the House and Senate.

The gentleman from California, CHET HOLIFIELD, not only votes right on the issues before the House, but he is a fighting, courageous, liberal who mixes in the floor debates without fear of reactionary opponents. As a true American and a liberal Democrat, he abhors and condemns communism, but he has not let fear of "witch hunters" and professional "Red baiters" scare him. He is one of the most vigorous defenders of the constitutional privileges and rights contained in the Bill of Rights. His fight against the abusive practices of the Committee on Un-American Activities, especially in their persecution of Dr. Condon has caused him to receive Nation-wide favorable publicity.

A Los Angeles metropolitan newspaper, the Daily News, recently carried a feature article on the gentleman from California, CHET HOLIFIELD. The article was written by Frank Rogers, their Washington correspondent. Under unanimous consent, I include it herewith as part of my remarks:

SINCERITY AND SUCCESS STAMP HOLIFIELD IN CONGRESS

(By Frank Rogers)

WASHINGTON, May 20.—Representative CHET HOLIFIELD'S 6 years in Congress have proven what a small-businessman with no political experience can do in Washington if he works hard and studies hard.

HOLIFIELD would probably be the last person to call himself a "self-made man," but his colleagues in the House of Representatives think of him just exactly that.

The Congressman, who is a Democrat, and who represents the East Los Angeles area and such communities as Montebello and Huntington Park, left a thriving haberdashery business in Montebello to run for Congress in 1942.

Just as he had built up his clothing-store business from nothing, so did he build up his reputation as a hard-working, energetic, and militant Congressman, whose willingness to debate important issues with the best of them is highly respected.

But the biggest reward HOLIFIELD has reaped from his hard work is the respected position he holds as a member of the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy. No sooner had the first A-bomb fallen on Hiroshima than HOLIFIELD, with characteristic forcefulness, decided that the bomb represented an issue with which Congress would have to deal intelligently.

He knew no more about splitting an atom, probably, than did the Hiroshima people who never knew what hit them. But he found out. He locked himself in his office for hours on end, reading everything there then was to read about the subject—becoming one of the first Congressmen to read the now famous Smyth report from cover to cover.

As a member of the House Military Affairs Committee he was able to interview top officers in the Army who were running the atomic show. He became one of the leaders of the successful opposition to allowing the Army to continue its control of the atomic-energy program—mostly because many of the most famous atomic scientists came to his office to plead for civilian control of this new Pandora's box.

HOLIFIELD's intensive study next paid off in a big way when President Truman named him as one of the few Congressmen on the President's Special Evaluation Committee on the Atomic Bomb Tests at Bikini in 1946.

His appointment to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy followed soon after the Eightieth Congress convened. Only 8 of the 435 Members of the House were selected for this choice committee. Representative CARL HINSHAW, of Pasadena, is another.

Representative HOLIFIELD almost never expresses his stand on an important issue by merely voting for or against it. He is always willing to debate the question, even when he knows he is part of a small minority.

His willingness to defend the liberal—and often the losing—cause has made him the object of both attack and applause by newspapers and public speakers far removed from his home district. But the record of the three elections in which he has participated indicates the folks at home are satisfied.

On his first time out, in 1942, HOLIFIELD was elected by a margin of 14,000 votes. Two years later his margin was 36,000, and in 1946, while the Republican tide was engulfing many of his Democratic colleague, HOLIFIELD was returned to office with nearly 50,000 votes to spare.

HOLIFIELD is probably one of those rare Members of Congress who finds that being a Member of the House of Representatives is not an ideal way to make a living, because it is possible to lose money at it. In his case, he must hire an executive to run his business while he is away; and like most California Congressmen, he finds it necessary to maintain two homes.

Congressmen get a travel allowance covering their trips to and from sessions, but with an election every 2 years, a business, and a family—in HOLIFIELD's case, four charming daughters—to divide one's attention and money, being a Congressman is no way to get rich quick.

Not that HOLIFIELD is complaining—he isn't. He regards himself as only another example of the kind of people the American system produces. He has virtually educated himself, built a successful business with money earned by his own hard work, raised a large family, and got himself elected and re-elected to Congress.

"All my life," he says, "I have had to depend on my own judgment. I think the people of my district expect me to use it in Washington."

His voting record is what the political experts call liberal. But he will leave the liberals when he thinks they are wrong—as witness his recent vote for the tidelands bill.

He is a bitter enemy of the tactics used by the House Committee on Un-American Activities, particularly in the case of Dr. E. U. Condon. While the majority of the present Congress is willing to give the committee anything it wants, in fear of being accused of making a gesture toward communism, HOLIFIELD bases his opposition on simple grounds.

He firmly believes Dr. Condon hasn't been given a fair trial—has, in fact, been given no trial at all, but has simply been accused. He has led the fight to force the committee to hold public hearings on the charges it has made against Condon; so far, he has lost that fight, but it hasn't stopped him from making it.

While a good many of his less militant liberal colleagues were simply lying low, or at most were doing no more than quietly voting against it, HOLIFIELD came out strongly against the Mundt-Nixon Communist-control bill. He felt this legislation endangered too many of the individual liberties which are part of the system which enabled him to have a successful and happy life.

In this regard, it was suggested to him recently that, in view of the nearness of the California election, it would be dangerous for him to vote at all on this issue, much less speak publicly on it.

"I didn't come back here just to get re-elected," he said. "I came back here to represent my people the way I think they want to be represented. I will not only vote against this bill, but I will work against it."

And he did.

Long-Range Bill for Agriculture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BEN F. JENSEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, members of the House Committee on Agriculture are now engaged in a conference with members of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, at the request of the Senate, on proposed legislation of the greatest importance to American agriculture and the Nation. Late Thursday night, with the least possible consideration, the Senate passed a bill which, if enacted, would not only bring about a major reorganization of the Department of Agriculture and a completly new system for handling the Nation's all-important farm programs, but would also revise sharply the parity-price formula.

The Senate bill provides that the support price of wheat, corn, and hogs be materially reduced, although curiously enough the Senate voted to make an exception of tobacco, which is a luxury. The level of price support for this crop would be held at 90 percent of its parity price. How would you explain this to the wheat, corn, and hog farmers of the country? Or the cotton farmers? Or the livestock producers?

In the very closing hours of the Eightieth Congress, the House is being asked to accept, without due consideration or study by the Members of this body, a major overhauling of the Nation's machinery and programs for agriculture. There is no opportunity whatever to find out what a majority of our constituents think of this legislation. It would be of the most vital importance to farmers—affecting their lives, their pocketbooks, and their future.

My district in Iowa is primarily an agricultural district, so I am personally very much interested in agriculture. While I am not a member of the Agriculture Committee, I have taken pains to follow the work of this committee and I have the greatest respect for its chairman, Mr. HOPE, Mr. HOEVEN, of Iowa, and the other distinguished members.

The House Agriculture Committee has been working hard for many months in preparation for long-range farm legislation. It has held literally scores of hearings in Washington and in all the major agricultural regions of the country over the past several years. It has invited to these hearings and listened to the first-hand opinions of hundreds of thousands of farmers. As the members here today recognize so well, agriculture is basic to the prosperity of our Nation. It has international as well as domestic aspects. What we do in the field of agriculture affects not only farmers and consumers but the Nation's industry and military strength as well.

To make a plain statement of fact, it would be most ill-advised to swiftly consider and pass sweeping farm legislation at this eleventh hour of the Eightieth Congress.

Chairman HOPE and the committee members have in my studied opinion wisely decided that an additional 6 months should be spent in refining and perfecting a bill in order that farmers and farm organizations may have sufficient time to study and determine fully a good, workable long-range farm program for America.

Instead of rushing to the floor hastily with their bills, the House committee recommended that we extend for a year the present farm program and full 90 percent of parity on basic farm crops. The House agreed with the committee earlier this week and passed H. R. 6248, which would accomplish this purpose.

Much as I am interested in seeing this House enact proper long-range farm legislation at an early date, I do not want to see us sacrifice quality and soundness for speed.

All Members of the House should have a full opportunity to give careful consideration and study to any legislative proposals of such far reaching and vital proportions as the bill passed on Thursday night by the Senate.

I introduced a year ago—H. R. 4417—covering the field of soil and water conservation known as a national land-policy bill.

I am pleased to say that Mr. HOPE and the Agriculture Committee have seen fit to give careful attention to my bill and use many of my proposals in their new measure. This new bill (H. R. 6054) is a more comprehensive piece of legislation. It has a great many other fine points in its favor, which I will not attempt to discuss now. But I will say that with some amendments H. R. 6054 would be one of the outstanding pieces of agricultural legislation ever enacted in the Nation's history.

Mr. HOPE, of Kansas, is one of the truly great agricultural statesmen of our time. We would all be remiss in our responsibilities, and it would be a disservice to the Nation, if we did not have the patience to see exactly what he is going to propose for our consideration early in the next Congress. We are confident that Mr. HOPE and his able committee members, all of whom represent farm States, will propose the best bill that can be devised.

The Judd Bill for Equality in Naturalization and Immigration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, before the close of this session I wish to call the attention of the Members of the House to the progress made by the legislation I introduced in January to end racial discrimination in our nationality and immigration laws. I wish also to pay a deserved tribute to the chairman, the Honorable FRANK FELLOWS, of Maine, and other members, of both parties, on his Subcommittee on Immigration and Naturalization. Through open hearings and in executive session they have given generously of their time and judgment in perfecting this bill, which has now been reported unanimously to the full Judiciary Committee. If it were not for the press of urgent business before us in these last days before adjournment, I am confident that a favorable report would be forthcoming from the Judiciary Committee, and that there would be prompt passage by the House.

The introductory paragraphs of the analysis prepared by the Department of State provide a condensed and accurate summary of the primary objectives of this bill:

> The real objective of the bill—stated in a few words—is to eliminate all racial barriers in existing naturalization laws and to make it possible for Asian and Pacific peoples to enter the United States as quota immigrants; and, yet, from a practical standpoint, to keep within a reasonable number those persons who may come to the United States.
> The bill retains all the essentials of the Immigration Act of 1924, as amended, and maintains the full intent of the national origins provisions of that act. It extends to the peoples of the other Asian and Pacific countries the opportunity to emigrate to the United States, as has been done by special legislation for the Chinese and to the peoples of India. The total number of such oriental peoples who would be admitted thereunder, however, would equal less than 1 percent of the sum of all the present quotas.

Quite naturally, I am disappointed that it has not been possible to bring this measure to a vote before the House in this session. Nevertheless, we have been able to bring this measure dealing with a technically complex subject to a high degree of perfection, and we have developed a comprehensive printed record covering every detail of the matter before us. This perfected bill, H. R. 6809, and this record should be of great value to the Eighty-first Congress. The legislation will be reintroduced at the beginning of the next session. We may hope that this whole matter may then be brought before the House without delay for the favorable consideration it deserves.

The period of time elapsing before the next session of Congress will provide opportunity for study of the impressive record printed at the direction of the House Committee on the Judiciary. I urge all of you who are interested in this subject to secure and study the hearings.

Passage of this measure not only will be an act of justice but of direct service to every proper American interest.

It does not befit the American sense of honor and equity that the parents of Japanese and Korean Americans who served with such distinction during World War II should be unable to gain the privileges of citizenship. These men and women have all lived here for a quarter of a century or more; they have made their full contribution to our economy and to our social institutions. They have been law abiding, zealous in educating their children, quick to respond to community needs. The evidence is overwhelming that they desire to assume the full responsibilities of citizenship. I believe, and I am sure you agree, that all persons who have come legally to these shores for permanent residence should be urged to become citizens. It is up to us to remove the barriers to their assuming that great obligation.

According to the United States census of 1940, there were legally resident in the United States and its Territories 84,658 aliens of Japanese descent, 3,139 of Korean descent, and 145 who were listed as Polynesians and "other Asians." They will be here till they die. They pay taxes. They are useful members of our society. They should be permitted to become full-fledged citizens.

There is very little I can add to the record concerning the wartime service of these people. During the hearings testimony was presented by such outstanding Americans as John J. McCloy, wartime Under Secretary of War, and Gen. Mark W. Clark. Speaking of the Four Hundred and Forty-second Infantry combat team, composed almost entirely of Japanese-Americans, General Clark wrote, in part:

> The supreme test of citizenship is the willingness of a man to risk his life so that our country may live.
> Under my command in Italy the Four Hundred and Forty-second Infantry Regiment and the One Hundredth Infantry Battalion, composed of Nisei, fought the Nazi combat forces with the valor and skill characteristic of the young Americans that they are.
> The parents of these heroic Nisei should have the privileges of the democracy their sons helped to preserve.

To this, Mr. McCloy added:

> I believe legislation such as this, at least as it affects the interests of the Japanese-Americans, is only an appropriate form of recognition for the loyalty which Japanese-Americans as a whole evidenced to this country during the war.

Concerning their record in the Pacific theater, Brig. Gen. Bonner Fellers, wrote:

> I have first-hand, intimate knowledge of the service rendered by the Nisei in General MacArthur's headquarters during operations against the Japanese. The loyalty of the Nisei was absolute, and their willingness to go to the front where capture, even their presence, meant risk of their lives. I have the highest regard for the Nisei and feel the United States owes them a debt of gratitude for the magnificent service which they rendered in the Pacific.

Mike Masaoka, himself a veteran of the Four Hundred and Forty-second, whom many of you know, brought the question down to the bed-rock desires of the largest group covered by this bill:

> I say this not to brag about our outfit—although I think it is an American trait to brag about a good outfit like that—but I say it simply to indicate that here you had a great number of American soldiers of Japanese ancestry who believed in America, who so believed in it that even though they were incarcerated in virtual prisons, they saw behind and beyond the barbed-wire fences; they saw beyond the watch-towers armed by armed MP's; they saw America, just and fair-minded, willing to give them and their parents a decent break.
> And that is why, even though they were suspect by their own Government, they went out and fought as well as they did.
> Amazingly enough, right in the fox holes before battle we would talk about a lot of things; but the No. 1 topic was this: Sure, we wanted America to win the war, but we also wanted America to be the kind of America that it professed to be, and that kind of America would not discriminate against people like my mother, who came here early in the 1900's. When she had 8 children, dad died leaving us practically penniless. Yet, my mother saw every one of us through school, a number of us through college, and when the test of supreme loyalty to this country came it was my mother who first said, "Boys, your job is to go out and fight for these United States, because it is my country."
> Well, there were lots of other mothers and fathers like that, and, as I say, their sons and I knew each other overseas, and over and over again they insisted that my job was to come and tell you, the Congress of the United States, what their loyalties were—loyalties which could not be questioned.
> I am very full on this subject. I could go and talk on and on, because I know these people (the noncitizen parents of the Nisei) as I say, and I wish I had the opportunity to tell you more about them. I am sure that no one can deny one fundamental fact. These people are Americans by every standard of conduct that you can think of except that of technically belonging.
> I, as an American soldier, fought, with the thousands, millions, of other American soldiers, for the right of all people to be recognized as individuals, and that is all we are asking, not to be judged or classified on the basis of race.

I plead with you not to make my promise to some of the boys overseas in vain. I can still remember them. On the field of war, on the field of battle, when race and nationality count for nothing and the worth of a man counts for everything, I think we children of these people who are ineligible for citizenship proved that we belonged. We now want our parents to belong.

Such is the record of devotion to America. America can do no less than to back their faith.

WEST COAST SUPPORT

Not the least impressive, during the open hearings, was the testimony of my colleagues from California, Congressmen BERTRAND W. GEARHART and GEORGE P. MILLER. Favoring resolutions, unanimously passed by the Board of Supervisors of Los Angeles County and of San Francisco city and county, were entered into the record. If before the war, our western friends had doubts concerning the loyalty of those of Japanese ancestry among them, their record has dispelled that doubt.

FOREIGN RELATIONS

In the sphere of American interests in the Far East, the testimony of the Department of State and of the Honorable Joseph C. Grew, former United States Ambassador to Japan, was clear and to the point.

In direct testimony, W. Walton Butterworth, Director, Office of Far Eastern Affairs, Department of State, noted that:

For many years the maintenance of normal friendly relations between the United States and oriental countries has been impeded by racial discrimination present in our immigration and naturalization laws. * * * Mr. JUDD's bill has the hearty endorsement of the Department of State. It very much hopes that Congress will act promptly so that it may be passed at this session, for it is of key importance to our relations with the great peoples of the Orient.

In support of this view, Ambassador Grew added:

I believe the present to be an exceptionally favorable time to take a step of this nature. * * * It seems to me to be the height of folly to ask the support of Democratic elements in these countries (Japan, Burma, Indonesia, and others), yet at the very point where our democracy comes to test, to back away. If we want to hold our friends, we must support them. The ending of exclusion now would provide concrete proof of American good faith at a time when it is most important that new leadership be oriented in our direction.

This measure brings nothing new to American policy. Twice in the past 5 years, the Congress has amended our immigration and nationality laws to extend to peoples of the Far East the privilege of naturalized citizenship and immigration to the United States under national origins quotas. The people of China were covered in 1943, those of India and the Philippine Islands in 1946. By these acts, the stigma of biological inferiority was removed from three-fourths of the 1,120,000,000 previously ineligible inhabitants of Asia, yet under the direct application of the national origins principle, as previously applied elsewhere in the world, authorized immigration from these countries was limited to 305 per year.

To extend this privilege to the rest of the peoples of Asia and of the Pacific Islands is just plain good sense. To do so will not change the quota law in any respect, but merely extend it. I believe in the quota law, and do not wish to change it; but I also believe that no decent person should be excluded from its application solely on the basis of his race or ancestry. Enactment of this measure will authorize the immigration of but a few hundred additional Far Eastern people in any year, but will do much to improve our relationships in that part of the world. To do so will be directly in the interest of the United States.

Editorial comment supporting this view has been found in the important newspapers of every section of the country. A typical example is that contained in the April 27 issue of the San Francisco Chronicle, with which I wish to close discussion of my bill to eliminate racial discrimination in American immigration and nationality law:

AN END TO RACIAL EXCLUSION

The American people are ready, from signs that appear here and there, to take the final step toward eliminating the last vestiges of racism from the laws governing immigration and naturalization of citizens. It is high time.

Endorsements of the Judd bill to abolsih racial exclusion, now being heard by a House Judiciary Subcommittee, indicate that support for it is widespread. Favorable testimony is coming from quarters that would have been in strong opposition 20 years ago. We are learning lessons.

The Judd bill, sponsored by the Minnesota Congressman who once was a missionary in China, puts all Asiatic and Pacific peoples on a quota basis for immigration, the same basis which applies to immigrants from Europe, Australasia, Africa, and the Western Hemisphere. It does for the Japanese, Koreans, Siamese, Samoans, and other Asiatic-Pacific peoples what the United States has already done for the Chinese, Filipinos, and Indians—lifts the color bar. The bill would admit about 185 Japanese annually and no more than 100 of each of 10 other nationalities. Thus it would add a trifling 1,185 at the maximum to the present yearly immigration totals.

Of greater importance numerically, the Judd bill would lift the bars against naturalization of ineligible aliens already residing in the United States. Most of these are Japanese, of course. By the last census there were 47,000 Japanese aliens on the mainland and 37,000 in Hawaii. Barred from citizenship because of racial origin, these alien Japanese are mostly elderly, having entered the country before the exclusion law of 1924. To enable them, and the Koreans, and the Polynesians, and all others now barred to take out citizenship papers would be a logical, consistent development of democratic practice. As an incidental result, it would clearly knock the props out from under the California alien land laws, which would be a very good thing.

Hawaii, as represented by its delegate to Congress, is strong for the Judd bill, and Hawaii's involvement with the results of such legislation would be greater than that of any State.

Congress should pay special heed in considering this question to the advice of Joseph C. Grew, former Ambassador to Japan. American relationships in the Far East, Grew warns, can never become entirely sound until this country eliminates the humiliation inflicted by our exclusion laws.

Just so, no one can say what part exclusion played in bringing about Pearl Harbor, but it was not negligible. And even with Pearl Harbor past and avenged, until we eliminate racial exclusion entirely we will continue to find the good name of the United States under a cloud, not only in the Orient, but in Europe, in the United Nations, and wherever our precepts are measured against our practices.

Rural-Urban Coordination

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, there have been many suggestions covering rural-urban coordination and I want to include the report of a plan of the Rural-Urban Coordinating Council by C. S. Hunsinger, rural coordinator, Flat Rock, Ohio:

RURAL-URBAN COORDINATING COUNCIL GETS RESULTS

(By C. S. Hunsinger, rural coordinator, Flat Rock, Ohio)

Since a rural trading area is a real asset to any city, its development is not only an opportunity, but a responsibility of municipal government.

The city of Bellevue, Ohio, has done much to solve this problem by extending as many of its public services and conveniences as possible to the five surrounding townships, and has named the resulting trade area "Greater Bellevue."

More than a hundred public projects have been accomplished during the past 5 years through the rural-urban coordinating council of Bellevue and the surrounding townships, an organization which has been sponsored by the rural people in their endeavor to secure the public comforts and conveniences of city life.

Contact between the vital and constructive forces of the city and country is the secret of an effective organization of this type. This has been brought about through five general committees: Government, education, religion, economic, and social. Through these committees, it is possible for the city officials to meet with any or all of the township trustees and county officials, either directly or through the rural and urban coordinators.

METHOD OF ORGANIZATION

In order to organize a rural-urban council, the chamber of commerce or a local service club invites to a public meeting of the trading area the presidents of township trustees and boards of education; superintendents of schools; president of parent-teacher associations; all pastors, heads of all farm bureaus and other cooperatives; managers of public utilities; masters of all Granges; 4-H Clubs' leaders, etc.

Such a meeting is usually not only composed of the most public-spirited and influential citizens, but each individual is authorized to represent his organization—which makes for a powerful group, working together for the development of its united community.

The sponsoring club also invites a corresponding group of organization representatives of the city to the meeting. This includes the mayor and president of council, the superintendent of schools, president of ministerial association, president of chamber of commerce, president of service club, and heads of any other groups whose support is practicable.

In the preliminary meeting, the plan is discussed from a general viewpoint and a list of possible public projects suggested, especially emphasizing some one popular project that is needed. After nominating a temporary chairman for each township or district, the representatives are asked to discuss the matter locally.

Each township chairman is then requested to call a public meeting of his local citizens with special invitations to the heads of all public organizations and to propose the organization of a township council, using a formal ballot in order that the council may be entirely legal and democratic. It is best for each township to organize separately, as it is generally necessary that public projects be acted upon by township trustees, boards of education, and in accordance with township boundaries.

PROJECTS ACCOMPLISHED

The following projects have actually been accomplished by the rural-urban coordinating council of Bellevue and surrounding townships and will show the possibilities in other areas:

Rationing boards: As Bellevue is located in the extreme corner of four counties in the northwestern part of the State, it has always presented problems for both the city and surrounding townships—rationing not the least among them. However, the council was influential in arranging that the Bellevue board serve the rural people directly thus eliminating the necessity of their driving anywhere from 15 to 20 miles to the various county seats.

Defense council: At the time of the organization of the Civilian Defense Council, the mayor certified the rural coordinator—of the rural-urban council—in charge of rural defense, thus enabling him to arrange for first-aid classes and fire and police protection.

Rural map and address system: Upon completion of the fire-protection contract, a map of the surrounding rural areas was drawn up. This showed the names of all farmers and gave the address and location of each farm, and has proved itself especially popular with business and professional men and the public utilities.

Public library service: The Bellevue Coordinating Council put through a library project which gave the rural people convenient and efficient library service in their shopping-center town. This was the first time in the State of Ohio that library funds were allocated over county lines.

Postwar planning: The Rural-Urban Coordinating Council has effected close cooperation between the various township trustees, boards of education, county officials, and the city government agencies. It has helped to iron out many corporation problems such as those of drainage, sewage disposal, and parking and zoning.

Fire protection: Ohio State laws have been amended in order to create a fire protection district, and definite contracts have been made between the city and each surrounding township.

Other projects: Cooperative hospitalization plans have benefited Bellevue's city hospital. A telephone project, which had been hanging fire for many years because of an unresolved question of boundary lines, has been completed and has benefited the residents of both the city and the country. The Rural-Urban Council has also been partly responsible for the reestablishment of a State highway patrol office.

Record of the Eightieth Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DONALD L. JACKSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Santa Monica (Calif.) Evening Outlook:

THE RECORD OF THE EIGHTIETH CONGRESS

Candidate Truman's charge that "this is the worst Congress we have had since the first one met" is childish propaganda which lays him wide open to crushing Republican retorts. For the fact is that this Eightieth Congress, now working overtime before adjournment, has a record of accomplishment which includes the most generous cooperation with the Democratic administration in the fields of foreign policy and national defense, and a demonstration of freedom from narrow partisanship, in approaching most issues, which has rarely been equaled by any Congress.

When this Congress was called to session the United States was on the defensive in foreign policy. The Republican majority, no less than Secretary Marshall, was determined to change that dangerous condition, and in so doing they truly put the national welfare and world recovery above party politics. As a result of their passage of bills carrying out foreign policy, including the monumental European recovery plan, this Nation now has the upper hand in Europe and other parts of the world and Russia has been placed on the defensive.

The congressional leadership of such Republicans as Senator VANDENBERG, in achieving this result, has shone particularly in contrast to the fumbling confusion of Mr. Truman, whose idea of leadership was to make two complete policy reversals in Palestine, with great damage to our prestige in the United Nations.

On the domestic front, the record of the Eightieth Congress has been no less constructive and valuable. For the first time in a generation, the principle was recognized and acted upon that the American people might be better off if the Government did not take so much of their money away from them. Tax reduction may not stand up in the face of extraordinary Government expenditures, but at least an important principle has been declared which should help to curb future Government extravagance, and which meanwhile has presented every American taxpayer with a measure of relief. The Congress cut Mr. Truman's budget in many departments, but probably less than it deserved. It appropriated too much for armaments, in response to Mr. Truman's phony war scare and the failure of the administration to bring about any over-all military planning upon which all the services could agree.

Of course, this session of Congress has made some mistakes and has occasionally played politics. It has dilly-dallied over important issues, such as the draft bill, universal military training, the reciprocal trade treaties, and the bill to admit displaced persons. But it seems likely that most of these measures will be disposed of before adjournment. The striking fact is that this Congress has shown a capacity to rise above politics, rare in American history and most extraordinary in an election year.

If this has been the worst Congress in our history, then Mr. Truman is our greatest genius. He really should be grateful, as a good American, for some of the things which this Congress has done.

Planned Economy and German Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAT ARNOLD
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Wall Street Journal of June 17, 1948, relative to the effects of a planned economy:

PLANNERS STILL WITH US

In yesterday's issue of this newspaper Mr. Evans wrote from Frankfurt how the planned economy administered by American occupation authorities in Germany has paralyzed German trade and industry.

Mr. Evans raises an interesting question: How does it happen that the United States with a free market economy operates in Germany a state monopoly as absolute—but apparently far less efficient—as any in any Soviet-controlled nation of eastern Europe? Mr. Evans suggests part of the answer is that in the early days of the "Morgenthauism" phase of the occupation the purpose was to hold down German production; the purpose is changed but the bureaucratic machine grinds on.

It is certainly true that once a Government policy has been implemented those charged with the implementation will carry on even after the reasons for the policy have ceased to exist; thus a set-up to restrict farm production will remain and even grow in a period when the crying need is for greater farm production.

But we suggest that the sheer momentum of a ponderous machine is not the sole answer in the case of Germany.

During the war and at its end, the devotees of a planned economy were in a powerful position in Washington. One has only to look at such arrangements as the International Monetary Fund to see what sort of a post war world these people contemplated; one where nations stepped along in response to the dictates of some world authority and where the citizen responded to the order of some powerful national authority. From the ranks of people with such philosophy came those who set up the occupation machinery in Germany and to some extent also that in Japan, and drew up the directives which the officers in immediate charge of the occupation were to follow.

It is exactly the same thing which plagues American foreign policy. At the end of the war Washington was filled with people absolutely sure that the centrally managed economy was the "wave of the future." Every encouragement was given to the sympathetic forces in Europe and every voice that was raised for a demobilization of war controls in Europe was "fascist." The result is a continent tied fast in a web of trade and currency restrictions.

It would be a mistake to suppose that the people who were originally responsible for these things have changed their loyalty or that they have completely lost the influence that would enable them to prevent a change in policy.

Recently the President of the United States has been traveling about the country futilely bleating a demand for a restoration of price and production controls. There must be among his advisers a group which still holds the hope of a return to a centrally regimented economy. Surely those who can so influence the President must also have enough influence to prevent the abandonment of occupation policies which make the people of Germany wonder whether after all the Russians are the greater of two evils.

Released Time for Religion Has Proved Its Worth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial that appeared in the Brooklyn (N. Y.) Eagle on June 18, 1948:

RELEASED TIME FOR RELIGION HAS PROVED ITS WORTH

In days when many minds are at work ferreting out solutions for the problem of youth and its frequent tendency to run wild, the need for religious training is often cited. It is very natural under the circumstances that Jews, Protestants, and Catholics should be concerned about the question of the so-called released time for religious training in the schools. Today there is some question as to the constitutionality of the State statute on released time. That it is constitutional is being argued in the supreme court in Albany by the Greater New York Coordinating Committee on Released Time of Jews, Protestants, and Catholics.

The Freethinkers Society contends in a suit against the State Commissioner of Education that the decision of the United States Supreme Court in a case in Illinois renders released time in this State unconstitutional. The argument of the committee for the three faiths points out that here religious education in the schools is not compulsory. And public funds are not used for it. Furthermore, it lays emphasis on the fact that in Illinois the religious instruction was given in the school buildings, whereas the law in this State does not make that provision.

Certainly it should be clear that a child should not be kept in ignorance of religion. It should be a part of his education, part of his right as a free citizen to learn of religion as he learns history and all the other phases of human knowledge with which he comes in contact during his school days, all designed to give him information that will enable him to make wise decisions for himself. His parents ought to allow him an open mind. But if they do not want him to receive religious instruction as part of his school work, they are free to say that he shall not. As is being pointed out, there is no compulsion.

The ideal of all systems of education must be to put the child in the way of knowing all, understanding all, and then, on the basis of his knowledge, making up his own mind. The dream of education is to prevent or, where it exists, cure ignorance.

Hon. Frank A. Mathews, Jr., of New Jersey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON CANFIELD
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, with the adjournment of the Eightieth Congress, one of the greatest friends and supporters of our country's veterans is retiring to private life, and I wish to take just a moment to pay my respects to him. I refer to my able and distinguished colleague from New Jersey, the Honorable FRANK A. MATHEWS, JR., who is not seeking reelection.

His service as a Member of the House of Representatives has been, I hope, but another milestone in an outstanding record of public service. He came to this body on November 6, 1945, after serving on the bench in New Jersey and as a deputy attorney general of our State. He has served in the military forces in two wars, coming up through the ranks from private to his present commission as a lieutenant colonel, which he now holds as a member of the Reserves. He has been New Jersey department commander of the American Legion, is the father of three sons who were in the armed forces during World War II, and is active in veterans' affairs and as a Reserve officer.

Few men are more familiar with veterans' problems, or have a greater interest in the welfare of our veterans, than FRANK MATHEWS, and veterans throughout the United States can be thankful that he has served here. A few days ago, as he steered two highly important pieces of veterans' legislation which he authored through the House, many Members paid tribute to his record, and I endorse and echo all that they said in compliment to him. Undoubtedly he will be best remembered in the coming years for his efforts in behalf of our veterans, but we will never forget his strength of character, his intellectual honesty, and his unwavering determination to stand by those principles in which he so strongly believes.

He will be sadly missed by us all, and by the country. It has been a privilege to serve with him, and through his service the country has benefited.

The Republican Record on Housing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK BUCHANAN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, because the housing bill recommended by the House Banking and Currency Committee for passage contained most of the major provisions of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill, the Republican leadership in the House of Representatives has refused to permit the democratic process to function. By parliamentary tricks and the imposition of gag rules, the Republican leadership of the House has decreed that the Members of the House shall not be allowed to vote on that bill or any bill like it. The Republican leadership has also decreed that no Member of the House shall be allowed to offer any amendments to the substitute bill which—stripped of all major features of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill—it jammed through the House in order to say to the people of this country, "We have passed a housing bill."

We need only to take a look at the record of the Republican leadership of the House to know that they cannot fool the American people by such shoddy tricks. One of the developments in the course of the hearings on the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill is a matter of considerable interest to the millions of just plain, ordinary American citizens who are personally concerned about housing, and what this Congress does with the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill. These millions of just plain, ordinary American citizens should be of more than just passing interest to the Members of the Congress. In this year of 1948, I would suppose that they would even be of some interest to the Republican leadership in the House, and to its representatives on the House Banking and Currency Committee.

Now in the course of the hearings on the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill, some of my distinguished colleagues on the Republican side of the aisle contended that, except perhaps for the extension of title VI of the National Housing Act, there was really nothing in the bill which would be of immediate help in meeting the housing emergency. Of course, when it was a question of extending rent control, they said that there really was not any housing emergency and we did not really need rent control; or at least it was no longer a critical housing emergency, and therefore we did not need very effective rent control.

But, they quickly took the shoe off that foot and put it on the other one when they got a different bill under consideration—a bill which offers a long-term program for the solution of our housing difficulties; a bill to help lift us out of a perpetual state of housing emergency. What happened then? Why, suddenly the House Republican leadership gives the order of the day, and these same Republicans execute a complete about face and say we have got on our hands a critical housing emergency, and we cannot waste time with any legislation that cannot be labeled "emergency housing legislation" in red letters 10 feet high.

I do not believe that the American people can be fooled by these tactics. Those members of the party which now is in control of the Congress who say we ought not to pass the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill because it will not be of help in meeting the present housing emergency do not want this legislation enacted at any time. Let me tell you what one of our colleagues has said about these tactics. I quote:

> The housing shortage throughout the country is now acute. A year from now it will be still more acute. Whenever a situation is acute there are those who want to deal with the problem solely through emergency measures. Generally, these are the same people who, before the situation becomes acute, say there is no need to do anything at all. They say that a long-term housing program is unnecessary when there is no housing emergency; and when there is a housing emergency they say that a long-term program is too late to be useful. * * * I agree that we are late with this program, but we cannot turn the clock back by further delay. * * * Those who suggest delay will undoubtedly reveal—that they do not want a long-term, well-rounded housing program at any time.

In view of the herculean efforts of the Republican leadership of the House to kill the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill, and any other legislation which embodies any features of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill, this must sound to many of you like a statement made yesterday. It was not. It was made more than 2½ years ago on November 27, 1945, when the Senate Banking and Currency Committee commenced hearings on the predecessor bill. It was made by a beloved and respected Democrat who, throughout his more than 20 consecutive years in the Congress, has placed the welfare of plain, ordinary American citizens ahead of special privileges for special interests. It was made by one of the three distinguished cosponsors of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill — the Honorable ROBERT F. WAGNER, the distinguished senior Senator from New York. Let us give him credit for his farsightedness.

After weeks of hearings on the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill, the Republican leadership of the House brought in a substitute bill. That bill we have now seen. It bore about as much resemblance to the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill as black to white. The Republican leadership of the House labored—albeit with the utmost reluctance—and, in truth, it brought forth the proverbial mouse.

The Republican leadership of the House now seeks to pass off on the people of this country, as comprehensive housing legislation, an anemic, little bill stripped of almost all of the essential features of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill which would be of real and lasting help and benefit to the American people. And if it had not been for the members of the Democratic Party on the Banking and Currency Committee, the Republican leadership would have gotten away with it the first time—they would have killed the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill in committee.

The Republican leadership in the House failed in its first efforts to kill the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill in the Banking and Currency Committee, but they did not stop there. The Republican leadership ordered its Rules Committee to kill the bill. The Republican leadership insisted on requiring the House to consider an anemic, little substitute bill, under a gag rule permitting no amendments. The Republican leadership is afraid of the voice of the people. They are afraid that, if a real housing bill reaches the floor of the House it will pass. They were afraid that if the House was even allowed to vote upon amendments to their anemic, little, substitute bill, it would emerge from the House in the form of a people's housing bill—the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill. So they denied the elected representatives of the people a right to vote a comprehensive housing bill which millions of just plain, ordinary American citizens want and need. The people of this country may now see how, if the Republican leaders in the House are to have their way, they will completely ignore one of our most pressing domestic problems.

I said, a few moments ago, that what this Congress does with the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill is of more than passing interest to millions of just plain, ordinary American citizens. I said that, in this year of 1948, these millions of just plain, ordinary American citizens would even be of some interest to the Republican leadership in the House. But when I take one look at the forlorn and emaciated little housing bill which the Republican leadership in the House jammed through as a substitute for the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill, it takes me back over the Republican record of the last 2 years when the Republican Party has been in full control of the legislative branch of the Government. And I must confess that perhaps I was in error. Even in 1948, these millions of just plain, ordinary American citizens—the unorganized citizens—are not of much interest to the Republican leadership in the House.

Take labor, for example. Oh, I can remember some pretty rough statements about labor that were made by my Republican friends on the other side of the aisle when the Taft-Hartley Act was being put through. I can remember that in December of last year the gentleman from New York [Mr. GWINN], a Republican member of the Education and Labor Committee, reported on his subcommittee's investigation of "restrictive, monopolistic, and racketeering" labor practices affecting the scarcity and high cost of housing. And labor unions and union labor got the full blame for the housing shortage. I can remember that the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. FOGARTY] called our attention to the matter. He said, and I quote from the RECORD of December 19, 1947:

> If you will take the time to read this report, you will find it contains nothing but vilification of every union leader in the entire country. He does not see fit in his entire statement to give one bit of credit to any labor organization or to any labor union representative in all the hearings that have been held by his committee.

I am not suggesting that this is unusual behavior on the part of our Republican friends on the other side of the aisle. On the contrary, back in 1944, the late Franklin D. Roosevelt indicated that it was to be expected. He said:

> We all know certain people who make it a practice to depreciate the accomplishments of labor—who even attack labor as unpatriotic. They keep this up usually for 3 years and 6 months. But then, for some strange reason, they change their tune—every 4 years—just before election day. When votes are at stake they suddenly discover that they really love labor and are eager to protect it from its old friends.

Another 3 years and 6 months have passed and, sure enough, it is happening again. We find one committee, under the leadership of a Republican Member from New York, blaming labor unions and union labor for all of our housing difficulties. Then we find a joint congressional committee on housing, under the leadership of another Republican Member from New York [Mr. GAMBLE], praising labor unions and union labor for the splendid job they are doing in helping to solve our housing difficulties. Last year, the Republican leadership was giving labor unions and union labor blame and condemnation in great gobs while it was jamming through the Taft-Hartley Act. This year all the Republican candidates are singing a loud chorus that labor unions and union labor are their dear, good friends, and promising to amend the Taft-Hartley Act in all directions.

I call attention to the 1944 Republican platform. It says: "The Republican Party is the historical champion of free labor." But the record suggests that, at one end or the other of that plank, there ought to be at least a sentence bearing, in very fine print, the words, "Every fourth year."

But what about these millions of just plain, ordinary American citizens—these unorganized citizens who are interested in what this Republican Congress does with the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill. Well, of course, that is a different matter. The Republican leadership in the House will not even have to bother about them every fourth year—they prefer to write it in the platform and then forget it.

I think some of these just plain, ordinary American citizens must be a little puzzled as to the statement of one of the leaders of the Republican Party—Senator TAFT—who says he is in favor of a specific, detailed Republican platform. He says that the Republicans have a record here in the Congress for the last 2 years and the people should know about it in detail. I agree 100 percent that they should, but I want to assure my good friends on the other side of the aisle that it will not be necessary for them to write the details of that record into the 1948 Republican platform to accomplish that desirable objective. I assure them that the Members on this side of the aisle share the stated desire of this leader of the Republican party that the people be fully informed of that record. And what the Republican leadership in the House has sought to do with the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill is part of that black record.

Now, this leader of the Republican Party is reported as saying that he has heard the usual talk among Republicans of adopting a short, readable platform outlining the general principles on which the party will stand in the November election, but he thinks the Republican platform should be specific. That is indeed interesting. There is an old saying that you ought never to mention the word "rope" in the house of a man who has been hanged. If I were a Republican, and should live for a thousand years, I would never mention the word "specific" in connection with the platform of the Republican Party. The 1944 Republican platform contained a statement as to where the Republican Party is supposed to stand today with respect to housing legislation. The 1944 Republican platform on housing said:

> We pledge our support of * * * the stimulation of State and local plans to provide decent low-cost housing properly financed by the Federal Housing Administration, or otherwise, when such housing cannot be supplied or financed by private sources.

Now, that is pretty specific. And what do you suppose has happened on that? Why, the Senate passed the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill which contains a number of additional Federal Housing Administration aids for the stimulation of housing. It also provides for some public aid to provide decent housing which cannot be supplied by private sources for low-income families, who, otherwise, must continue to live in slums or other inadequate housing.

Well, if the 1944 Republican platform promised anything, that is exactly what was promised. And that is exactly what the Republican leadership in the House is opposing. The Republican leadership in the House was widely quoted in the press as having decided that they would not handle this bill which would carry out the 1944 Republican platform promise to the people. The reported decision of the Republican leadership in the House to kill the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill in committee—to walk out on the 1944 platform promise of the Republican Party—was never denied. On the contrary, the bill which the Republican leadership put through the House and is now trying to pass off on the people of this country as a fraudulent substitute for the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill clearly confirms their decision to ignore the specific promise which the Republican Party made to the people. The Republican leadership in the House has flatly refused to carry out the party's promise. It wants to kill the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill and kill public housing and farm housing. But all of the Republican candidates are going before the people of the country and saying that they are in favor of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill, and that they are in favor of public housing.

Senator TAFT is one of the co-authors of the legislation. No one can have the slightest doubt as to where he stands on public housing and all the other provisions of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill. And he is quoted in the New York Times of April 23, 1948, as informing the voters—

> My policies are exactly those of the Republican majority in the Congress.

Maybe the Republican leadership in the House is still using the 1944 Republican platform.

Mr. Stassen, about whose availability for the Republican nomination there has not been one bit of uncertainty for 2 years, is quoted in the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette of June 3, 1948, as trumpeting for the immediate enactment of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill. Of course, Candidate Stassen has not had any responsibility during the last 2 years for making the record here in the Congress on which the Republican Party has to run. I suppose that accounts for his tremendous popularity among the Republican voters in Wisconsin and Nebraska.

As for Mr. Dewey, there can hardly be any question as to where he stands on the matter of public housing since he has supported the public housing program which New York State has undertaken to supplement, but not to supplant, the Federal program.

If Mr. VANDENBERG is to be a candidate, there is no question as to where he stands, since he voted for the public-housing provisions of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill.

So, here we have the same old story again of the Republican platform promising and the Republican candidates promising, while the Republican leadership in the House uses every parliamentary trick to bottle up the legislation necessary to carry out those promises.

Oh, I can hear the excuses coming. Our Republican friends on the other side of the aisle will say there is not time; it is late in the session; there are too many other important bills which must be handled.

If there is not time left to pass a bill so vitally important to the welfare of millions of plain, ordinary American citizens, they may well ask, Why?—Why, during the 2 years that the Republican Party has been in full control of the Congress, do we reach the end of the session with no time left to pass the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill? What have you done with your time?

There has been plenty of time for the Republican-controlled House to pass legislation to wreck the reciprocal-trade program and head back to the glorious Republican days of high tariffs and fat trusts.

There has been plenty of time for the Republican-controlled House to pass legislation to walk out on the European recovery program upon the success of which depends the welfare, and perhaps the lives, of millions of people.

There has been plenty of time for the Republican-controlled House to pass a tax reduction bill which, in terms of the income tax, gives 40 percent of the reduction to taxpayers with incomes over $5,000 and who constitute less than 5 percent of those who pay income taxes.

There has been plenty of time for the Republican-controlled House to pass the Rizley bill which would add millions of dollars to the cost of natural gas used by millions of these plain, ordinary American citizens.

There has been plenty of time for the Republican-controlled House to pass this kind of legislation. But, when it comes to legislation to improve the housing conditions and the welfare of the plain, ordinary American citizens, why the Republican leadership in the House has neither the time nor the stomach for that.

I said I did not believe that the American people can be fooled by these tactics. The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in America was not fooled by these tactics. At its meeting in Seattle a few days ago, it overwhelmingly put on record a formal resolution condemning the failure of the Republican-controlled Congress to enact this necessary housing legislation as a most shameful violation of common decency. The assembly also directed its division of social education and action to provide voting records of all Members of Congress on legislation about which they had expressed concern, and directed that those voting records be made a matter of study in individual churches prior to the November elections.

The record speaks for itself; the Republican Party has made its promises; the Republican candidates continue to make these same promises; legislation to carry out some of these promises is pending right here in the House. So far as Republican promises as to housing are concerned, the legislation necessary to carry them out is now waiting for action by the House. The Republican Party is in control of the House. The Republican leadership in the House failed once in its efforts to strip this legislation of the essential features which will benefit the American people. But it did not abandon its efforts to kill this housing legislation, or to strip it of all of the financing aid features. But by a gag rule prohibiting amendments, it finally succeeded in getting the diluted version through the House.

I will say to the Republican leadership in the House, "You can block the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill, or any housing bill which retains its essential features. You can deny the voice of the people of America of the right to be heard by denying to their elected representative the right to vote freely and openly on housing legislation which the people of this country need and want. You can do this, for the Republican Party is in full control of the House. But you cannot fool the American people in this way, and you cannot ever really kill the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill, because it is so necessary to the welfare of those millions of just plain, ordinary American citizens. And, like Banquo's ghost, it will return again and again to plague the conscience and the future of the Republican Party."

Parachutes for Airplanes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD O. McCOWEN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. McCOWEN. Mr. Speaker, the steadily increasing number of people being killed in airplane accidents would seem to require the attention of the Congress. The following telegram received by me today is well worth being inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for reading by all Members:

TRENTON, N. J., June 18, 1948.
Hon. EDWARD O. McCOWEN,
Washington, D. C.:

Again 43 people killed unnecessarily because of the recent President's Air Safety Board report condemning parachutes for air liners as impractical. Plane was in trouble at altitude of from 11,000 to 17,000 feet and could not descend in less than 5 to 8 minutes. If parachutes were available more than sufficient time was had to bail out all passengers safely. Board report said few persons know how to jump correctly. They knew how to jump at the Atlanta Hotel fire. Modern passenger parachutes require no instructions for use, opening is automatic. Report claimed there is seldom time before a crash. Those in the know say there was time in all recent DC–6 crashes and many others. Multitude of safety devices are fine but when all else fails parachutes are dependable. Let's put a stop to needless loss of life. Give the parachute a chance to prove its worth.

No More Partitioning of Palestine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, rumors are emanating from the British Foreign Office about an agreement made between the new British Ambassador to Washington, Sir Oliver Franks, and the State Department for another partitioning, a repartitioning of the small state of Israel, the territory of which has already been hacked to pieces by diplomatic knifework.

These rumors have been denied by both the State Department and the British Embassy. Let us hope that there is as little truth in them as the official statements claim there is. If they are merely trial balloons to test the American reaction they will never evolve into anything more. America has seen enough partitioning of other peoples' territories—in Ireland, in India, in Germany, and elsewhere.

Since the British took hold of Palestine some 30 years ago, they have managed to reduce the territory originally staked out for the Jews by more than four-fifths. They have taken away Transjordan, an integral part of the mandated territory, and set it up as a quasi-independent state under the puppet Abdullah. They have assiduously whipped up so-called Arab nationalism to a point where the United Nations could be persuaded to chop off even more of the territory allocated to the Jews. Obviously, there is a move on in some quarters to take away another portion of the land allocated to the state of Israel by the United Nations. These endeavors must halt at once.

This latest partition scheme, it appears, would separate the Negev region from Israel and give in return the western section of Galilee. Although the Negev is in large part now a desert, it is being settled and developed by Jewish pioneers who have made a garden out of the rest of western Palestine. It is capable of absorbing in time large numbers of the hundreds of thousands, clamoring to return to their homeland. To take away the Negev, after having lopped off Transjordan and given central Palestine to the Arabs, could be considered nothing but the rankest sort of discriminatory action against a government which the United States has recognized.

I trust that it is not for this infamous kind of secret manipulation that a truce has been won in the holy land. The truce has stopped the aggressor states of the Arab League in their murderous assault on Israel. If there is to be peace in Palestine it will not be brought about by demanding that the Israeli, who have been attacked, give up more of their territory to the invaders who have broken the peace.

It is my hope that our Secretary of State will use the time given him by the 4-week truce to bring about a decent and just solution which will eliminate the causes of friction rather than augment them. He should make it absolutely clear that the United States intends that the state of Israel shall survive and grow strong as an ally of western democracy.

This Congress Should Not Adjourn on June 19

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the second session of the Eightieth Congress should not adjourn on June 19. There is too much unfinished business before us, there are too many bills being legislated on through suspension of the rules, and the result is that we are passing measures with too little consideration being given to their full meaning.

We have done nothing at all to alleviate the high cost of living for the American people. We have passed a housing bill after 40 minutes of debate and under suspension of the rules, which will not be of much benefit to the little people of this country. We have ignored our responsibilities to the United Nations and we have failed to even consider the Russell bill to aid in developing our small mines. There is no real need for Members of the Congress to attend the national conventions because those of us who are delegates can be represented by our alternates. Our business is here and our job is to stay in session so that we may do what we can in the public interest. There are too many responsibilities confronting us and too many problems to solve.

If we have any sense of responsibility, if we are conscious of our obligations to the people who elected us, we will not close up shop and go home, but will stay until we have faced up to the responsibilities which are ours.

United States Debt to Ireland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Gaelic American:

TIME UNITED STATES BEGAN TO PAY ITS DEBT TO IRELAND

The failure of our Federal administration at Washington to furnish adequate and full supplies of fertilizer to Ireland; the failure to furnish adequate and ample agricultural and other machinery to Ireland, or, in the alternative, the means wherewith Ireland may obtain such machinery; the failure to furnish the means for Ireland to obtain adequate and even generous supplies of hard grains for the feeding of Ireland's present and potential livestock—this multiple failure, or set of outstanding failures, constitutes a very severe indictment against the present Democratic administration. When thoroughly understood, it is likely to cost the Democrats millions of votes in the coming Presidential election.

The actual fact is that Ireland has given to various countries of western Europe, and to the peoples of those countries, and at critical times, more foodstuffs and other help than we can ever repay.

The further fact is that Ireland produced these foodstuffs from lands already deprived of fertilization during many years. This was because commercial fertilizers were not then available.

The next fact is that Ireland wore out much of its agricultural and other machinery producing those foodstuffs. This was at a time when ordinary repairs for such machinery were out of the question.

The added fact is that during those times Ireland threw practically all of its hard grains, even to the hulls, into the production of flour for the feeding of human beings, and in consequence there was little grain left to feed to pigs, to fowl, to the small animal population which rapidly reproduces itself and thus furnishes a quick supply of human foodstuff.

Today every available cubic yard of barnyard manure is being spread on Irish soil, but this cannot restore the worn-out fertility quickly enough. Commercial fertilizers are needed. Today every available acre that can safely be tilled is being tilled, but in too many cases plows and harrows and tractors are needed. Today every pig and every hen that can be fed is being kept. But the bacon is soft, and the eggs have lost their old flavor. Hard grains are needed for the pigs in their mash and as scratch food for the hens of Ireland.

These are things that it may be hard to realize from behind mahogany desks in Washington, but friends of the Gaelic American are actually seeing them in Ireland, and they are writing us about them. If Ireland is to be of the great help to western Europe that Ireland can be, Ireland must have generous treatment immediately.

A year ago, on the 17th of March, Mr. DeValera rung the bell when he warned that unless the unnatural partition of Ireland was ended quickly, Ireland might very easily lose all that she had gained in the last hundred years.

Today, Mr. Costello and Mr. McBride, the minister for external affairs, and their associates, are meeting with the same irrevocable truths, and they are endeavoring to grapple with them. Hence, the 26-country portion of Ireland hesitates to accept a loan when it cannot see its way clearly as to the method of producing earnings wherewith to pay back that loan in dollars. And Ireland always has paid, both principal and interest.

As a hardheaded business proposition—how can Ireland operate on borrowed money when her opponents are given the money wherewith to beat her down?

The United States of America is not doing its duty in this matter, and, as American citizens and American taxpayers, we bluntly say so.

Ireland has given of her substance; Ireland has given of her blood; Ireland's sons and Ireland's daughters have given of their service through the generations.

It is time for our United States of America to begin to pay its debt to Ireland and to the Irish. President Washington, himself, acknowledged that debt.

It is time for President Truman to plainly instruct his State Department to stop pussyfooting on the Irish political issue. It is time for the President of the United States to tell Mr. Hoffman that he is not bound by the preconceived ideas of the State Department with respect to the economic needs of Ireland.

And if these things be not done, and done at once, it is time for our Congressman at Washington (the men with the power of the American purse)—and particularly those of them with Irish blood in their veins—to stand up, and to make themselves heard. Their voices and their votes can easily be emphatic, and persistent, and effectual.

Now, is the time for Ireland!

Hon. Virgil Chapman, of Kentucky

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN ALBERT WHITAKER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. WHITAKER. Mr. Speaker, with the adjournment of this Congress the House will lose—by voluntary retirement in order to stand for election to the United States Senate—one of its most able, valuable, and beloved Members, Congressman VIRGIL CHAPMAN, who has served longer in the National House of Representatives than any other Democratic Member from Kentucky.

VIRGIL CHAPMAN was born at Middleton, Simpson County, Ky. Simpson County was at one time a part of the great county of Logan, my home county. He is not only a lifelong friend of mine but it was my privilege also to know his father, James Virgil Chapman, who was an outstanding educator and a thoroughly substantial, constructive, and admirable citizen.

In the near 25 years that VIRGIL CHAPMAN has devoted to service as Representative of the Sixth Congressional District of Kentucky, he has made a splendid and enviable record, and on every count has proved himself an honest, intelligent, courageous, unselfish, and effective leader.

Is the South To Be Called Upon To Endure a Second Tragic Era?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN BELL WILLIAMS

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, under leave heretofore granted to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, and on behalf of the entire Mississippi delegation in both Houses of the Congress, I wish to include herewith an address delivered to the Mississippi State bar, at University, Miss., by Maj. W. Calvin Wells, a distinguished attorney and authority on constitutional government.

Many, even in the South, of the present generation do not begin to conceive of the iniquity and horror of the oppressions and humiliations imposed upon the South, beginning at the end of the Civil War in 1865 and extending up until 1877.

The name "Tragic Era," was coined in his book by that name, published in 1929, by one Claude G. Bowers, well known as a most distinguished historian. Therein he laid bare the infamy of the humiliation, robbery, and murder endured by the people of the South at the hands of the Negroes led by so-called scalawags and carpetbaggers. The scalawags were the people of the South who sold their souls for a mess of pottage and joined in the plundering of the helpless people of the South along with the Negroes then in power who were directed and guided by such scalawags and carpetbaggers—the latter being the northern people who came South to share in the plunder.

No one can conceive of the extent of such barbarities inflicted on the South during that period unlss he acquaints himself therewith—especially as shown in the book above referred to, Tragic Era.

In the preface of that book (p. vi) the following is found:

"I have sought to re-create the black and bloody drama of these years, to show the leaders of the fighting factions at close range, to picture the moving masses, both whites and blacks, in North and South, surging crazily under the influence of the poisonous propaganda on which they were fed.

"That the Southern people literally were put to the torture is vaguely understood, but even historians have shrunk from the unhappy task of showing us the torture chambers. Brutal men, inspired by personal ambition or party motives, assumed the pose of philanthropists and patriots, and thus deceived and misguided vast numbers of well-meaning people in the North."

The question which faces the South today is whether or not there shall be passed by the Congress of the United States the so-called civil rights bills, especially those three, to wit: (1) the misnamed Fair Employment Practice Act, popularly known as the FEPC; (2) the anti-poll-tax bill; and (3) the anti-lynching bill. If these infamous bills are passed, as surely as the night follows the day the South will be subjected to a Bureau, uncontrolled by the Courts, but with gestapo agents all through the South persecuting, imprisoning, fining, and humiliating the people of the South.

The fact that these bills are in palpable violation of the Constitution of the United States, as heretofore expressly held, as will hereinafter be shown, does not seem to deter those who, posing as philanthropists and patriots, are undertaking to secure the passage of those bills and thereby purchase the votes of those Negroes and Communists who, while a small minority of the people of the United States, in some States claim and perhaps hold the balance of power in the election of the officials both of the States and of the Nation.

If and should these bills be passed, and then finally approved by the Supreme Court as constitutional (which present Court has been condemned by an eminent Senator of the United States as being judicially dishonest), nevertheless the result would be just as much a purchase of the ballots of these minorities as was the purchase of votes in dollars and cents in the South, by which were corrupted the various legislatures and courts under the infamous reign existing during the tragic era.

It matters not that both the leaders of the Democratic Party and of the Republican Party, and the President now in power, are urging the passage of those laws. The fact remains that such laws are infamous, as will be hereinafter shown, and in palpable violation of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the past.

After the Civil War the Democratic Party in the North at least sympathized with the South while it suffered under the oppressions and tyranny then imposed on the South, and which were actually imposed on the South by the Republican Party then in power. And when finally the people of the North became convinced of the infamy being perpetrated on the South and elected a Democratic House of Representatives—ever since the people of the South have voted the Democratic ticket in gratitude for the assistance given them in that tragic time.

Now, however, with some three million Negroes having gone from the South to the North and been bought to desert the Republican Party and to vote the Democratic ticket in States where apparently the Negroes and Communists hold the balance of power, our Democratic brethren in the North have abandoned us of the South, thinking (as they had the reason to believe in the past) that the South would continue to vote the Democratic ticket in the coming elections, and that in fact the votes of the solid South are already in the bag for whoever shall be nominated as the Democratic candidates.

At long last, however, the South is in rebellion against this tyranny of those in control of the Democratic Party for the last few years. Since there has been placed in the platform of the Democratic Party the passage of these so-called civil-rights bills, and since a Democratic President has appointed a packed committee whose views he knew in advance would be in favor of the passage of those civil-rights bills, and that committee has brought in a report, just as the President thought it would, urging the passage of these bills—now, at last, as stated above, the South has rebelled.

None other than our own Fielding L. Wright, Governor of the State of Mississippi, has led in the revolt from this tyranny. Our two United States Senators, J. O. EASTLAND and JOHN C. STENNIS, have themselves, both on the floor of the Senate and before committees of the Congress and in the public press, declared that they, representing the State of Mississippi, and the State of Mississippi are in open revolt and that they will do every possible thing that they can do, legally and properly, to prevent the passage of these three infamous acts.

In the time allotted for this paper, it will be impossible to review and show up fully the infamy of these acts. Not only will these acts, if enacted and approved by the Supreme Court of the United States, bring a second tragic era to the South but such acts will finally make clear that the United States Government is no longer what it was intended to be, as set forth in the Constitution of the United States, which grants only limited powers to the Federal Government and which reserves all other powers to the States and to the people of the States.

Hereinafter will be set forth a demonstration of this statement of fact. The people of the United States, not only in the South but throughout the Union, would unquestionably defeat these measures if they understood the inevitable effect thereof. The greatness of the Government of the United States, as set forth in the Constitution, really was made evident and came to pass by the separation of the national powers ceded to the Federal Government from all other powers reserved to the States and to the people. As a result thereof, these local matters and customs and habits of the varying people in the great expanse of the United States could be preserved and local laws enacted. Thus, the customs and ideals of each State, though different from those of the other States, could be maintained, and the various sovereign States, when combined together, could make a great and happy nation.

At last, as hereinabove stated, not only have our Governor and our two United States Senators but also our seven able Representatives, to wit, WHITTINGTON, COLMER, ABERNETHY, WINSTEAD, RANKIN, WHITTEN, and WILLIAMS—and the grass-root peoples of the State—come to the parting of the ways with the Democratic Party because that party persists in its persecution of the South and because of its avowed intention of enforcing upon the South a second tragic era.

Up to this point in this address I have referred to the disastrous effect to be had on the people of the South, but, as I shall show hereinafter, while the South under these monstrous laws will suffer—especially under the FEPC—as the South suffered in the reconstruction days of 1866 to 1877, nevertheless, the South will not be the only sufferer—the whole of the peoples of the United States will likewise suffer in the loss of liberties.

The proponents of these measures who intend to destroy and humiliate the South will destroy the whole temple of the Government of the United States, and will pull down over their own heads the whole structure as heretofore contemplated and built up under the Constitution of the United States.

These proposed laws are in palpable violation of the Constitution of the United States as it now exists. No effort is being made to amend the Constitution in the manner and form as provided by the Constitution. Apparently the effort is to pass those laws in the face of and in defiance of previous decisions of the Court holding such acts absolutely void. Those Members of Congress who vote for such laws are violating their sworn oaths to uphold the Constitution.

Of course, if they succeed in the passage of those laws, and they are upheld as constitutional, then the bars are down, and the Congress of the United States can, under its supposed police powers or under the Interstate Commerce provisions of the Constitution, enact any law it sees fit.

Hereinafter I shall quote from some distinguished authors as to what will be the effect of such a palpable violation of the Constitution and the result thereof.

Let us consider first the anti-poll-tax bill. This bill, if enacted and sustained, would determine the qualifications or prohibition of qualifications requisite to be had by the electors or voters who would vote for Federal officers. It takes no great constitutional lawyer to show how this law contravenes the Constitution of the United States.

In section 2 of article I of the United States Constitution appears the following provision:

"1. The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legisture."

Of course, it is perfectly palpable that this section means that the qualifications provided by the State laws or State constitution as to who shall vote for members of the house of representatives of the State shall be the qualifications of the electors who will vote for the Members of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States.

Under the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States the same qualifications are prescribed for electors who will elect United States Senators.

Now, in Mississippi, what are the qualifications requisite for electors voting for the members of the House of Representatives of the State of Mississippi?

In the constitution of Mississippi some of those qualifications are given in sections 241, 242, and 244. In section 241 appears, among others, the following qualification, to wit:

"Every inhabitant of this State * * * who has paid on or before the 1st day of February of the year in which he shall offer to vote all poll taxes which may have been legally required of him and which he has had an opportunity of paying according to law for the two preceding years, and who shall produce to the officers holding the election satisfactory evidence that he has paid such taxes, is declared to be a qualified elector."

What could be plainer than that an elector of the State of Mississippi, qualified to vote for a State representative, must have paid his poll taxes as aforesaid?

Now, is there anything confusing or uncertain or ambiguous of requiring any master mind to understand what that means? No. It is perfectly clear that that qualification of paying poll taxes is one of the qualifications requisite for such electors, both as to State elections and as to Federal elections for Members of the Congress.

Now, this proposed anti-poll-tax bill undertakes to do away with this qualification requisite for the electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature; namely, the house of representatives.

Of course, an amendment could be offered to the Constitution of the United States in regular form provided for by that instrument—first to be voted for by two-thirds of both Houses of the Congress, and afterward to be voted for by three-fourths of the various States, and then inserted in the Constitution by the Congress of the United States. The manner of so doing is provided in article V of the Constitution of the United States, the substance of which is that above given.

The proponents of the anti-poll-tax bill know full well that no such amendment to the Constitution could be obtained. Therefore, they propose to effectuate their infamies by violating the Constitution. What is the Constitution between friends, especially if the question has to do in some way, directly or indirectly, with the suffrage of a Negro?

The poll-tax requirement in the Constitution of Mississippi applies equally to Negroes and whites, and every dollar of the poll tax so collected must go into the fund providing for the support of public schools.

While this section II, article I, above quoted needs no interpretation at the hands of any court, because it is so plain and unambiguous, nevertheless the Supreme Court has in several cases held it to mean exactly what it says, and especially in the case of Minor v. Happersett, 21 Wall. 162, 22 L. ed. 627, which held as follows:

"If the right of suffrage is one of the necessary privileges of a citizen of the United States, then the Constitution and laws of Missouri confining it to men are in violation of the Constitution of the United States, as amended, and consequently void. The direct question is, therefore, presented whether all citizens are necessarily voters.

"The Constitution does not define the privileges and immunities of citizens. For that definition we must look elsewhere. In this case we need not determine what they are, but only whether suffrage is necessarily one of them.

"It certainly is nowhere made so in express terms. The United States has no voters in the States of its own creation. The elective officers of the United States are all elected directly or indirectly by the voters. The Members of the House of Representatives are to be chosen by the people of the States, and the electors in each State must have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

To the same effect are the holdings in the cases of Ex parte Yarbrough (110 U. S. 651, 28 L. ed. 274, and Pope v. Williams (193 U. S. 621, 48 L. ed. 817).

As above stated, therefore, the provision in the constitution of Mississippi making the payment of a poll tax a prerequisite to the right of franchise, being applicable alike to both whites and Negroes, it is absolutely valid, binding, and controlling

A splendid argument in favor of the legality and propriety of the requirement of payment of a poll tax, and the illegality or unconstitutionality of the anti-poll-tax bill, was made by our own Senator JOHN C. STENNIS in the Senate of the United States. Limitation of time prevents me from quoting from his argument on the floor of the Senate on March 4, 1948.

Turning now to the proposed antilynching bill, it seems to me that the antilynching bill is the most absurd, fool effort at legislation that has ever been sought at the hands of the United States Senate. Of course, no right-thinking man approves of lynching, nor does he approve of murder, which is a form of lynching, nor does he approve of rape nor any of the other felonies. By the growth of an enlightened Christian conscience lynching has almost become a thing of the past. In 1946, there were six lynchings (more correctly two lynchings); in 1947 there was one lynching; and the number of those lynched has been so steadily declining as to reach practically the vanishing point. Every State in the Union has a law against lynching. But the Federal Government (having no general police powers, they being reserved to the States) has no right constitutionally to enact any antilynching bills. At the present time, when in every newspaper in the land, over every broadcast on the radio, in every magazine published from day to day, we are notified that the world is sitting on a powder keg, with fools brandishing around it, burning fagots, the Congress of the United States is now called upon to take the time of its 96 Senators and its 435 Members of the House of Representatives to undertake to pass an unconstitutional law to stop a practically nonexistent evil. Remember, too, that it has been made definitely known by the southern Senators that—call it filibuster or whatever it may be called—they will make every legal effort to prevent its passage.

On March 23, 1948, Senator CLYDE R. HOEY, of North Carolina, spoke over the Mutual Broadcasting System on the subject of the antilynching bill, in part as follows:

"Every good citizen in America is opposed to lynching. This is especially true in the South where every good citizen is not only passively against it, but affirmatively interested in doing something about it, and as a result of this vigorous and wholesome attitude lynching is now practically extinct. It has been out-lawed by public opinion and the people and the officials cooperate fully in an effort to completely stamp it out.

"The Tuskegee Institute says that 31 attempted or threatened lynchings were prevented last year by local and State officials and the public. This result could not have been achieved by any Federal statute.

"Every State in the Union has a strong law against lynching and these laws are better enforced than any other criminal statutes. Let's examine the record. In 1892 there were 255 lynchings in the United States—100 white and 155 colored. The crimes for which men were lynched ranged all the way from cattle stealing to murder and rape. Twenty-nine years later, in 1921, the number of lynchings had been reduced to 64. By 1935 the number was still further reduced to 20. And coming down to this decade the largest number in any one year was 6. In 1943, there were three lynchings; in 1944, two; in 1945, one; in 1946, six. As to those six lynchings in 1946, only two should be classed as lynchings, for four people in a car were waylaid and killed when they were driving from town to their homes in the country. That was a murder, rather than a lynching. In the year 1947 there was just one. There has not been a lynching in my State of North Carolina for 12 years.

"Think about it—out of 145,000,000 people in the United States, only one person was lynched last year. What other criminal statute, State or Federal, was so well obeyed? While there was only 1 lynching last year, there were over 13,000 murders; over 12,000 rapes; and over 1,500,000 of serious crimes, denominated as felonies, committed in the United States. That means that there was an average of 36 murders and 33 rapes every day last year, and 3 felonies every minute.

"Have you heard any demand from the Committee on Civil Rights that the Federal Government do anything about this—although many of these crimes were the most brutal and revolting ever committed in our land?

"Ten years ago the late great Senator William E. Borah, a sturdy defender of civil rights, said in discussing a proposed antilynch bill:

" 'When I read of the terrible things that happened in the South after the Civil War, I wonder now how the South has done such remarkable work in the way of recovery. * * * With all the hatred, the animosity, and the agony which came to the people, it is amazing to me that the crime of lynching has been gradually dying out. The people of the South have made a record of which they have a right to be proud. We could not improve upon what has been done. Why should we interfere now?'

"The proposals of the Civil Rights Committee invade the rights of every sovereign State in the Nation and would result in supplanting cooperative good will by coercive ill will in connection with our whole race relations. The passage of this measure would make the task more difficult and add immeasurably to the burden of every man in the South who is seeking to obtain equality of opportunity for the Negro race, and maintain fairness and justice for him in all the relations of life."

Senator JAMES O. EASTLAND, speaking in the Senate on March 9, 1948, offered certain amendments to the antilynching bill, which would put on the spot every Senator who undertakes to vote for this antilynching bill and then votes against these proposed amendments. In part, Senator EASTLAND spoke as follows:

"Mr. President, there is only one-thirtieth of 1 percent as many lynchings in this country as there are murders. The statistics show that in 1900 there were 115 lynchings; in 1910 there were 76; in 1920 there were 61; in 1930 there were 21; in 1940 there were 5; in 1944 there were 2; in 1945 there was only 1 lynching; in 1946 there were 6 lynchings, and in 1947 there was only 1 lynching. (Four of the six lynchings in 1946 were in truth just plain murders with no elements of a lynching therein.)

"There are practically no lynchings in this country, yet the Congress, at the darkest hour in the history of our country, is asked to take up days and weeks in an attempt to influence the votes of a minority group in the coming election by action on such a measure as the antilynching bill.

"The bill does not seek really to give protection to the people involved. What are the facts? In 1946, in the country as a whole, there were 8,444 cases of murder and manslaughter, 12,117 women were raped, there were 62,782 cases of robbery, there were 229,920 automobile thefts, there were 357,991 burglary cases, there were 941,738 larceny cases.

"Much of the agitation for a Federal antilynching act comes from the city of New York, and in that city, in 1946, 325 murders, 14,525 lesser felonies, and a total of 698 other crimes, were committed in that one city. These figures are for one city, and for 1 year. In the entire United States in 1946, with 140,000,000 people, there were only 6 lynchings (and, in fact, only 2, as above stated, can justly be termed lynchings). Yet no cry comes to us to give the people of the city of New York adequate police protection."

Recently there appeared in the Indianola Enterprise and in the Jackson Daily News a short, succinct article written by one of the most distinguished judges and lawyers in the State of Mississippi, Judge Frank E. Everett. This had to do with the constitutionality of these so-called civil-rights bills. By Judge Everett's permission I quote briefly from his article, as follows:

"TRUMAN'S PLANS ARE VIOLATIVE OF ORGANIC LAW

"First, Truman proposes in the Civil Rights Statute or Act to prohibit segregation of Negroes and whites in hotels, theaters, churches, schools, busses, railway coaches, etc., and to place the races—whites, Negroes, Chinese, Japs, and all—into one melting pot. And, second, he proposes to have a Federal statute creating a Fair Employment Practice Commission, by which a man in his individual business, would be subjected to a penalty by both a fine and a prison sentence if he refused to hire a Negro in his business instead of a white man.

"Mr. Truman knows that such an act would be unconstitutional, and has been so held by the Supreme Court of the United States, as well as the courts of many States.

"In March 1875, shortly after the surrender, while tempers were high and prejudices against the South were rampant in the Congress of the United States, just such a Civil Rights Act was passed by Congress, which was as follows:

" 'SEC. 1. That all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal emjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or waters, theaters and other public places of amusement—applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude.

" 'SEC. 2. That any person who shall violate the foregoing section by denying to any citizen, except for reasons of law applicable to citizens of every race and color, and regardless of any previous condition of servitude, the full enjoyment of any of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, or privileges in said section enumerated, or by aiding or inciting such denial, shall, for every such offense forfeit and pay the sum of $500 to the person aggrieved thereby to be recovered in an action of debt with full costs; and shall also, for every such offense, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $500, nor more than $1,000, or shall be imprisoned not less than 30 days nor more than 1 year.'

"Now that is the same act, in effect, that Mr. Truman would have the present Congress to reenact, except that Truman wants to go further. That, I will refer to later.

"Article 10 of the Constitution of the United States provides:

" 'The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the United States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.'

"Under the act of March 1875, above quoted, a number of cases were tried in various courts, seeking to enforce it and to force the white people to submit to its provisions by admitting Negroes to their theaters, hotels, trains, etc., which cases were brought by the United States, seeking to enforce its own congressional act. These cases were: United States v. Stanly, from the Federal Court of Kansas; United States v. Ryan, from the Federal Court of California; United States v. Nichols, from the Federal Court of Missouri; United States v. Singleton, from the Federal Court of New York; and Richard Robinson and wife, Sally, v. Memphis and Charleston Railway Co.

"The above cases all found their way into the Supreme Court of the United States and were grouped together and tried together as one, because they involved the identical question under the statute I have set out above. They are reported in 27 Law Edition, page 835, 109 United States, pages 8 to 62. The Stanly and Nichols cases were indictments for denying to Negroes the privilege and accommodations of hotels. The Ryan and Singleton cases were indictments for denying Negroes the rights and privileges of their theaters. The case of Robinson and his wife was against the Memphis & Charleston Railway for denying them the privilege of riding in the white-passenger car.

"The Supreme Court, in each of the above cases, held the statute above quoted under which these cases were tried, and which Truman now demands to be reenacted, to be wholly unconstitutional and in violation of amendment to the Constitution which denied to Congress the privilege of passing such a law. The Court said, speaking of article 10:

" 'It does not invest Congress with power to legislate upon subjects which are within the domain of State legislation. It does not authorize Congress to create a code of laws for the regulation of private rights.'

"In the case of Plessy v. Ferguson (163 U. S. 537, 41 L. Ed. 256), where Plessy, a Negro, took his seat in a white compartment of a train in New Orleans and refused to move into the colored car when ordered by the conductor, and who was arrested by a policeman and carried off to jail. When his case was to be heard he sued out an injunction against the court, alleging the law providing for separate coaches for Negroes and whites was unconstitutional. He lost—only one of the nine judges dissenting.

"In holding the segregation law constitutional, the Supreme Court of the United States, in discussing the various arguments in the case, said: 'If one race be inferior to the other socially, the Constitution of the United States cannot put them upon the same plane' (41 L. ed. 261).

"These cases were decided at a time when the Supreme Court of the United States was composed wholly of northern Republican judges. They were decided at a time when prejudice against the South was much greater than it is today."

At this point in my address I do not think it is out of place to quote Abraham Lincoln. In his speech delivered at Springfield, Ill., June 26, 1857, he spoke in part as follows:

"I will say, then, that I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of bringing about in any way the social and political equality of the white and black races—that I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of making voters or jurors of Negroes, nor of qualifying them to hold office, nor to intermarry with white people, and I will say in addition to this that there is a physical difference between the white and black races which I believe will forever forbid the two races living together on terms of social and political equality, and inasmuch as they cannot so live, while they do remain together there must be the position of superior and inferior, and I, as much as any other man, am in favor of having the superior position assigned to the white race."

The most monstrous of the proposed so-called civil rights bills is the misnamed FEPC—Fair Employment Practices Commission. I believe that that title has become so ridiculous and so obnoxious to fair play in all well-balanced minds that Senator IVES in his new bill has given it a new name—I have forgotten what it is—but it is the old monstrous effort to control every act of every citizen of the United States as to what he thinks in his mind when he employs or discharges a person.

Time will not permit me to quote verbatim herein from the magnificent arguments made by southern Senators against this iniquitous FEPC bill. For the most part, I will quote from able men who are not from the South, and who cannot, therefore, be charged as being partisan, biased, or prejudiced.

Surely, however, this address would be incomplete unless grateful reference be herein made to the determined, masterful address of the late Senator Theodore G. Bilbo, every word of which was directly in point, in his effort to defeat the enactment by the Congress of the FEPC bill. Call it filibuster—or what have you—it lasted for about a week—and largely was responsible, together with the efforts of other southern Senators, for the defeat at that time of that proposed infamous act.

At the beginning of the administration of President Franklin D. Roosevelt he called to his assistance a man whom he apparently considered one of the great lawyers of the country, and made him his confidant and adviser. This man was Donald R. Richberg, of New York. Afterward, Mr. Richberg became convinced that certain of President Roosevelt's programs were unconstitutional and unwise and he withdrew from this confidential relationship. On March 30, 1948, Mr. Richberg broadcast a talk on civil rights over the Mutual Broadcasting System. This address, together with the address on the same program by Raymond Moley, one of our most distinguished economists and public writers, are among the most logical and irrefutable arguments ever delivered against the enactment of these so-called civil-liberty laws. I would, that time permitted me, to give them to you in full in this paper. They are literally logically unanswerable.

When the FEPC bill (S. 101) was before the Senate, Senator BARKLEY, of Kentucky, the majority leader of the Democratic Party in the Senate, endorsed and supported the bill to the limit, and not a single northern Democrat took the floor against the bill and on the side of the South. However, a number of prominent Republicans strongly attacked the bill as unsound, unconstitutional, and without merit.

I shall quote briefly from a few of these:

Senator HAWKES, of New Jersey, according to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, February 1, 1946, page 712, spoke in part as follows:

"If I thought for one moment that fair employment practices could be established by law without a destruction of our American system of free enterprise, I would not be standing here discussing the subject today. My whole experience in life and what understanding I have of the Constitution of the United States, and the American method of making a living, which has grown up under the Constitution and has produced the highest living standards in the world, as well as the power to bring victory against our enemies who would destroy individual freedom, tell me in no mistakable terms that if we destroy by law the right of free choice in hiring, discharging, or promoting employees, it will be one more step in the destruction of our great American system of business and industry which is based upon ability to produce and sell in competition so that the ultimate consumer receives the benefit to which he is entitled.

"In my opinion, this controversial bill should never have been brought to the Senate at such a time as the present, when the world is on fire and there are so many more important problems awaiting the consideration and action of the great body, the United States Senate."

Likewise, Senator MOORE, according to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 5, 1946 (p. 889), I spoke in part as follows:

"Mr. President, I have just read the bill which is under consideration, and it seems to me that it would totally destroy inducement of any kind for any industry to try to function under it. Under the private-enterprise system, of course, private industry is operated for profit.

"Apropos of some of the objections which are made to the bill under consideration, without considering what may have been the practice of some employers with reference to the employment of members of certain races or creeds, the bill is so destructive of the freedom which is needed in private enterprise that it would practically destroy private enterprise."

In what was said to be one of the most masterly speeches ever delivered on the floor of the Senate, Senator MILLIKIN, of Colorado, as shown by CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, February 9, 1946 (pp. 1211–1214), spoke in part as follows, to wit:

"From the face of the bill I saw that almost every sentence of it is redolent of conceptions and procedures which in my judgment do not square with the American system of government, and therefore I voted against its present consideration.

"I shall always be glad that I did so, for if at any place in the procedures of the Senate I am given the opportunity of free choice of what shall come here, what shall stay here, how long it shall stay here, what consideration it shall receive while here, I expect to aline my vote against the possibility, remote as it may be, of the triumph of the kind of transparent viciousness that is concentrated and multiplied in this bill.

"The bill, with false proclamations, expands to the vanishing point the already grotesquely overexpanded commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

"Whatever may be said against discrimination because of race, creed, color, national origin, or ancestry, there is nothing in our history to give validity to what I submit is the real theory of the bill, that a citizen has the right to work because of his race, creed, color, national origin, or ancestry, or has the right to work for a particular employer. * * *

"What is the standard for determining a specific case of discrimination? The act is silent. It comes to this: Unless the ridiculous task of trying to create the composite man is undertaken on an arbitrary and automatic basis and independent of actual motive, we must run an inquest on the mind of the employer and also on the mind of the employee.

"And that to my mind is the most vulnerable and offensive part of the bill. How much blood must be spilled, how much hatred and discrimination must be accentuated, how much ugly human history must be endured and repeated before we learn law cannot and should not coerce conformity in human thinking. * * *

"This bill bludgeons the spirit of numerous provisions of our Federal Constitution. Its cavalier indifference to protective-venue provisions for the citizen is an example. Its failure to provide a jury trial for an alleged violator, its failure to provide the accused with the right to confront and cross-examine the witnesses against him, are others. Its nonexisting standards of admissible evidence is another example. The use of hearsay, ex parte affidavits, and unsworn statements are not precluded. And in this connection please do not forget that the use of such so-called evidence against a citizen is not without precedent among our Government agencies."

About this same time, Senator WILEY, of Wisconsin, according to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 8, 1946 (pp. 1130, 1131), spoke, in part, as follows:

"I oppose this bill—

"1. Because this bill is a misnomer, like so many other high-sounding New Deal quack bills. It would not create fair employment practices, but, rather, would stimulate unfair employment practices.

"2. This bill would create prejudice instead of ending it.

"3. This bill is one more example of the worship of legislation as a panacea.

"4. This bill would create a super gestapo in every corner of our land—a gestapo which would destroy the constitutional rights of American citizens, which would drain the Federal Treasury of needed revenue, which would make life miserable for countless employers, which would be a dangerous instrument in the hands of spiteful and vicious individuals and business competitors. This bill would be a dangerous instrument for statism. * * *

"Mr. President, many Senators charge that provisions of the bill go beyond and are in violation of constitutional powers, of rights secured to our people by our American Bill of Rights, and of the ethnos of our people and institutions.

"Mr. President, these charges are but some of the many leveled at the bill. If they are justified, they are an unanswerable indictment of the proposed legislation. I am persuaded of the substantial truth of these criticisms.

"Eut these particular arguments do not stand alone, nor are they the most persuasive.

"Mr. President, in most instances in which boards or commissions are established with regulatory and quasi-judicial powers, provision is made that they shall be bipartisan in person and character.

"This is sound policy and right principle. It respects our idea of checks and balances in government. It assures expression of divergent views, and contributes to right determinations. In the pending bill this principle is completely repudiated, and instead of bipartisanship, section 5 permits all five members of the Commission to be of one race, one creed, one religion, one ancestry, one political party. I believe this possibility challenges every principle asserted in behalf of the proposed legislation. If we are against the grant of such power, the reposing of such power in the Executive, why give it to the Executive?

"Mr. President, the bill declares to be an offense that which, in the overwhelming number of cases, can never be proved. Who can know that I refuse to hire, that I discharge, or that I discriminate against any person, because of his race, or creed, color, origin, or ancestry? My motive is locked within my own mind, and except in very rare instances, motive can never be proved.

"The bill declares its lost faith in the efforts of Christian generations to build a world of tolerance, of knowledge, of good will, and of brotherhood. It substitutes for the humane and kindly spirit of men the fear and the compulsion of law. Threat, dictation, compulsion of sword, or force of law have never aided man as he has struggled through the long centuries to make this a better and happier world for all mankind. This bill has not in it the sympathy and the warmth of the human heart. It must fail, therefore, of its professed purposes.

"Finally, Mr. President, the bill creates another huge agency of a central Government which seeks always, and always exercises, restrictive and tyrannical powers over the social, financial, industrial, and political lives of a people. Here in America, warning of the loss of a people's freedom is seen all along the way we travel. These clear trends must be stopped if our America is to be saved."

About the beginning of World War II a bunch of Negroes threatened the President of the United States that unless he issued an Executive order providing for abolition of segregation of whites from Negroes, they would have 100,000 Negroes organized to march on the city of Washington and demand that Congress pass FEPC legislation. Under this threat of trouble the President issued Executive orders creating that committee. From the very beginning of the organization of the Committee, and later of the Commission, the President or those under him stacked the officers and employees thereof with a majority of Negroes. At one time on this Commission there were employed 112 persons, of whom 64 were Negroes. In the Washington headquarters where the final authority was exercised there were 49 employed, of whom 38 were Negroes and 11 were white. In the Division of Field Operation there were three white people and six Negroes. In the Division of Review and Analysis there were two white and six Negroes. In the Division of Budget and Administration there were 11 Negroes and no whites. In the Division of Mail and Files there were six Negroes and no whites. In the Division of Law there were two Negroes and one white person. In the Division of Information there were two Negroes and no whites. And in the regional office at Washington, D. C., there were five Negroes and one white person.

From July 1, 1943, to May 31, 1944, about 61 percent of the complaints were Negro cases.

Thus, by a Federal Bureau staffed largely by members of minority groups, their duty was to sit in judgment on complaints made by those same minority groups. A Southern employer had about as much chance to have a fair and impartial hearing before this outfit as a snowball in hell. Moreover, in the House and Senate bill which were before the Seventy-ninth Congress to make the committee a permanent Federal bureau, all the old officers and employees hereinabove described were to be transferred to the new Fair Employment Practices Commission.

There were developed in a booklet prepared by this outfit definitions of discriminatory practices and procedures which were declared unlawful. Time does not permit me to give a description of the outrages which would be possible under the definitions prescribed in such regulations. Suffice it to say that if this bill is passed now, and those same or similar regulations are put in force, truly the second tragic era of the South will begin.

I wish I had time to give here the history of the infamy of some of the decisions of this outfit. I shall refer briefly to the Philadelphia Transit Co. case, which company had over 6,000 employees, all belonging to a union, and the relationship between the company and the union had been pleasant and amicable from the beginning. The existing contract between the employees and the company had been in force 8 years. However, during the war, on demand of certain Negroes, the FEPC procedeed against the company on its contract and demanded its cancellation. The company refused and the union refused. Then the employees belonging to the union struck against complying with the demands of the FEPC as to making Negroes motormen and conductors where before all had been white. No complaint had come from the Negro employees of the company. The whole initiative was taken by the Federal Government through this FEPC. When the strike took place the FEPC had the United States Army to come in with armored cars, tanks, small cannon, tommy guns, live ammunition, and soldiers with fixed bayonets. The strikers were all notified to return to work or be drafted into the military forces or be black-listed so that they could work nowhere else. The Attorney General of the United States convened a special grand jury to indict all of those employees for violation of a United States regulation. Of course, the strike was broken.

Time does not permit a statement as to the outrageous procedure in the United States Cartridge Co. case in St. Louis, Mo.

In those two cases, tyranny comparable only with communistic Russia or Nazi Germany took place, and both of them in the North. But with an army of gestapo agents sent into the South to pass on every motive each time we employ or discharge a Negro, imagine what a situation would exist here.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, just at the time of the preparation of this address, it appears that no one knows what a day will bring forth. At any time, Russia, by acts of aggression and war and murder may bring us into war with her. This, of course, God forbid. But whether war comes or not, is there not enough sober, sound judgment in the hearts and minds of the Members of Congress to prevent such chaos and confusion in our land as would inevitably ensue if and should these infamous, miscalled civil-rights bills be enacted in to law?

God grant to us such Members of Congress at such a time as this.

United States Foreign Policy—An Address by His Excellency Jan Ciechanowski, Former Polish Ambassador to the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN DAVIS LODGE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following citation and degree awarded on June 14, 1948, to Jan Ciechanowski, former Polish Ambassador to the United States. I include also the address made by the former Ambassador, because, while it is possible to resort to other means than those suggested by him for dealing with the international dilemma, this address is a remarkably forceful and eloquent exposition of the challenge facing the United States. It contains also brilliant and penetrating comments regarding the spiritual factors without which no economy—no civilization—can survive.

The president and faculty of Georgetown College to all unto whom these present letters may come, greetings in the Lord:

The great apostle of the new dispensation, St. Paul, teaches that the power which can conquer the world is faith. Hence, history recounts how stalwart men from time immemorial have stood erect with heads unbowed in evil times. Uncorrupted by victory they have not despaired in defeat. Such a figure stands before us today in the person of one who for long years, even from early manhood, served his native Poland with a dignity commensurate with the nobleness of the race from which he springs. Faithfulness and professional skill in the discharge of diplomatic duties culminated in his appointment as Ambassador to the United States. Throughout a career of resposibility and public service he touched nothing which he did not adorn and the testament of duty descended from sire to sons. For one of these gave his youthful life in combat in the skies above a hard-pressed England, that other men might live. What their country's annals exemplified, father and son fulfilled. Neither the shadow of death nor the threats of a despot's chains availed to terrify the soul of liberty. With the sword of spirit thereafter and with a heart unafraid this legate of wounded justice has not ceased to vindicate her cause by voice and pen and truth of argument, responsive to the faith of Christian Poland and the integrity of the law of nations. Although an alien master now exults in the victory achieved by force and fraud in his far-off native land, this man still holds her honor unstained and his own mind untainted by the wrong.

Wherefor, this venerable University of Georgetown, saluting the unforgotten Poland in this remembered son creates and proclaims Jan Ciechanowski, doctor of laws, honoris causa.

Done by virtue of the powers entrusted to us by the Congress of the United States, signed and sealed by our own hands at Washington, on the 14th day of June in the year of our Lord 1948.

LAWRENCE C. GORMAN, S. J.,
President.
CHARLES L. COOLAHAN, S. J.,
Secretary.

ADDRESS BY JAN CIECHANOWSKI

Your Excellency, most reverend archbishop, reverend president, members of the faculty, distinguished guests, my fellow graduates, ladies and gentlemen, it is my fervent hope that through my work in the future I may become more worthy of the honor conferred upon me today by Georgetown University.

In expressing my most sincere thanks to you, reverend president, and to the board of directors, for granting me this high distinction, may I add that I appreciate your gracious gift all the more on account of the close ties that bind me to this great university.

During my two diplomatic missions in Washington aggregating almost 9 years, in the course of which I had the honor of representing my country—Poland—in the United States in times of peace and war—I came to regard this distinguished seat of learning, of Catholic thought and philosophy, as a welcome source of inspiration, of kindly understanding for the problems and tribulations of Poland, and of personal encouragement at times when I needed it most.

Two of my sons were privileged to complete their academic studies here and one of them, who was too young to be on active service during the war, is a proud alumnus of Georgetown University.

In times like the present, the beneficial influence of our Georgetown alma mater will be particularly helpful to those who had the good fortune of studying and learning to think under its guidance.

Apart from the actual scientific knowledge which you, my fellow graduates, have acquired here, you have the invaluable advantage of the firm support of your faith in the doctrine of Christ and of the forceful logic of Catholic philosophy. You have been brought up to understand and to cherish individual freedom and the high principles of morality and justice which alone are the foundations of true democracy.

Armed with these advantages, you can fearlessly face the complicated trends of our modern world. You start out with your minds made up as far as the fundamentals of civilized living are concerned. Supported by your faith, you know that, however highly developed and nimble your brains may become, however great your capacity for constructive thought, you are but God's creatures, responsible to Him for the way in which you use and develop your God-given human qualities and talents.

Thus, you begin your lives without any moral or mental vacuum as regards the basic elements of understanding and logic. While eager to probe and to analyze every new theory, you will preserve your moral values and fundamental Christian principles untainted by godless doctrines set up by the pride, conceit or opportunism of men deprived of the stability of Christian faith and of sound thinking.

Never before has mankind been in greater need of a solid Christian foundation than at present, when it is faced by a world of bewildering tendencies and paradoxes.

After the United Nations' complete military victory over totalitarian imperialist aggression, the decks were cleared for a global peace of justice and security. Security was to be founded on the close collaboration of all United Nations under the leadership of the Big Three Powers, united by brotherhood-in-arms in an unprecedented total World War fought by western civilization in defense of Christianity, of the high principles of national and individual freedom, of democracy and justice.

The present world situation, the dangerous tension in Soviet-American relations, the definite partition of the world which was to have been a one world—into two worlds, one free, and one slave—constitutes today's grim reality. The primary responsibility for this lamentable state of affairs rests upon Communist Soviet Russia, who broke her pledges and succeeded in gaining a position of virtual diplomatic dictatorship in regard to the other powers and United Nations, with whom she had pledged herself to work in accordance with the principles of the Atlantic Charter and the "four freedoms."

But Soviet Russia could not have achieved her aims, had she not been encouraged to press her ever-growing demands by the appeasement policy of the victorious western powers and their readiness to sacrifice fundamental principles and aims as the price of Soviet friendship.

The present world situation proves that one may not with impunity traffic with principles, nor substitute cynical opportunism for true realism; that one cannot indefinitely mislead oneself and one's people for internal political or power-political purposes; that one cannot stop dynamic aggressive totalitarianism, be it Fascist or Communist, by appeasement or by tough words unsupported by effective power. Nor can one hope to keep up the pretense that Soviet Russia, the foremost totalitarian power, is a "somewhat more radical democracy."

While democratic propaganda thus labeled them, the Soviets, who played an outstanding part in defeating Hitler, were simultaneously assuming his succession and preparing their own bid for world domination. They had suddenly found themselves in the camp of democratic nations as a result of Hitler's double cross of Stalin, his partner in the first 2 years of the World War. Because they were so gallantly defending Russia against totalitarian German aggression, it was conveniently assumed by the western powers that they had wholeheartedly espoused the cause of democracy and adopted its principles.

In reality, the alliance between the democratic United Nations and totalitarian Soviet Russia was but a chance purely military alliance. It should have been regarded as a temporary wartime association. The German-Soviet conflict was in fact a separate war between two rival totalitarian systems for world hegemony.

Wishful thinking and opportunism, which had so lamentably failed in the case of Hitler, led the American Government to abandon its sound initial decision of not sanctioning any territorial changes during the war. The record has unfortunately shown that yielding on this fundamental point of American policy was a grave error, not only because it resulted in the loss of independence of Poland, Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania, already during the war, but especially because it opened a breach in the moral front of the western powers by making them give up the important principle of self-determination of nations, thus creating a dangerous precedent which made it increasingly difficult to oppose later Soviet demands.

Today's grim reality has not become clear even to arch-appeasers who so long persisted in trying to capture the favors of Stalin by concessions.

A more determined American policy to check Soviet-Communist expansion, has been outlined and is being gradually carried out. Its first act was the Truman doctrine of aid and support to Greece and Turkey, and the Marshall plan of assistance for rehabilitation to 16 western European countries and China. The second logical step is expressed in the discussions for the renewal of some form of selective service and the reestablishment of military preparedness. The third step foresees legislative measures for controlling and checking the subversive activities of the Soviet-led Communist "fifth column" in the United States. The Mundt-Nixon bill is the expression of this third step of the new policy. Its fourth step leads to the conclusion of some kind of military agreement between the United States and the western European nations—beneficiaries of the European recovery plan—for setting up military preparedness as a tangible deterrent to any further advance of Moscow-led communism.

The new policy is realistic and encouraging, and, if applied without hesitations and undue delay, it may still prevent armed conflict. It appears strong and definite, especially as compared to appeasement, to past illusions, hesitations and the weaknesses of a passive policy which patiently accepted Soviet-accomplished facts.

But even admitting that it will succeed in actually stopping further aggression by containing communism, it helps to perpetuate the present intolerable world situation.

It will not prevent the world from remaining half free and half slave.

Can our Christian civilization permanently tolerate a situation in which, with the tacit agreement of democratic powers, 11 countries with a joint population of 120,000,000, are Yalta-governed under the yoke of totalitarian communism?

A policy aimed at merely containing communism, even if successful, does not solve the problem of American and world security, nor can it restore peaceful international relations on a basis of mutual confidence. It will not allow the United States to reduce its vast program of rearmament. It will not permit the United States to relax in its military preparedness, nor will it allow the United States to reduce, let alone to stop, the flow of American financial and military assistance to western European nations and China.

It will not release the American taxpayer from the necessity of continuing to contribute to American and foreign armaments.

The present policy appears insufficient to restore to the war-weary and disillusioned nations of western Europe that sense of security without which the impulse to work out their own rehabilitation and to build up their resistance to external and internal Communist pressure cannot realistically be expected.

In fact, this policy does not sufficiently clearly guarantee security.

An American foreign policy firmly determined to insure American security and leadership cannot merely aim at checking and containing communism and Soviet expansion.

It will have to roll back Soviet communism to the prewar western boundary of Russia if it aims at the ultimate establishment of a really secure peace.

While the Soviets were confined within the legal boundaries of Russia from 1917 to 1939, communism made no progress in countries neighboring on Russia or in western Europe, nor especially in the Western Hemisphere.

Therefore, if communism is to be effectively stopped in its dynamic pressure and its dangerous infiltration, it will have to be checked not in western Germany, in France, in Italy, in Great Britain, Canada, the United States or in Latin America—where it has recently made such considerable progress—but on the eastern prewar boundaries of Estonia, Latvia, Poland, and Rumania.

This naturally raises the question: By what means, short of war, can such a policy be carried out?

The answer to this question is that in the present situation into which the world has been allowed to degenerate, there is no peaceful policy which could immediately reestablish a normal world on sound principles. But, all methods of persuasion having failed to convince the Soviets that international collaboration might be more profitable to them in the long run than their present ruthless drive for world domination, it is time to face them with a policy which would isolate them from the United Nations as a potential aggressor.

This can be done by reorganizing the United Nations regardless of the Soviet veto, even if this were to result in the withdrawal of the Soviets who have so far stalemated most of its vital activities.

If we are determined to restore security and gradually to rebuild a world in which mankind can live in peace and liberty, then it is illogical to pursue a policy which accepts the actual partition of the world, one which continues to aid and to abet totalitarian Communist domination in one part of the globe while actively defending freedom, justice, and a democratic concept of peace in the other.

Maintaining diplomatic relations with Soviet-imposed Communist puppet governments in eastern central European countries driven behind the iron curtain, was explained as the only practical means of obtaining continuous information about the trends in that region, of establishing some measure of collaboration and trade, and, possibly, saving some degree of independence for those nations.

None of these hopes have materialized.

As long as American policy persists in keeping up this parody of diplomatic relations with satellite suboffices of the Kremlin in countries now entirely Communist-controlled, while denouncing and actively opposing Communist infiltration and subversive activities in other countries—American prestige and the confidence of nations in American policies cannot be fully restored. It should be realized that in western Europe, strong Communist centers already exist and use their propaganda to weaken the local democratic elements by presenting American policy as one of indecision and duplicity.

The nations still outside the iron curtain, especially those of partitioned Europe, war weakened and deprived of their east European bread basket and mineral resources and mined by Communist fifth columns, may have to choose between an unwelcome Sovietic and a welcome American leadership. They can take the risk of opposing Soviet Communist pressure only if their democratic elements can definitely count on unequivocal American support and protection.

Their trust in American declarations was shaken by the fate of Allied Poland and of other countries now behind the iron curtain. Their confidence in the farsightedness and firmness of American policy was weakened by the Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam agreements, by persistent appeasement of Russia and by premature American disarmament.

Financial assistance and words of encouragement, unsupported by power and readiness to defend security and basic principles of policy by force if necessary, cannot balance the direct menace of armed Soviet power and of aggressive communism.

Failure to isolate the Soviets by taking the necessary measures to reform the veto ridden, now almost sterile and inoperative United Nations, is interpreted as a sign of weakness on the part of the United States.

In the present state of Soviet Russia's precarious extension over vast European territories inhabited by populations bitterly hostile to Soviet rule and communism, the Soviets are in no position to risk isolation and to be forced to leave the UN along with their satellites.

A policy of initiative which would unhesitatingly isolate the Soviets as a potential aggressor, would undoubtedly induce her to yield on some major points and eventually to withdraw from the eastern European countries which she now illegally holds and dominates.

However, a policy is judged not only on its merits, but also by the way in which it is carried out. Much time has elapsed since the Marshall plan was launched. Finally, some weeks ago, the sums for its application were voted and the appropriate machinery was set in motion. Long before the ECA was actually set up, the favorable stabilizing effect of this excellent plan on the western European countries became apparent. A first initial dividend was paid in advance in the form of the heartening results of political and municipal elections held last fall and last spring in Denmark, Switzerland, England, France, and Italy. However now, at this crucial moment of world tension, considerable cuts in the sums voted for the ERP have been decided upon by the competent committees of Congress.

Without permitting myself to express any opinion on the merits of the case, I would like to draw attention to the effect which this discouraging decision has produced in Europe. It is no exaggeration to say that it has shaken the democratic governments of nations, now engaged in a relentless struggle against their local Communist Parties and their anti-American propaganda.

It is useful to note these reactions which show how sensitive these nations have become to every word and gesture of the United States.

This does not only prove the great dependence of these countries on American leadership and material assistance; it also points to the vast responsibilities which this powerful democracy has assumed and shows that its leadership must be unwavering and its policy firmly determined if it is to become fully effective.

Communist activity and propaganda are organized by master brains and work with clockwork precision without ever missing any opportunity or any trick. The reaction to the Mundt-Nixon bill is an example of Communist organization and methods. The bill in question has aroused seething indignation and furious protests in the Communist and fellow-traveler camp. Their loud reaction has its humorous side. The Communists who so bitterly attack American institutions, the American way of life, and the Bill of Rights, and whose program aims at the overthrow of what they are pleased to call capitalist democracy—run to the protection of the Bill of Rights and the four freedoms as soon as they see any effective attempt at preventing them from carrying on their seditious activities.

After years of skillfully conducted propaganda, the Communist fifth column has succeeded in perverting the very meaning of words and in exercising a near terrorism which still appears to impress public opinion. By constant repetition that whoever criticizes the Soviets or tries to show that communism is not a form of liberalism—is a Fascist, a reactionary, and a war monger, a certain degree of intimidation and doubt has been injected into the minds of those who have not had the time or opportunity for closely studying the real tendencies of communism as opposed to true democracy. It is curious that reference is always made to the Fascists but rarely, if ever, to the Nazis, doubtless because of the former Soviet-Nazi partnership.

The Communists contend that the American Government, and especially the United States Congress, persecute them for their ideology. It is a convenient accusation, because it helps to mislead public opinion. If communism were but an ideology trying to gain converts on its merits, like any other political party, no democratically minded person would try to suppress it. It is being fought and opposed because it is not merely an ideology, but a doctrine which aims at destroying the basic elements of civilized human society, and especially because it is the ruthless instrument of policy of an imperialist totalitarian power which exclusively controls and directs it. It is not being combated as an ideology but as the Soviet fifth column, which it undoubtedly is, and as the international means of Soviet penetration for taking countries from within.

If the Communist system held any attraction and had nothing to conceal, would it have to surround itself for 30 years by an impenetrable wall, behind which it enforces slavery and suppresses the four freedoms, while professing outside that it is more democratic than democracy and more liberal than liberalism? If it had any attraction for Christian civilization, would it not have been adopted by some at least of the nations neighboring on Russia during those 30 years of its existence?

Would it not have made some progress in those countries, instead of having to be enforced by secret police methods, by murders, deportations, beating, and arrests?

In view of the curious misconceptions created by war and war propaganda, by expediency, wishful thinking, appeasement, and politics, it is time to readjust our way of thinking and to restate the basic foundations of our Christian and democratic principles.

It is time to revert to logical thinking and to discard sentimentalism and opportunism which befog true realism.

It is time to realize that our civilization is directly menaced and that our choice lies between its survival or surrender.

The Housing Bill

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Akron Beacon-Journal of June 16, 1948:

THE HOUSING BILL

There may be room for a difference of opinion over the merits of some of the provisions of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill.

But there could be no possible justification for refusal by the House Rules Committee to let the measure come to a vote on the floor of the House of Representatives. That danger exists, however.

The Republican leadership was surprised and displeased last week when the banking Committee over Chairman WOLCOTT'S opposition, approved the bill, including its provisions for public assistance to slum-clearance projects.

Senator TAFT, who was mainly responsible for Senate approval of the measure, has reminded his colleagues that it's going to be embarrassingly difficult to write a housing plank for the GOP platform if Congress has rejected his bill or has pigeonholed it.

On the other hand, Congress is under terrific pressure from the powerful real-estate lobby to kill the bill or emasculate it.

Our own view is that the bill ought to be passed. As a matter of long-range principle, we have agreed with Senator TAFT that some form of public assistance is needed to provide decent housing for people in the lowest income brackets—those for whom private interests can and will do nothing because there's no profit in it.

We have said that this ought to be deferred because of the inflationary boost that it might give all building costs. But if it is a question of passing the bill with public housing assistance included or passing nothing at all, we believe the bill should be passed. In that case, we would hope that an actual start of construction might be far enough off that the inflationary dangers would be minimized.

Other provisions of the bill, such as those extending Government insurance of private loans for home and rental building, are necessary if the momentum now finally being attained in the housing field is to be maintained.

Some Akron real-estate men have classified the Beacon Journal with Senator TAFT as being "too radical" on housing.

While we are always amused at the charge, we are anxious that their arguments be presented. Accordingly, we are printing at the bottom of this page a letter written last week to Senator BRICKER—and his reply. Mr. BRICKER, incidentally, differs sharply with his senior colleague on this issue. He voted against the T-E-W bill.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 17, 1948

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. ORVILLE ZIMMERMAN, late a Representative from the State of Missouri

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, the death of Congressman ORVILLE ZIMMERMAN removed from public life one of the most colorful figures of the Agriculture Committee of the House, and his passing was a sustained loss to the Nation.

He believed in America and in her destiny with a passion that was the touchstone of his life. Orville seemed to grow in stature with each succeeding year. I have enjoyed many pleasant relationships with Mr. ZIMMERMAN since coming to Congress 10 years ago. He was a public servant in a very broad sense—loyal and sincere in the discharge of his self-assumed obligations. ORVILLE ZIMMERMAN will be remembered for the gentle traits of character which endeared him to his friends.

To his devoted wife and son, Joe, may the precious memories you cherish of your life together and of Orville's unselfish devotion to the highest principles sustain you now and in the days to come.

"Homeward serenely he walked with God's benediction upon him."

The Minimum Wage and the Dignity of Human Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, when the Eightieth Congress came into session in January of 1947 it faced the accumulated legislative problems of 16 years accentuated by the deep dislocations following the most terrible war in history. Growing into that dislocation there arose and still exists the threat of a third world war. The first duty of the Congress has been to do all in its power to create the conditions for a permanent peace. The Eightieth Congress approached its major problem with courage and has acted with decision.

However, there remain certain domestic problems that bear on the happiness of the people of the United States. One of those problems is the minimum wage.

As a member of the Committee on Education and Labor, I have from the first been concerned about the establishment of a realistic minimum wage. The present minimum wage of 40 cents an hour is inadequate to make the minimum wage law effective. If we are to give force and effect to the principle of the minimum wage which has been established in our laws, the hourly rate should long ere this have been raised. In my opinion it should be at least 65 cents per hour.

As a member of the subcommittee that conducted hearings on the minimum wage, I had occasion to note the two lines of thought with regard to the principle. Those witnesses that appeared before our subcommittee who opposed the raising of the hourly rate were, it always turned out, really opposed to the principle of the minimum wage.

In questioning the many witnesses opposed to a raising of the rate, I always sought to ask a question of them as to whether or not in their opinion an employer had the right to pay as low a wage to an employee as he possibly could get by with. Many times I asked such witnesses whether they thought it was within the definition of freedom to permit an employer to pay less than a living wage—to pay, for example, a killing wage. Those witnesses who did not evade such a series of questions would reluctantly admit that an employer should have the right to pay less than a living wage and therefore a killing wage. Now in my opinion, an employer is entitled to keep down his costs by paying rates of wages not higher than the rate that he is obliged to pay having in mind market conditions. But, on the other hand, there is a point below which he should not be permitted to go. That point is the rate of the minimum wage. When an employer is purchasing labor from individuals and paying wages therefor, he is in a different position than when he is purchasing material to manufacture his product. There is difference between buying human labor and buying a ton of steel or coal or a load of wood. There is nothing wrong in buying steel, coal, and wood at the cheapest price possible as long as undue advantage is not taken of the seller. But steel and coal and wood that is purchased is essentially different than human labor.

When an employer contracts with a workman whereby the worker becomes obliged to furnish his labor and talents in behalf of his employer, such a workman dedicates to his employer his only ability to provide the means of livelihood for himself and his family. The worker has a duty to provide his own means of livelihood and also to provide for his family. That duty of the workman gives him fundamental rights—the right to expect from one who engages his working ability the means of making a livelihood.

Steel and coal and wood have no duties or rights to provide a livelihood for other steel or coal or wood. Steel and coal and wood can stand in piles and even be forgotten with impunity. They are dead matter. But human beings who are employed are not dead matter. They are living beings with reciprocal rights and duties. Employees cannot be treated as blind or dead matter. As human beings, they are entitled to expect from their employers sufficient to permit them to live as human beings.

The minimum wage must be raised to a point so that the employer will pay at least that amount that would be minimum to permit the employee to live as a human being.

It is true that presently most wages throughout the country are considerably in excess of what the minimum wage would be. But this does not do away with the necessity of raising the rate of the minimum wage to a point where it would have meaning. The present rate of the minimum wage must therefore be raised. The recognition of the principle of a realistic minimum wage is only the recognition of the difference between purchasing human labor as distinct from purchasing material for a product. When a business enterprise buys material for its product, there is nothing wrong with bargaining, without taking undue advantage, for the cheapest price the market will bear. But when a business enterprise buys human labor it engages the only ability that an employee has to furnish a livelihood for himself and family. Employers must recognize this distinction. A ton of steel has no rights or duties; a human being has. Upon this same principle also rests the duty of an employee to do an honest day's work for a decent wage.

The Canadian Alaska Railway and Development Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER R. JONES
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following information relative to the Canadian Alaska Railway and development project. There are two measures introduced in the House germane to this national defense project, namely, House Concurrent Resolution 214 and H. R. 6954. The importance of this project to the national defense of our Pacific coast area and the Territory of Alaska is well expressed in a telegram from the Cordova Alaska Chamber of Commerce which states in part—

This chamber vigorously supports the passage of your bill authorizing the building of the Alaska Canadian Railroad before Congress adjourns this session. This bill is most important to the development and national defense of the Territory.

PRIMARILY DEFENSE PROJECT

The construction of the transcontinental railway from Seattle, the Puget Sound region and Vancouver, British Columbia, to Fairbanks, Alaska, and 26 Mile Army Airport, is first and foremost a national defense project of the first order and importance, as the only means of hauling large tonnages of freight over this roughly 3,000 mile route in the necessary short period of time regardless of cost and with maximum reliability.

LOWEST COST TRANSPORTATION

However, the railroad is also justified because it will furnish this vital defense service at one-third the cost of the nearest competitor, and at the same time will make possible the associated and equally important program for the development of the region through which it passes with its rich and widely diversified natural resources.

BUILDING A NEW EMPIRE

The railroad and its associated development company will be responsible for building a vast new empire reaching across western Canada and Alaska, commencing at once and continuing at an accelerated rate, producing defense materials and aiding the security of the North American continent, and indirectly the entire Western Hemisphere, due to its strategic location.

EFFECT ON EXISTING ALASKA RAILROAD

The development of the region tributary to the Alaska Railroad and its eastward extension so as to make it economically independent, will make the present Alaska Railroad self-supporting due to the increased volume of business which will accrue as soon as the connection is made with the transcontinental systems serving all of North America.

PAST EXPERIENCE OF GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS

On the basis of past experience of the various departments of the Government, including the Defense Department as well as private industry in Alaska, involving the delivery of men, equipment, supplies, food and munitions in quantities demanded by war conditions, estimated to be from three to five times present shipments to the interior of Alaska, makes the railroad a necessity.

POPULATION AND INDUSTRY NEEDED FOR DEFENSE

Experiences of World War II have indicated that population, industry, and the other products of civilization are essential to the defense of any region. It is desired to have the present population of 100,000 in Alaska increased to 1,000,000 as rapidly as practicable by colonization. The development of the natural resources by a railway company in cooperation with the Department of the Interior, which has found success impossible in an isolated unit, will make it feasible to reduce freight and passenger rates over the present Alaska Railroad and its eastward extension sufficiently to enable settlers to make a living. In British Columbia the railway will actively cooperate with colonization agents from Ottawa and London for the purpose of assisting the British Government to transplant as many as possible of the 12,000,000 excess population on the British Isles over and above the maximum number which it is possible to support there. No doubt some of these also can be interested in settling in Alaska.

THREE-PART DEFENSE PROGRAM

To summarize the three distinct interests of the Department of Defense in the proposed railroad and development program, they are—

First. The railroad for its purely transportation capacity.

Second. The development program for the population and improvements which it will bring as an aid to defense.

Third. The strategic products which will be produced in Alaska and in British Columbia for wartime purposes.

In other words, the complete program involving the construction of the railroad proper and the affiliated development of natural resources together with the increase in population through colonization in both Alaska and western Canada are of immediate interest and importance from the defense angle. This is for the reason that entirely undeveloped and unpopulated country is difficult if not impossible of being successfully defended.

RAILROAD ROUTE

The main route for hauling freight and passengers from northwestern cities tributary to Seattle will be over the Great Northern main-line tracks and the Northern Pacific inland route to Vancouver, British Columbia. From Vancouver the tracks will be laid 42 miles to Squamish at the head of Howe Sound where the existing tracks of the provincially owned Pacific Great Eastern Railroad lead over the coast range of mountains to the Fraser River Valley 347 miles to the town of Quesnel, the present northern terminus. Present light rails will be replaced with standard heavy rails, and excessive grades and curvatures reduced to comply with main-line standards. From Quesnel the tracks will be extended, probably on the more favorable west side of the Fraser River to Prince George on the Canadian National Railway route from Edmonton to Prince Rupert, and about half way between those two cities. From Prince George the new railroad will be constructed 173 miles north up the Rocky Mountain trough to Finlay Forks and thence down the Peace River Valley, with one branch connecting with the existing Northern Alberta Railroad at Dawson Creek and the other at Hines Creek on opposite sides of the valley.

From Finlay Forks the main line will extend 172 miles north to Sifton Pass which is the north margin of stands of merchantable timber and also the north limit of sufficient existing freight business to enable private capital to finance the new construction work initially. From Sifton Pass the new route will follow down the Kachila and Liard Rivers to Watson Lake where it will cross the existing Alcan Highway from Edmonton to Fairbanks, built to serve Army air bases. From Watson Lake the route will follow up the Francis River to Pelly Pass and thence down the Pelly River to the point where a branch from the northeast called Ross River joins it. This has been designated the Pelly River crossing since it is here that the branch lines running southwest 175 miles to White Horse and the inland terminus of the existing White Pass and Yukon Railroad having a 3-foot gauge and connecting with Skagway, Alaska, and an arm of the Pacific Ocean; and a branch 350 miles long extending northeasterly to Norman near which the Imperial Oil Co. has 63 completed oil wells with 35,000,000 barrels of developed oil being held in reserve for defense needs. Here connection is also made with the Mackenzie River, Great Bear Lake, Great Slave Lake, and Slave and Athabasca River inland navigation systems.

It is 182 miles from Sifton Pass to the northern British Columbia border, 169 miles to Pelly Pass or the Arctic-Bering divide; 375 miles to Stewart River where the 80-mile branch line takes off for Dawson City and the Yukon River navigation system of use in the summer; 48 miles to the eastern Alaska border, thence continuing up the Ladue River and down the Tanana River Valley to 26-mile United States Army airport, a distance of 260 miles from the border; thence 26 miles to the city of Fairbanks, Alaska, where connection is made with the existing Alaska Railroad 358 miles north of Anchorage, Alaska, on Cook Inlet, a branch of the North Pacific Ocean, which never freezes over.

The above-described transcontinental railroad system and the 40-mile cut-off between Clinton about midway of the Pacific Great Eastern Railroad and Ashcroft on the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National railroads in the Fraser River Canyon, which will provide increased flexibility, will constitute a main line system 3,158 miles in length exclusive of 1 mile sidetracks for passing every 10 miles along the route, and exclusive of future extensions.

It is proposed to acquire and consolidate the Pacific Great Eastern Railroad and the Alaska Railroad, which is in process of being modernized, with the combined system. The White Pass & Yukon Railroad may also be acquired.

CAPITAL REQUIREMENTS

Based upon the survey information obtained the Corps of Engineers in 1942, and map distances along Peace River Valley and from Whitehorse to Norman, in advance of obtaining detailed survey information, the estimated construction costs of the main portions of the line together with their public and private financing sources are listed as follows:

	Private finance	Government finance
Vancouver to Sifton Pass and Peace River	$200,000,000
Sifton Pass to Fairbanks and Dawson City		$225,000,000
White Horse and Norman Branches		125,000,000
Rolling stock for entire project	125,000,000
Total construction cost, using standard 90-pound rails	325,000,000	350,000,000
Add for new shape 115-pound rails designed to avoid fractures	25,000,000	25,000,000
Total construction cost, using preferred 115-pound rails	350,000,000	375,000,000

Of the approximately one-half of the total capital investment proposed to be financed by the United States and Canadian Governments, it is anticipated that $100,000,000 would be a reasonable participation by Canada since the greater part of the total main line mileage of railroad lies in the Dominion and a large part of the resources development program also will be in Canada. If the Canadian treasury should be unable to furnish this amount in cash, it is believed that the Export-Import Bank would be willing to loan Canada her suggested proportion of the capital investment. This amortized over a period of years would not add materially to the Dominion budget annually.

REPAYMENT OF GOVERNMENTS' CAPITAL

Some Government officials are inclined to the belief that the Governments' capital investments for defense purposes would not necessarily be refunded. However, the railway company is willing to issue interest-bearing debentures to the Governments in the respective amounts of their investments with the understanding that during the defense period one-half the saving in freight and passenger transportation costs will be credited to the retirement of the debentures and that any remaining amount not so redeemed will be repaid by the railway company as earnings permit.

SAVING IN FREIGHT COSTS DUE TO RAILROAD

Based on 1947 tariffs, the combination steamship and Alaska Railroad average for carload lots was $69 per ton from Puget Sound ports to Fairbanks, Alaska. Based on the average charge of 1 cent per ton-mile for railroads in the United States and Canada during the year 1947, similar charges would be $19.55 per ton to Fairbanks, with an average starting point of one-third of freight at Vancouver, Prince George, and Finlay Forks, respectively. With present annual tonnage shipments the saving in freight charges alone would repay the total Governments' investment in between 5 and 6 years. Besides, more steamships would not help to develop the interior route which the railroad will follow and that is a vital factor even if steamship lines hauled freight free. It should be noted that the development program is expected to double the volume of freight hauled along the coast line by 1955 independent of present Government freight delivered along the coast which will not be disturbed by the railroad.

RELIABILITY

Train operation will be continuous through the 12 months of the year, but to make allowance for blizzards and other physical hazards it is assumed that it will be practicable to operate 90 percent of the time or 330 days per year. It would be impossible to approach this reliability of service with any other means of transportation. Experience of the last 2 years has indicated about 50 percent availability for the steamships due to labor troubles caused by subversive elements, which the railway brotherhoods have not experienced. In peacetimes there is a heavy loss of steamships and freight due to wrecks on rocky islands and on the North Pacific Ocean, which is very stormy. In wartime this loss is multiplied manyfold due to inability to obtain additional sea captains having experience in these waters. While admittedly there will be train wrecks, even though block signal systems and other modern safety measures are systematically employed, very little freight will actually be lost since most commodities will be reloaded on new cars and delivered with little loss or delay.

POSTDEFENSE PERIOD

When defense needs are over, not one cent of the railroad investment will be wasted in the transition to purely peacetime traffic of Government agencies and commerce. It is planned that during the intervening period the development program will be gaining momentum so that by the time defense traffic tapers off the total tonnage handled monthly will continue to increase unabated, thereby assuring the financial success of the project as a whole.

CONSTRUCTION PERIOD

The minimum construction period is 2 years and is predicated upon an early determination of the Government's policy so as to utilize fully the 1948 construction season. It also depends upon securing the use of large quantities of Government-owned grading and excavating equipment now located in Alaska, as well as such new construction equipment as can be purchased, and other equipment owned by large contractors who will be interested in taking suitable portions of the mileage which they can complete within the 2-year period.

About one-third of the steel rails and bridge steel will be purchased in Canada, thereby relieving the load on United States steel plants and mills to that extent.

ALASKA RAILROAD REHABILITATION

The present rehabilitation program for the Alaska Railroad would be carried to completion under Government appropriations as planned, so that modernization will bring annual maintenance and operation charges within current railroad practice and within the range which it will be possible for the Canadian-Alaska Railway Company to pay.

COMPLETE PROGRAM

At the present time, when economic conditions are considered propitious, the private financing has been predicated upon completing the entire railroad and development picture so that ample revenues can be accurately predicted from all sources, rather than leaving a part until a later period when additional private financing might be impracticable due to changed economic conditions. Maintaining estimated rail revenues with the very low rates contemplated are dependent upon the completion of the main lines to Fairbanks, Norman, and White Horse as listed. Unstable political conditions increasing throughout the world also indicate the earliest possible start on construction.

Floods in Columbia River Basin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WESLEY A. D'EWART
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Speaker, while considerable public notice has been attracted to the dramatic floods in the Columbia River Basin, a no less serious condition, though less widespread, has developed in the upper Missouri River Basin in my congressional district.

Unseasonably warm weather, rain in the mountains and rapidly melting snow in the past few weeks raised the Upper Missouri to flood stages and inundated several thousand acres in the vicinity of Great Falls, Mont. About 40,000 acres were under water along the Missouri southwest of Great Falls, and about 10,000 acres in the Sun River Valley. Many families were forced to leave their homes, and I am glad to report that the Red Cross and the Army were on hand to assist them.

It is fortunate that the Public Works Committee at my request a year ago authorized a study of the Sun River by the Army Corps of Engineers. Colonel E. H. Walter, the very able district engineer at Fort Peck, Mont., has scheduled a public hearing on this resolution in Great Falls on June 30. We are fortunate to have forseen the danger in the Sun River, and to have put the machinery in motion as we did a year before the floods struck. The public hearing at Great Falls should develop a great deal of worth-while information which will enable us to control future floods and to prevent further damage.

Meanwhile Government assistance is available in certain cases to repair local flood control structures, the RFC can assist individual farmers with disaster loans and we are going to do everything we can to recover quickly from this blow. I hope that in any legislation or any actions of Federal agencies intended to help the victims of this spring's floods, full recognition will be given to our problem in the Missouri Valley as well as to the Columbia Basin.

Appropriations for Foreign Relief

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN TABER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, in this final consideration of the appropriation for foreign relief, I would like to give the House a recapitulation of the situation. It has been discussed before but it will bear repetition. We have provided more than ample funds in the House bill for an efficient and business-like administration of the foreign-relief program. The estimates submitted to us include the following items which very manifestly are not needed:

First. To pay the debts of the beneficiary countries to the United States and its agencies, $288,000,000. This is a demoralizing policy and will only lead to the expectation of a forgiveness on the balance of the debt.

Second. Large items are carried for grain shipments to recipient countries at a time when crop reports submitted to us by the Department of Agriculture—appearing on pages 389 to 389c of our hearings—indicate that those nations will have, in most cases, enough grain to take care of their needs. The Department of Agriculture stated on the 12th of this month at New Brunswick, N. J., through Nathan Koenig, assistant to the Secretary of Agriculture that shipments would be reduced 20 percent on July 1, 1948. In the justifications, however, it was indicated that more grain would be shipped in the next fiscal year than had been shipped in this. The saving resulting from a realistic consideration of this item will amount to more than $300,000,000.

Third. The program calls for shipping tobacco to the tune of $110,000,000. In the words of Senator CONNALLY, "When did tobacco become an edible item?"

Fourth. If the House bill is followed, the saving on farm machinery and tractors would be $30,000,000.

Fifth. On trucks, which they can manufacture in sufficient quantities themselves, the savings would be at least $50,000,000.

Sixth. If the amount of cotton shipped overseas is restricted to what can be used judiciously, the saving would be $170,000,000.

Seventh. If Mr. Paul Hoffman and Under Secretary of the Army, Mr. William Draper, will cooperate with the American experts on steel production who are available for conference on these matters, steel production in Germany can be stepped up to 1,000,000 tons a month and we can save $327,000,000.

These items make a total of $1,275,000,000.

Those are just a few of the very obvious savings which can be made in the interest of prudent administration. There are probably six hundred to eight hundred million dollars of loose items that are not specified that should provide a field for saving without impairing the purposes of the program.

Our critics have never intimated that they had any idea of what the money might be used for specifically. They prefer to talk in generalities. But this is too vast an outlay to appropriate in a hit-or-miss fashion. The House funds are ample to provide an honest and efficient administration.

One of the most devastating blows at the ultimate effectiveness of the ECA program was struck when Donald Stone was transferred from the Bureau of the Budget and placed in charge of administration activities. We, in the Appropriations Committee, are well acquainted with Mr. Stone, and his penchant for increased budgets and increased spending. In all the years he has appeared before us I cannot remember him making a constructive contribution to the efficient administration and management of any governmental agency.

Then followed the appointments of Mr. Averell Harriman and Mr. William Foster, neither one of whom gave the Department of Commerce a competent administration and who shielded and kept on the pay roll some of the more obnoxious Wallace appointees.

On May 26 Mr. Paul Hoffman announced the appointment of Virgil L. Couch as director of personnel. Assisting Mr. Couch in selecting the staff of this new agency is Samuel S. Board. Both these men have the same background. Both are graduates of the Farm Security Administration and the Resettlement Administration under Rexford Guy Tugwell and Calvin B. Baldwin, better known as "Beany" Baldwin. So that you may fully understand these implications, "Beany" Baldwin is currently the manager of Henry Wallace's Presidential campaign.

Now the question revolves itself as to who is running ECA? Is Paul Hoffman doing so or is "Beany" Baldwin running it by remote control?

Such a personnel situation as I have described would make any intelligent, honest American distrustful of the whole enterprise. The only hope we have now for the successful administration of this agency is for the Congress to keep the appropriation at a figure which will force these people to curb their fancies, and put the demand for a prudent administration squarely up to Mr. Hoffman.

Under the circumstances, there is no justification for the Congress to give this organization license for unbridled spending. It would be a grave injustice to the people of this country; it would bring about the ultimate destruction of the program itself.

The Atom on the Farm

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, atomic energy is generally considered from the standpoint of military use and many people have little or no idea of the vast effort being directed to make the atom beneficial to mankind.

Among the various phases of atomic energy research, the field of agriculture presents an interesting chapter.

Several million dollars a year are being spent on atomic energy research in agriculture, and every farmer in America, by paying taxes, is a contributor to this vast sum. He, therefore, has a right, as does every other American, to know how this money is being used. He has the right to expect some return on this money which will benefit him either directly or indirectly, and he also has the right to know what is being done to make such a return a reality.

In agriculture, the use of radioisotopes, which are atomic energy byproducts, is expected to provide future dividends for the farmer. These radioactive elements are variations of common elements, such as phosphorus, calcium, and sulfur, and they differ from them in only one respect. As they disintegrate they give off alpha, beta, or gamma rays at a rate that is characteristic of the element and their radioactivity can be detected accurately with an electronic detecting device, even in the most minute quantity. An infinitesimal amount of any one of these elements can be followed through a complicated series of actions in all kinds of biological, chemical, and physical processes. For example, if we are interested in the way phosphates behave in the soil and how they are utilized by plants, their movements can be traced from the soil into the root system and on into the plants, the leaves, and fruit. The introduction of small quantities of a radioactive element into the soil makes it possible to follow the element as though it were a microscope peering into the inner recesses of the plant's system. The use of radioisotopes enables the research worker to probe deeply into the processes by which plants develop through absorption of food and water.

For more than a year the United States Department of Agriculture, Bureau of Plant Industry, Division of Soils and Agricultural Engineering and several cooperating State agricultural experiment stations have been conducting extensive tests with radioactive phosphorus to study the action of phosphate fertilizers in the soil. It is important to understand that through these tests agricultural scientists will be able to learn how various crops utilize materials in the soil as food. The knowledge thus gained can then be applied to the manufacture of fertilizers of proper composition suited to the needs of individual crops. It also will be possible to understand how such manufactured plant food should be applied to gain maximum utilization on specific crops.

The experiments under way at Department of Agriculture test stations are expected to bring about changes in the production of fertilizer and its use, but it is important to realize that the use of radioactive materials does not enhance the fertilizer. Radioactive materials are used only in research and will not be incorporated in commercial fertilizer.

In 1947 preliminary experiments were conducted with radiophosphorus which indicated that different crops utilize phosphate fertilizers in different ways. Tests were conducted with corn, cotton, and tobacco grown on the same soil which contained 71 pounds of readily available phosphate. They were treated with fertilizer containing 80 pounds of phosphoric acid which was placed in bands. When the plants were first sampled, during initial growth, it was learned that 65 percent of the phosphorus in the corn and tobacco was from the fertilizer. A sampling of the cotton at the same time indicated that only 45 percent of the phosphorus was from the fertilizer. Another sampling of the plants at maturity was made and it was discovered that the fertilizer phosphorus in the cotton and tobacco was 35 to 45 percent, respectively, whereas only 15 percent of the phosphorus in the corn came from the applied fertilizer.

In 1947, cotton was grown also on soil containing 140 and 216 pounds of readily available phosphorus. The cotton grown on the least fertile soil derived 30 percent of its phosphorus from fertilizer, whereas only 7 percent of the fertilizer phosphorus was utilized by the cotton on the most fertile soil.

Field trials with potatoes were also made in 1947. Two rates of fertilization were used and the results of the experiments showed that increasing the rate of phosphate fertilization substantially increased the proportion of fertilizer phosphorus in the potatoes as in cotton and tobacco.

The significance of the 1947 preliminary trials was very encouraging to the Bureau and it is continuing experiments with phosphorus in 1948. Present tests are being made to: First, compare the relative effectiveness of different sources of phosphate material; second, demonstrate the relative effectiveness of different placements of fertilizer; third, establish possible relationships between growth responses and uptake of phosphorus by plants; and fourth, indicate the differences between crops in the utilization of native and applied phosphates. The 1947 experiments were conducted in North Carolina, but in order to give comparisons on many different soil types, the 1948 tests are being made in Colorado, Iowa, New York, North Carolina, and Georgia on 12 different crops. The soil types will be representative of the Eastern, Midwestern, and Western States.

The crops being covered in the 1948 experiments are: Soybeans, potatoes, cotton, corn, tobacco, pasture vegetation, oats, clover, sugar beets, and alfalfa seeded with barley. Utilization by plants of phosphorus in green manures and the differential response of corn hybrids to phosphate fertilization will also be studied. Soil types to be utilized are: Bayboro loam of both low and high phosphate rating; Norfolk sandy loam of medium and low phosphate rating; sandy loam soil with varying percentages of phosphate, with or without high lime; Cecil clay loam; sassafras silt loam with low and medium phosphorus levels; Mardin silt loam with low phosphorus fertility; and Clarion loam low and Clarion loam medium with available phosphorus.

In order that there will be conformity and control of the radioactive fertilizers used in its many field plots, the Division of Soils of the Bureau of Plant Industry has assumed the responsibility of the preparation of all materials for the field investigations.

The Bureau of Plant Industry will not speculate at this time on what effect such differences as indicated in early tests will have on fertilizer production and use, but it is continuing its experiments in order that it may check and double check its findings on many soil types with a variety of crops.

At the conclusion of each experiment, the Bureau of Plant Industry and the cooperating States critically evaluate the results to determine the validity of the interpretations presented by the study, the value of each program, and the direction indicated for further work. When substantial information becomes available, it may be that research involving the use of radioactive elements will improve present methods of fertilizing farm land. The value of the experiments cannot be overestimated and, in the long run, the value to the farmer may be inestimable.

Many other agricultural experiments are in progress at research institutions throughout the United States. For example, at Ohio Agricultural Experiment Station, Wooster, Ohio, radiophosphorus and radiochlorine are being utilized to study the action of phosphate and chlorine in growing plants. At the University of California radiosulfur is being used to determine whether or not sulfur used as insecticide or fungicide is producing physiological injury on citrus plants. Workers at the University of Florida are studying the effects of small amounts of minerals on the growth of pastures and on the cattle grazing on treated pastures. The University of Pennsylvania is conducting studies in photosynthesis, which is the process carried on in green plants which utilizes the energy from sunlight to build carbohydrate material from carbon dioxide and water.

Another agricultural research project was inaugurated in March when the Atomic Energy Commission announced that it had made a grant to the Department of Agriculture to study the influence of radioactive materials on plant growth. The new project is intended to find facts about the effects of radioactive materials used in fertilizer applications, not as tracers to measure the effects of fertilizer materials, but as a direct influence on the fertilized crops.

Many experiments in Europe and America have yielded conflicting and confusing results about the beneficial effects of radiation on growing plants. The present study is intended to attempt to establish the accuracy of the beneficial effects, if any, of radioactive materials on growing plants. The objective of the research is: (1) to measure the effect of additions of radioactive materials to soil and fertilizer on the growth, maturity, yield, and composition of various representative crops; (2) to determine the influence of low activities of alpha, beta, and gamma radiation on the germination of seed and the growth and vigor of seedlings; and (3) to ascertain the influence of the radioactive material on the number and activity of the bacteria and other soil microorganisms.

There will be 30 crop stimulation experiments with 20 crops at 19 different locations in 14 States. Crops to be studied are: Sweetpotatoes, cotton, corn, soybeans, oats, alfalfa, tomatoes, beets, beans, spinach, lettuce, potatoes, lespedeza, peanuts, ladino clover, carrots, wheat, barley, sugar beets, and field beans. However, to avoid premature speculation about the possible results of these experiments, the Atomic Energy Commission and the Department of Agriculture do not propose to make public anything on the results until all experiments are completed and the data carefully analyzed and evaluated.

The use of radioactive materials by farmers is not recommended by the Atomic Energy Commission or the Department of Agriculture on the basis of present knowledge. Many important questions must be answered before the exact influence of radioactive materials on plant growth is known.

All of the experiments previously mentioned are time-consuming. Laboratory work is painstaking work. The agricultural technician must check and recheck his findings. He must evaluate them and he must apply his results to actual conditions over several growing periods. Then it is necessary for the manufacturer of commercial fertilizers to learn how to utilize the knowledge gained by the scientist to produce better materials and how to organize his plant for such production. After all these steps have been successfully accomplished, the farmer will then be able to apply to his own needs the knowledge gained through years of experimenting with radioactive materials.

It is not possible, in such a limited space, to make an adequate presentation of the extensive and excellent work which is being carried on in agricultural research using atomic-energy materials. It is possible to visualize a future that will be brighter for the farmer as the result of such experimentation. However, the eventual dividends which may accrue to the farmer will more than repay him for his present investment in the development of atomic energy.

Sale of Livestock

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENDERSON H. CARSON
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. CARSON. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the proposed legislation is twofold:

A. PURPOSE OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION

First. To make sure that dairy cattle held over 6 months by real dairy farmers are treated as capital assets so that gains from their sale will be taxed at a maximum rate of 25 percent.

Second. To avoid any contention that calves, after their birth, had not been held for more than 6 months when they were the offspring of cattle which had been so held.

B. NECESSITY FOR THIS PROPOSAL

1. The Revenue Act of 1942

By reason of section 117 (j) of the Revenue Act of 1942 gains on sales of property used in the trade or business are taxable like capital assets held for more than 6 months at a maximum rate of 25 percent, providing that such property is (a) of a character subject to certain allowances for depreciation (dairy cattle admittedly are); (b) held for more than 6 months; (c) not properly includable in taxpayer's inventory; (d) not held primarily for sale in the ordinary course of taxpayer's trade or business.

2. Interpretations of section 117 (j)

The Commissioner first ruled that livestock used for draft, breeding, or dairy purposes were "property used in the trade or business" within the meaning of section 117 (j) even though, for tax-computation purposes, a farmer might be permitted to include them in his inventory (I. T. 3666).

However, the Commissioner later ruled that only those gains from sales of such livestock which reduced the normal size of the herd were provided for by section 117 (j) (I. T. 3712).

In this later ruling, the Commissioner took the position that the offspring of the breeding herd were "property held by the taxpayer primarily for sale to customers in the ordinary course of his trade or business," and that any sales of cattle which did not reduce the herd below its normal size were likewise sales of property held primarily for sale in the ordinary course of business.

There have been no rulings on the question as to whether offspring of cattle held for more than 6 months are to be regarded on their birth as property "held for more than 6 months" within the meaning of section 117 (j). However, the Commissioner might make a technical contention that the calf had no legal existence prior to its birth, so that it could not be held until that time, notwithstanding ownership of its mother during a period prior to that time.

For example, with regard to a patent applied for, and later issued, the Commissioner took the position that, since the patentee had nothing but an inchoate right prior to issuance of the patent, he could not, for tax purposes, be said to have held anything prior to that time. The court recognized the soundness of the Commissioner's contention that the patentee had only an inchoate right until the patent was issued, but pointed out that, in reality, such an inchoate right might have a very substantial value and that he certainly held something of value within the meaning of the tax statutes even prior to the issuance of the patent. Commissioner v. Stephens-Adamson Mfg. Co. (51 F. (2) 681 (C. C. A. 7–1931)).

C. JUSTIFICATION FOR PROPOSED CHANGES

1. Treatment of dairy cattle as "property used in trade or business" as defined in section 117 (j)

The Commissioner's later ruling ignores the nature of the dairy business and the reasons why, without reducing the normal size of his herd, a dairy farmer may have cattle available for sale.

The availability for sale by a dairy farmer of cattle, whose sale will not reduce the normal size of his herd, can be caused by only two factors:

First. The birth of calves.

Second. The purchase of cattle to replace cattle already in the herd.

With regard to the latter factor, it is difficult to understand how the purchase of capital assets to replace other capital assets can change the character of the replaced capital assets from capital assets to "property held by the taxpayer primarily for sale to customers in the ordinary course of his trade or business."

If a dairy farmer has a herd of 10 cows and he buys two more and then sells two, the two sold are obviously capital assets which have been replaced by capital assets. If, instead of buying two and selling two, he buys four and sells two, then it would also seem clear that he has bought four capital assets and sold two capital assets, increasing the size of his herd from 10 to 12. If, instead of buying four and selling two and so increasing the size of his herd to 12, he merely buys 2 to accomplish that purpose, then clearly, if he sells all 12 the next year the sale of those 12, even under the Commissioner's ruling are treated as the sale of capital assets.

It is submitted therefore, that the Commissioner's later ruling cannot make any sense, unless it is limited to those sales which are attributable solely to the birth of calves.

However, the business of producing milk and dairy products requires the annual "freshening" of dairy cows. Thus, a dairy cow, used in the production of milk and dairy products, must give birth to a calf approximately once a year. The principal purpose of a dairy farmer in having calves is not to have them available for sale—it is to enable him to secure milk from his cows. After a few years, however, these cows, admittedly his "capital assets," are no longer usable for the production of milk. The calves represent nature's way of creating and replacing the dairy farmer's capital assets.

The reasoning of the Commissioner's later ruling is therefore unsound, insofar as dairy cattle are concerned. Whether or not a sale of dairy cattle results in a reduction in the normal size of the dairy farmer's herd, the cattle sold are certainly "property used in the trade or business" of the dairy farmer. As pointed out in the Commissioner's earlier ruling, which is not affected on that point by the later ruling, such cattle are not "property of a kind which would properly be includible in the inventory of a taxpayer" even though, for tax computation purposes, a farmer is permitted to include them in an inventory. If the principal business of the dairy farmer is the production of milk and other dairy products, it would seem clear also that the Commissioner was wrong in resting his later ruling on the premise that sales of dairy cattle which did not reduce the normal size of the heard, were sales of "property held by the taxpayer primarily for sale to customers in the ordinary course of his trade or business." In the case of calves, such property would be held because the taxpayer had to have them to get from his cattle the milk and dairy products which it was his business to produce. In the case of other cattle, it is difficult to understand how their character as capital assets can change merely because they happen to be the animals chosen for sale rather than those retained.

2. Treatment of calves after birth as property "held for more than 6 months," where they are offspring of cattle held for more than 6 months

The normal period of gestation for a calf is approximately 280 days, which substantially exceeds 6 months. Courts have frequently recognized unborn calves as being proper subjects for contracts as to their ownership (2 Am. Jur. 704). It is common practice to have calves bought and sold prior to their birth. When a cow, which has been "held" by a farmer for over 6 months, drops a calf, it is obvious that the calf has likewise been "held" for over 6 months.

3. Administrative advantages

The proposed changes in the law apply only where the principal business of the taxpayer is the production of milk and other dairy products. Its benefits would not be available to a taxpayer whose principal business is producing cattle for sale.

Hon. Paul Cunningham, of Iowa

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege to serve as a member of the Subcommittee on Roads of the Public Works Committee under the capable leadership of the subcommittee chairman, the Honorable PAUL CUNNINGHAM, of Iowa.

Congressman CUNNINGHAM's record is outstanding in his endeavors to see that the taxpayers of the Nation are given a road program commensurate with the dollar expenditures. I recognize the tremendous pressure under which he has been working and even in these trying times his gracious and courteous treatment to all parties concerned is an example of true statesmanship.

Chairman PAUL, as he is known to all of us, has the ability to analyze legislation and associate with it the needs of the day. His leadership in bringing about compromise between groups of varied differences and needs clearly demonstrates his ability as a leader and statesman. It has been a pleasure to serve with him.

Civil-Rights Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAURIE C. BATTLE
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker, a great deal has been said about the so-called civil-rights legislation in this session of Congress.

People who are genuinely interested in better race relations instead of political expediency will be interested in this timely editorial which appeared in the Richmond Times-Dispatch on Friday, June 4, 1948:

LAWS DON'T CHANGE HUMAN NATURE

The Times-Dispatch gave two pages in its Sunday Our Times section on May 9 to aspects of racial segregation as practiced all over the South. This went deeply into the whole subject, with articles not only on segregation laws as they agree and differ in the Southern States, but also their application and varying degrees of enforcement.

It is interesting along with this to consider the question of segregation and discrimination as practiced in the North. A survey of the subject was made recently under Arthur Katona, Michigan State College, in a Michigan town, and the results are presented in the May issue of Social Forces. Every effort was put forth by Mr. Katona and the sociologists working under him to make this study accurate and definitive. It was felt that a sampling poll, such as Dr. Gallup's, was not just what was wanted, and a small town was chosen so that research workers could study personally every service agency in the town and make close checks elsewhere in the area on initial findings. The interviewer method was used in every known way, direct and indirect, formal and informal, written and oral, casual and concerned, open and concealed. This was supplemented with observation, participation, case study, and even experiment. One researcher took a lead from Gentleman's Agreement and posed as a Negro.

The results may be somewhat startling to people, North and South, who take it for granted that the racial-discrimination shoe is all on a southern foot.

The four hotels in the Michigan town, the tourist camp and 29 out of the 30 rooming houses will not rent to Negroes. None of the five dance places will admit them. The beauty parlors will not take them under any circumstances, and only one barber shop will serve them, and that only after hours. Out of 20 restaurants, only 7 will serve Negroes, and although the 5 drug stores will fill their prescriptions, only 1 gives fountain service, although 1 other will give such service if no white people are around. Of the 12 taverns, 11 refuse to serve them, 3 out of 4 poolrooms will not let them play, and the bowling alley will do so only in off hours. The swimming pool, although municipally owned, will not admit Negroes at any time. The department stores and 5-and-10-cent stores will sell to them, and the dress shops sell, but will not permit trying on. In the three shoe stores, two will seat them but tell them the store is out of the desired size. The children's store will not sell at all.

The hospital in this Michigan town accepts colored patients, if it has to, but segregates strictly. Most of the nurses are prejudiced, and one absolutely refuses to treat Negro patients, declining to show up for duty when colored patients are in. The hospital does not hire colored personnel, and the majority of the nurses indicated they would quit if a colored nurse was hired. Of the 10 doctors in the town, one would not take colored patients. All eight dentists professed to serve Negro patients, but two of them only after hours and a Negro checkup revealed that one would not serve at all. In the 10 churches, Negroes are permitted to attend divine service, but are omitted from choir singing and social activities. All six lodges refuse to admit Negro members.

Employment opportunities are meager, and only in the most menial service and unskilled-labor class. Even such jobs as waiters and waitresses are not open to Negroes. One businessman, when questioned about this, said: "It can't be done in this town; people won't come to your place of business."

Note that in the particular Northern State in which this survey was made there is a law against racial discrimination, carrying a heavy fine and prison sentence for violations. When researchers mentioned the law, a wide variety of replies were received, ranging from the belligerent businessman who said, "I would rather pay the fine than have Negroes patronize my store," to the tavern keeper who said grimly that he paid for protection, and what he paid wasn't peanuts. The average merchant simply threw up his hands: Law or no law, it was a matter of self-preservation, he said; they would not be patronized by white trade if they catered to colored, and would go broke.

Not the least interesting sidelight thrown on northern racial relations by this survey is the prevalent use of the word "nigger"—a term now generally frowned on in the South. The researchers found that "Negro" or "colored people" was exceptional and that "nigger" was the term habitually used by everyone. Moreover, the survey is dotted with references to Negroes in terms ordinarily associated with the short stories of Erskine Caldwell and unquotable in a family newspaper.

A further striking point is the constant recurrence of stock phrases referring to the Negro's "place." "The nigger knows his place here and we know ours," a banker said, and similar remarks turn up constantly throughout the survey. A frequent comment has to do with education: "It is ridiculous to try to educate a nigger," one man put it, "most of them are too big for their pants anyhow." The police, who were found to be hard on Negro lawbreakers, are quoted as saying: "Well, I'll tell you, we keep this place all taken care of and believe me, them niggers know who is on top around here. We just ride close herd on them. * * * I've been a policeman for years and I tell you you can't give 'em an inch."

So it would seem that laws are not the answer. In the North, where strict laws have been passed making segregation and discrimination illegal, punishable by heavy fines and imprisonment, they are evaded and ignored. In the South, where strict laws have been passed making segregation compulsory, they are often evaded and ignored. A citizen of Mars, reading our law books would undoubtedly say that all the racial discrimination is in the South, and the people who think everything is going to be rosy in the garden as soon as a civil rights bill is passed, would seem to know as little about it as a citizen of Mars.

The Draft Compromise

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AIME J. FORAND
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Times of Saturday, June 19, 1948:

A LIMIT TO DRAFT COMPROMISE

Whether Congress will pass a selective-service bill before scheduled adjournment tonight is still uncertain. If it is a question of accepting a gutted, delayed-action bill such as the House voted yesterday morning, 283 to 130, or not adjourning, then adjournment must not be taken. Congress either should pass a bill that will provide the men needed by the armed services, and that will provide them as soon as the draft machinery can be set up, or it should come back between the political conventions, or after them, and stay in session until such a bill is fought through both Houses.

There was talk in the corridors yesterday afternoon of a compromise between the House and Senate measures that congressional leaders believed could be put through before midnight tonight despite the threat of a Senate filibuster. There were varying reports as to just what it was. It seems to us that there has been enough compromise now with the necessities of the situation in the Senate bill which provides for an immediate start on the setting up of draft machinery—which will take 2 or 3 months, defense officials say—and 2 years' service for inductees. If some further concessions can be made that do not destroy the basic purpose of the bill, which is to provide men immediately, then perhaps that would be better than waiting several weeks for a better bill. There is a limit, though, beyond which the bill should not go. No congressional desire to pack up now and take to the hustings can be humored if it means acceptance of an unacceptable compromise.

The draft bill that the House finally passed is about as bad a bill as can be imagined. The amendments tacked on to the measure on Wednesday and Thursday's sessions were allowed to remain when the bill came up for final vote, including the Coudert amendment to provide for only 1 year's service, the Shafer amendment delaying the draft until next January 31 and a third crippling clause that would permit prospective inductees to avoid the draft by enlisting in the National Guard or an active Reserve organization for 6 years of periodic training. None of those three House-voted clauses should remain in any compromise measure. Together they make a mockery of the bill.

It is a sad spectacle that Congress has made of itself on selective service. Where to place the blame is clear. It rests on the Republican leadership in the House that permitted its Rules Committee to bottle up the bill for 5 weeks, apparently in the hope that exactly what is happening would happen—either that no bill at all would be passed or one that was so watered down that the effect would be the same. If, because of that, an attempt is made today to push through an unworkable compromise then these House leaders will have forfeited the respect and the support of their fellow citizens. For they have been gambling with the security of all of us.

Additional Billions for European Relief

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT S. ELLIS
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, just why some of the people around Washington are fuming and shouting for additional billions for European relief is beyond understanding.

While the Congress has been debating the Marshall plan, and the amount of money it should have, merchandise and commodities of every description purchased with the American taxpayer's money has been rolling out of this country through other channels in amounts that stagger the imagination.

When viewing this performance, we wonder if the people who are running the affairs of this Government are just plain nuts. According to Leslie Gould, financial editor of the New York Journal-American, in the first 3 months of this year—without the Marshall plan, ERP, ECA, and so forth—the United States made $1,400,000,000 in grants and loans, plus $200,000,000 in World Bank loans, plus $400,000,000 in private American loans. A grand total for 3 months of $2,000,000,000, or at the rate of $8,000,000,000 a year.

This $2,000,000,000 in grants and loans—which in the end will probably prove to be one and the same—gifts—paid for the difference between approximately $4,500,000,000 in American goods and food shipped abroad, and imports of $2,500,000,000 by America in this period.

Incidentally, these so-called grants and loans in the first quarter were exactly double those of the preceding quarter, which included Christmas. Also, in the Christmas period, the foreign nations bought $400,000,000 more American goods than they did in the first 3 months of this year.

It is obvious why the $400,000,000 less purchases—why pay when you can get it free by waiting a few months?

The House trimmed the appropriations for foreign aid under the ECA program by extending the period of the grants from 12 to 15 months and by reductions. In doing this, the House acted entirely within its rights, as well as the terms of the original authorization which stated:

Nothing in this title is intended nor shall be construed as an expressed or implied commitment to provide any specific assistance, whether of funds, commodities, or service, to any country or countries.

At the time a Member of the upper body said:

I say again—as I have said so many times before—these recommended figures are not sacred. I do not undertake to demonstrate that the resultant 12-month figure of $5,300,000,000 in the bill is precisely accurate. I have no sympathy with any take-it-or-nothing attitude.

Now, a few months later, that same Member is shouting and pounding the table that the House's action is in bad faith.

Under the House proposal $5,055,000,000 would be spent in 12 months or $5,600,000,000 in 15 months. The Senate has restored most of the House cuts and voted $6,125,000,000 for 12 months' spending.

There is a limit to how much this country can give away. There is a bottom to the barrel unless we are to reduce ourselves to the substandard levels of Europe. If this country weakens itself economically, there is no country in the world to come to our assistance. And if any of them could, would they?

This enormous export of goods will continue high prices and make merchandise and commodities scarce in the American market. Those of us who have continually opposed these huge grants to foreign countries have constantly given these facts to the Members of this House. Those of you who have voted for all these loans and gifts are going to be very much embarrassed when you go back home and are questioned about increased pay for Federal workers, aid to education, improvement of social-security payments, the high cost of living, and many other things.

John Marshall Robsion

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. CHAUNCEY W. REED
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 17, 1948

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. JOHN MARSHALL ROBSION, late a Representative from the State of Kentucky

Mr. REED of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, JOHN M. ROBSION will long be remembered by those who served with him in the many Congresses of which he was a Member. His courage and independence won for him the admiration of his colleagues; his courtesy and kindly bearing, their esteem; and his profound knowledge of the law, their respect.

He was a most valuable member of the Committee on the Judiciary. During many of the tedious and exacting hearings of our committee he contributed by advice, argument, and searching questions to witnesses in a very substantial way toward obtaining the information necessary to the proper formulation of many laws. He was intensely interested in the revision and codification of the United States statutory law—a project that has progressed materially under his leadership. Our committee has, indeed, lost one of its most faithful, energetic, and conscientious Members. Kentucky has sent many distinguished statesmen to represent it in Washington. JOHN M. ROBSION measures up conformably with them all. A man of lofty principles, he hewed his course and followed it to the end. He kept the faith. And when the inevitable messenger with the inverted torch beckoned him to depart, he passed on to be crowned with the triumphant benediction, "Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

World Conditions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Hon. James A. Farley at the luncheon of the Executives' Club of Chicago, Sherman Hotel, Chicago, Ill., on May 7, 1948:

WORLD CONDITIONS

It is reassuring to know that in this Year of Our Lord, 1948, men like you in every corner of these United States have become thoroughly realistic in the knowledge that we cannot isolate ourselves from the other people of this world. We are at long last acutely aware that their economic and political problems today may become our calamities tomorrow. We know that without a return to political stability and sound economic intercourse on a world basis peace will be impossible.

Three fears grip the world at the present time: War, communism, and the atom bomb. And, of all the peoples of the world, we Americans are the most firmly held in the grip of these three fears. What they have done to our national outlook is extremely disturbing.

Just turn your memories back to the years of 1939–40 and recall that according to the polls 85 percent of the American people were determined that we should not enter the war. Recall, if you can, how shocked most people were at the demands of a few extremists for American entrance into the conflict at any time before Pearl Harbor. Today, these same polls show that a majority fear a war is inevitable within 10 years. And, I doubt if there is a person in this room who has not heard, as I have, the belief or the feeling expressed by some people that "we might as well have the war now and get it over with before Russia gets the atom bomb."

To me, it is abhorent to suggest that we get the war over before Russia gets the bomb. Just ponder it a moment. It seems that we must blast and kill 97 Russians to kill 3 Communists, as that is the proportion of party members, and that we continue to bomb civilians as national policy. It contemplates our launching a Pearl Harbor attack on Russia. To me, this is wholly immoral and un-Christian.

In the past 2 years I have circled this earth; have talked with heads of governments, members of legislative bodies, militarists, and just plain people. I have been on every continent and in virtually every nation of importance. I have toured the Americas—North and South. I have criss-crossed this country a half dozen times. The unvarnished truth is that fear of war, and a sense of insecurity grip everyone; apprehension as to what could and might happen prevails.

The reason for this almost universal attitude is not hard to uncover. It is the dread force of communism.

In communism we are dealing with a political instrument that is difficult for civilized comprehension. I used the word "civilized" deliberately. The progress of civilization has walked hand in hand with the progress of morals. Moral standards have become so fixed in our minds that we, of the civilized world, cannot do without them. When a man gives his word you expect him to keep it, when he signs a contract you expect him to honor it, when he extends the hand of friendship you do not look to see if it conceals a stiletto. It is our way of life—the very foundation of our civilization.

Because we hold these moral standards to be self-evident, it is small wonder that communism is almost beyond our capacity to understand. The ghastly fact is that communism is totally a moral. As a force without morals, it has only one objective—the seizure of power. How it attains that power, how many treaties it dishonors, how many contracts it violates, or how many democratic processes it rapes, it cares not.

To achieve its aims in nations that under peaceful conditions would never embrace communism, it has perfected the device of penetration, and by infiltration. If, as in Czechoslovakia, it becomes evident that it cannot win at the ballot box then it employs the device of infiltration to seize power by force. If the ballot box still threatens that seizure, as it did in Czechoslovakia, then it orders the single ballot with only one list of candidates, and purges all who stand in its way. Those who refuse to fall in step are either put to slave labor or liquidated. A police state terror is set up that reaches so deeply into the community life that a man is even afraid to talk confidentially to his wife much less to his neighbor. And, mind you, this is all accomplished by a terroristic minority wholly without morals—a political force which calls itself communism.

Almost one-fifth of the earth is now under the thumb of communism—12 nations in all. In not a single case, Russia included, has a victory at the ballot box put the Communists in power. In other words, in every case the will of a highly organized minority has been imposed on a majority by tactics that even barbarians would have considered dishonorable.

The question naturally follows: What makes communism run? Why has it been able to achieve these successes? Who supports it? Who is behind it? What is its strategy? What are we dealing with?

Communism is the refuge of the frustrated, the malcontent, and the maladjusted; a fringe force, composed of people motivated by bitterness and failure in the civilized world. And it can also well be the refuge of the victims of an intolerable economic situation. People sorely in need of food—of the bare necessities of human existence, are easy prey to communistic pressure and promises. I think that it is agreed by all of us that people do not starve peacefully. Innocent but hungry people, swayed by their own misery, or threats, if you will, are indeed vulnerable to the so-called benefits of communism.

Communists are united and bound like steel by their capacity to hate—and wait. Time means nothing; communism is willing to wait years. It is the intellectual gangsterism of the Hitler type. It attaches itself to good to accomplish evil. It waves the flag highest that it intends to destroy. It sets up front organizations with objectives that would match those of any decent civilized person. It infiltrates labor unions and proclaims goals that are beyond reproach. It attempts to penetrate our institutions, our schools, and even our churches. But it repudiates all its high-sounding objectives the minute that power is attained.

Communism itself has set up terms that describe communism's methods better than any words I can command, in the phrases "Trojan horse," "boring from within," "transmission belts," "front organizations," "cells," "fractions," and so on, right through the entire Communist terminology. The phrases and words themselves betray the whole strategy of deceit, subversion, use of force, and by minority rule by which communism would achieve its ends.

I tell the members of this audience nothing new when I say communism has sunk its roots into every nation of any importance on the face of this earth. No country, not even little Colombia, to the south of us has proven itself to be immune. We are dealing with a world movement—a syndicate of political criminals who have only one objective—the seizure of power.

What can we do about it?

There are those who would "fight fire with fire." Just as Stalin conducted the great purges of 1935 and 1936, when thousands upon thousands of persons were lined up and shot, and hundreds of thousands were sent to slave labor camps. These advocates of fighting fire with fire would line up the Communists here and elsewhere and shoot them. They would put down the whole cancerous movement by applying the same violence to communism that the Communists themselves employ. In dealing with Communist-controlled nations they would use the double-cross and the worthless contract just as those nations have applied them. Violence would be met with violence; deceit with deceit; gangsterism with gangsterism.

I do not believe any thinking civilized person can subscribe to such methods for ridding ourselves of communism. The Communists themselves have already made enough inroads on our morals; should we adopt their tactics our whole moral system might be weakened to the point of collapse. We witnessed that happen in Germany when the Hitler gangsters, deliberately capitalizing on the overwhelming public desire to rid Germany of communism, reduced that nation to a State without morals.

Now, let's take the other extreme—the man who says he would sit down and "make a deal" with Russia—"make a deal" with the Communists. Rumania tried it; Poland tried it; Czechoslovakia tried it. We know what has happened to every nation that has tried to make a "deal" with the Communists. The reason that the Soviet Union and the Communists cannot be dealt with is self-evident. The contract or "deal" is valid only so long as it is useful to them. It is a one-way street. It is like a businessman buying protection from a gang. You cannot win. The gang eventually "muscles in" and takes you over. The gang has no moral standards—you have. You lose.

What is left to do? If we cannot "fight fire with fire" and we cannot make a "deal" what can we do?

Democracy is fighting for its very existence, make no mistake about it. But its only course is to take a middle road. First, the democracies must make the contract, more than ever, the bond it is supposed to be, both between individuals and nations. Second, the inroads on our moral standards must be arrested and those standards guarded as jealously as a man guards his family. Third, there must be economic and social justice such as we have never seen before—a willingness by the peoples to trade on a world-wide basis to their mutual advantage. Finally, there must be created a democratic will to make democracy work.

Communism festers on political and economic unrest. The greatest enemy of communism is peace and prosperity. We, in America, have the capacity to bring both to the world. We must provide the leadership, and leadership is a big word. It means that men like you and me in the business world must do our part. It means that men in the political world must examine every move they undertake to make sure that they are acting not from expediency but for the ultimate welfare of everybody. We have the wealth; we have the capacity to produce and we have that most precious of all things—a free people. Only by asserting a great moral force in the world can we achieve what we all want—peace at home and abroad. America must realize that it has risen to the maturity of world leadership. We are the one force in existence today that can stop the sweep of communism.

This world leadership that we have attained was not sought by us. We have never practiced imperialistic exploitation such as the Roman, Spanish, and British Empires have employed. In fact, our policy at this moment might be called "imperialism in reverse." Instead of exploiting those countries with which we come in contact we are offering help. This is a wise policy, and is selfish only to the extent that we believe America thrives best when there is peace in the world.

How well this policy has worked in its early stages can best be judged by the outcome of the Italian elections. Now that they are over and the Communists have apparently publicly accepted defeat, we may tend to forget the crisis we faced. That would be a tragic error. We must always remember that in the recent Italian elections the Communists controlled about one-third of the vote—a good-sized bloc—and we should recognize it as a danger signal. I shudder to think what would have happened if Italy had gone Communist. There, thrust into the Mediterranean like the nose of a machine gun, would have been the Soviet-dominated Italian boot. The iron curtain would have dropped over the cultural splendor that is Italy, moving west to the Alps. Christianity throughout the world would have been outraged. The fear of the possibility of war would certainly have been more real than imagined.

The American handling of the Italian crisis was due largely to adroit diplomacy by our State Department. The decision to appeal for the return of Trieste to Italy was not just a masterful stroke, well-timed, but demonstrated our understanding of the Italian heart and pride. That is the type of diplomacy and influence we must exercise and bring to fruition if we are to carry the leadership which devolves on us toward worthy ends.

We all know that our diplomatic moves in the past have not always been so skillful, and it is incumbent on thinking Americans that they support a program to bring about the wisest and best-trained diplomatic service possible. We should encourage young people to enter the diplomatic service in the same spirit that Britain has done. The time is past when we can look upon the Foreign Service of the United States as a minor part of government. We need training of the most intensive sort in our universities and in our Government to help maintain this mantle of leadership which has fallen upon us.

I have had some experience in the field of exports and in my travels I have met hundreds of foreign businessmen and Government officials. I have seen how American enterprises are respected abroad and I have come to realize with more and more intensity how important it is to develop the best brains possible in matters concerning foreign relations—both in business and in government. The greatest export that this country can provide is an export of brains.

The free enterprise system is an integral part of the role we are assuming. Free enterprise is simple, straightforward and honorable. It derives its rights from a natural human impulse. It is based on human initiative and the right to create, share, and enjoy and spend the wealth amassed by individual and collective efforts. As Democrats and Republicans, and above all as Americans, we will not surrender free enterprise to national socialism, communism, or to any dictatorship. If we are to exert our leadership for peace, free enterprise can be the backbone of our effort to restore order in the world, to continue our prosperity and bring peace and happiness to our people at home, and other nations throughout the world.

International House: A Symbol

OF
HON. HALE BOGGS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from New Orleans States of June 17, 1948:

INTERNATIONAL HOUSE: A SYMBOL

Even through the heavy wartime muffler the hum of activity on the New Orleans waterfront was distinctly audible throughout the world. For a time, indeed, this was the Nation's No. 1 port, so complete was the U-boat blockade of the Atlantic coast. By dozens and scores foreign freight forwarders migrated to New Orleans.

Against that background appeared the vision of an organization which would not only consolidate wartime gains but elevate the sights for new and greater trade targets.

Translation of the vision into hard cash—approximately $500,000—came by dint of hard campaigning. In 1945 International House was opened. This week it enters its fourth year, "bursting at the seams," in the words of its retiring president, A. E. Hegewisch.

There can be no reasonable doubt of the efficacy of International House. Proof of the pudding came in last year's all-time high in port business, a $1,250,000,000 volume of international traffic across the wharves.

More proof comes in the leavening of city and the mid-continent area with increased interest in exports, imports, and world relations. Witnessing the soundness of the International House idea also are plans of competitor ports to establish counterparts of the organization.

More direct are testimonials of ambassadors, Federal officials, industrialists, and many others whose names bulk large in the daily news. Add to those the testimonials afforded by the fact that more than half the 74 foreign freight forwarders who came here as a wartime expedient have stayed on.

The leavening has created the International Trade Mart, Greater New Orleans, Inc., and other less conspicuous achievements. And International House has proved its desirability to the point where its membership, under the astute directorship of Charles Nutter, may this year quadruple its original membership goal.

With becoming modesty, International House officials credit much of New Orleans' international-trade gains to wholehearted cooperation received from public and private agencies, but the fact remains that International House is a symbol of New Orleans' renaissance.

The Program of the Quartermaster Corps for Future Research

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Brig. Gen. Georges F. Doriot:

THE PROGRAM OF THE QUARTERMASTER CORPS FOR FUTURE RESEARCH

(By Brig. Gen. Georges F. Doriot)

We have tried today to present to you a summary of the more important Quartermaster programs in the field of textile research. We should like to tell you that the Quartermaster Corps appreciates the extent to which the results which have been obtained stem from the cooperation and assistance of the textile industry and of its allied research facilities. I wish, therefore, to express my sincere thanks to all of you who have contributed to the textile research program of the Quartermaster Corps and to assure you that your efforts were reflected not in documents buried away in filing cabinets, but, instead, in the comfort, well-being, health, and efficiency of the American soldier.

It is perhaps inevitable that the major share of the publicity given to war material should be confined, almost exclusively, to the offensive weapons of the land, sea, and air forces and to the other new and startling developments in such fields as aviation and electronics. To most people, including scientists, there is nothing glamorous in a better pair of shoes, a better fabric for a field jacket, a better filling material for sleeping bags. It is unfortunate that this distinction exists, because it does not reflect the important contribution of these materials to the successful operation of the Army. It is unfortunate also because it has influenced, in some cases, the effort which industry and other research facilities have been willing to expend on the problems of clothing and individual equipment which fall within the sphere of Quartermaster Corps activity. A 20-percent increase in the fire power of a division, resulting from the adoption of improved weapons, affords no appreciable advantage over the enemy if 30 percent of its men are to be incapacitated by trenchfoot or other exposure injuries.

The importance of providing clothing which will permit troops to operate efficiently regardless of climate or terrain is clearly established by the following quotation from the Biennial Report of the Chief of Staff of the United States Army for the Years 1943 to 1945:

"In the autumn of 1941 after the Battle of Vyasma, the Germans stood exhausted but apparently victorious before Moscow. According to Jodl, the general staff of the armed forces considered that one last energetic push would be sufficient to finish the Soviets. The German High Command had neither envisioned nor planned for a winter campaign. A sudden change in the weather brought disaster. The Red Army defense, a terrific snow storm, and extremely unseasonable cold in the Christmas week of 1941 precipitated the strategic defeat of the German armed forces."

Medical records do not by any means reveal the number of casualties or the instances in which specific military objectives have not been gained because men were inadequately protected against climate and terrain. Every one of you remembers an occasion when you were unbearably cold and perhaps wet, when your feet were numb, and when it required a real effort to move your fingers. Under such conditions, with what effectiveness could you have attacked an enemy strong point, or, in turn, repulsed a counter attack? Clothing and the other items of personal equipment for the fighting man make a much greater contribution to the efficiency of the Army than is generally appreciated. Superiority for the United States in this field must be maintained just as superiority must be maintained in tanks, planes, and automatic weapons. Research in textiles, clothing, footwear, and individual equipment must figure large in our plans for the future.

We are interested today in the future—not in the past—but a brief summary of our experience during the last 4 years may make some contribution to our thinking for the years ahead.

EXISTING EQUIPMENT INADEQUATE

Four years ago we came face to face with the problem of completely reequipping the Army. It has been said too often that the Army started this war with the equipment with which it had ended World War I. Actually, the situation was much worse. Many items which had been developed as the result of field experience in the mud and rain of northern France in 1917 and 1918 were "modified" in peacetime to be more suitable for the garrison life at Fort Benning, Ga., or Fort Sam Houston, Tex.

Even after the outbreak of the war the importance of immediately improving existing equipment was not recognized by many. There were far too many offhand statements about how rugged the American soldier was, how he could get along in winter with only one blanket and without food other than corned beef and black coffee. These latter statements I have not invented; they were actually made by important and influential persons. It can easily be appreciated that from such leadership it was difficult, if not impossible, to get help, difficult to obtain funds and the personnel necessary if we were to move ahead.

Furthermore, many of the items which are procured by the Quartermaster Corps are of commercial types. In peacetime research had to be carried out on ordnance material because there were no commercial items available. On the other hand, it was felt by many that the Quartermaster Corps could and would accept standard commercial designs and items without difficulty. No single point of view has perhaps done the Army more harm than this one. There are extremely few commercial items which are suitable for military use. The demands which the Army places upon equipment are such that the use of commercial items results in lower efficiency, higher casualties, and, incidentally, higher costs.

The inadequacies of existing equipment and the dangers implicit in its use were brought out at once in the snow and mud of supposedly subtropical north Africa and in the early campaigns in the Aleutians. Unfortunately, even when the inadequacies of this equipment had been recognized no immediate solution was possible because there was nowhere available the background of knowledge necessary to improve it—knowledge both of the conditions of climate, terrain, and the use to which items were to be subjected in the field, and of the suitability for military use of products for which production capacity and know-how existed in industry. As a temporary expedient, the Quartermaster Corps did the only thing it could do. There was brought together in Washington a nucleus of technical and production personnel from industry, together with men with long experience in living out-of-doors under difficult conditions—mountaineers and explorers of the type of Dr. Vilhjalmur Stefanson, Sir Hubert Wilkins, Maj. Paul Siple, and many others. Equipment was immediately redesigned, the new designs based on the best judgment of these men and tempered by industry's experience wherever it was applicable. It is a tribute to all those who participated in this program that very few subsequent changes had to be made in the over-all direction of the research. Inevitably, however, the results were, in many cases, far from the ultimate goal. Often, new items of equipment were found to be necessary as the war progressed. And we were still confronted with the problem of building an organization to correct the existing situation and to establish research on a more sound basis. In this program we had the strong backing of the Quartermaster General, who, with great foresight, recognized the problem at hand and did everything in his power to see that a prompt solution was reached.

INDUSTRY'S ROLE IN MILITARY TEXTILES

In order to insure an adequate research organization, the prime requirement was for men with sound technical judgment and experience who could deal effectively with industry and evaluate the suitability for military use of the items developed by industry. We encountered difficulties, unfortunately, in obtaining such personnel. The only source of them was industry, because, contrary to the popular conception, men in the Army who had adequate technical or executive ability were far too few for the jobs which had to be filled. Companies were reluctant to deprive themselves of technical personnel, an attitude which, while understandable, was, in many instances, shortsighted; for, to the extent to which specifications were not correctly stated, the extent to which designs were changed more often than necessary, the extent to which specifications and production schedules did not take into account the facilities, equipment, and know-how of industry, headaches of corresponding severity were in store for those same companies.

Industry was also impatient at times, or disturbed, by frequent changes in specifications and numerical requirements. These changes were necessary. We do not like to make changes; neither does industry; but there is no one, I am sure, who will say that changes should not be made if there is any possibility that, by changing, the number of casualties could be even slightly reduced. Had we been better prepared for war, changes would have been less frequent. But because we were unprepared and were forced many times to make hurried decisions, it was inevitable that changes should be frequent.

Similarly, changes in requirements were inevitable. We could not know what operations were being planned. Even the General Staff could not foresee the future with sufficient accuracy to provide stable requirements and, if you remember that a lag in manufacturing time ranging from 3 months to a year must be taken into consideration, the numerous peaks in our demands upon industry were inevitable. The situation was complicated by the fact that the need for Quartermaster equipment varies, depending upon the season of the year—a rifle can be used winter or summer; woolen underwear and shoepacs are strictly winter items. Remember, again, that these changes were as unwelcome to us as they were to industry.

As the war progressed and as we were able to establish more carefully the characteristics required for military items, and as our background of scientific knowledge became more extensive, the situation showed marked improvement. This improvement was stimulated by what to my mind was the most important single development in this field—that is, the establishment by the Chief of Staff of a new Development Division of the War Department. That organization, for the first time, recognized the fact that scientific, technical knowledge was on a par with tactics and strategy and gave to existing programs an impetus without which many of our accomplishments would have been impossible. Maj. Gen. Stephen Henry, the original director of the new Development Division, was the first man who came to us saying, "What can I do to help you? We must have more adequate and better equipment," instead of saying, "You can't do that!" We were equally fortunate in General Henry's successor, Gen. William A. Borden, under whose direction and intelligent interest the program was still further expanded.

Despite the many difficulties which appeared as the war progressed, the Quartermaster Corps followed its original plan of calling upon industry whenever possible, doing independent research itself only when facilities and know-how did not exist in industry or other research facilities outside the Army. It may truthfully be said, therefore, that the accomplishments of our research program are the accomplishments of industry and of its allied research facilities. In the conduct of this program the Quartermaster Corps-National Academy of Science Committee has been of invaluable assistance. In the formulation of research programs we have also leaned heavily upon the members of the Quartermaster Corps Advisory Board. Formed in 1942 and expanded since that time, it today includes 230 men, leaders in the various fields of science and industry of importance to the Quartermaster Corps. This organization has made an outstanding contribution toward providing proper equipment for the Army.

SUCCESS OF RESEARCH PROJECTS

The results obtained from the various research projects have been most gratifying. The Quartermaster Corps has taken great pride in the many unsolicited letters which have been received from officers and enlisted personnel in all theaters of operation, expressing their appreciation for the job which has been done in providing improved clothing and equipment for the Army. Such comments as that received from the late Gen. Simon Bolivar Buckner—"For the first time in all my service I have seen soldiers take the field comfortably and sensibly equipped. It is a great pleasure to feel that we are so splendidly served"—reflects a condition for which the clothing and textile industries are certainly in part responsible. It would be pleasant to be able to sit back, accepting these many words of praise which have been received and consider the job to be completed. But we must be realistic and we must recognize the fact that the unpreparedness which existed at the beginning of the war and which resulted in an untold number of casualties can and will reoccur unless we learn from the past and insure the continuation of the research program. Soberly we should ask ourselves, "Will the United States in another war be able to overcome the same initial handicap in its war potential?" Or more specifically, "Can we afford to risk the future on the possibility that the answer to the above question would be 'Yes'?" In this connection we might quote again from the Biennial Report of the Chief of Staff:

"Twice in recent history the factories and farms and people of the United States have foiled aggressor nations; conspirators against the peace would not give us a third opportunity. * * *

"They [American cities and industries] escaped destructive bombardment in the Second World War. They would not in a third. * * *

"The peacetime army must not only be prepared for immediate mobilization of an effective war army, but it must have in reserve the weapons needed for the first months of the fighting and clear-cut plans for immediately producing the tremendous additional quantities of material necessary in total war. We must never face a great national crisis with ammunition lacking to serve our guns, few guns to fire, and no decisive procedures for procuring vital arms in sufficient quantities.

"The necessity for continuous research into the military ramifications of man's scientific advance is now clear to all and it should not be too difficult to obtain the necessary appropriations for this purpose during peacetime. There is, however, always much reluctance to expenditure of funds for improvement of war-making instruments, particularly where there is no peacetime usefulness in the product."

There can be only one answer to the questions set forth above. There must be worked out the means by which industry can in the peacetime years ahead contribute to the Quartermaster research program to the extent necessary to maintain the broad superiority of American clothing, rations, and individual equipment. The question for industry to answer cannot be: "Should we participate in the program?" It must be: "How can we best contribute?"

At this point one more thought might be added: It has often been said that it is easy to do research for the Army because there are no limitations on how much can be spent. I want to point out that our research program saved many times over the expenditure made. The development of a shrink-resistant treatment for socks, which you have heard described here today, saved the Army more in 1 month than our entire research budget for 1 year. Similar savings could be cited for innumerable other projects.

NEED FOR PEACETIME RESEARCH

Recognizing the need for continuing research in peacetime, the Quartermaster Corps has already given considerable thought to means of facilitating the cooperation between industry and the Army, which will, of necessity, be required. Certain changes which during the war were not possible can and will be made now that it is over. As you know, the research activities of the Quartermaster Corps have been highly decentralized. We have had laboratories and research personnel in Boston, Lawrence, Chicago, Jeffersonville, Jersey City, Philadelphia, and Washington. In many instances, confusion has developed in this or that program, and it is my feeling that you, as research personnel, have been remarkably patient in bearing with us while some of the resulting problems were worked out. To overcome this condition but, above all, to provide for more efficient use of personnel and facilities, it is the plan of the Quartermaster Corps to consolidate at the Philadelphia Quartermaster depot all of the research activities of the Corps other than those pertaining to subsistence, packing, packaging, and processing. These will remain in Chicago, where they are located today. The intention is to develop an outstanding technical organization at Philadelphia. This activity will require technical and military personnel so that field reports can be correctly evaluated, the research programs will be well laid out and executed, and the results can be accurately measured as to their suitability for military use.

It is our plan to put much more emphasis upon fundamental research than it has been possible to do during the war, when finding immediate answers to many problems of end-item design required the greatest percentage of the time and effort of available personnel. The physiological research conducted during the war at the Climatic Research Laboratory at Lawrence, Mass., and by various universities under research contracts will be greatly expanded. You have already been told the extent to which it is planned to carry out fundamental research in the field of textiles.

Philadelphia was chosen as the location for this research center because of its proximity to the many industries serving the Quartermaster Corps and its proximity to research laboratories in universities and in industry. Close by there are mountains and the ocean is not far distant, which permits the testing of equipment under conditions approximating those to be expected in combat operations.

Again, such an organization can obtain maximum usefulness only if it has the strong and continued backing of the research organizations which have contributed to this program in time of war.

We plan to maintain our testing activities at Camp Lee. In addition, we expect to use facilities in Alaska, in Panama, and in other locations for testing activities where special conditions of climate or terrain are required.

The Quartermaster General of the German army made the statement in the course of questioning that American research and development on Quartermaster equipment had progressed as far in the 3 years of this war as had the Germans' in the 15 years during which they had prepared for the world conflict. Until the defeat of Japan we all felt very proud of the equipment which had been provided for the American Army. But now that VJ-day has passed, we realize that little of the present Quartermaster Corps equipment will be applicable to a future war. We cannot relax our efforts. We must give men lighter clothing and lighter equipment. For every ounce of weight we can take off a man's feet, we can put 4 ounces on his back in the form of more ammunition or better protection. Most of the products for which the Quartermaster Corps is responsible were not constructed according to engineering principles which have been recognized for generations. In clothing, for example, we have failed to recognize the points of strain and to offset them by the use of more material or different constructions. We carefully made clothing water-repellent, we develop fabrics specifically to resist water, and then we use conventional stitching of the seams, which puts thousands of holes in a garment. These are only a few factors which must be investigated. We can repeat that there is little of the present Quartermaster Corps equipment which will be satisfactory in the years to come.

If you accept the premise, as I think you must, that industry has a tremendous stake in the continuation of a sound program of research for the Army, it follows that industry itself must contribute freely and that its leaders should consider themselves to be responsible for ensuring that all avenues of research of potential value to the Army are being explored. The role of industry must be active—not passive. You are the trustees of Army research—its future is in your hands. In effect, the Army in its research activities should act largely as the liaison between the requirements of troops in the field and your scientific thinking.

Personnel will continue to be a most serious problem, and, again, one which cannot be solved without your help. You will have to recognize that a relatively small number of capable men will have to be available to the Army for this program. You should not think that such a program involves a loss for industry in the long run. The men who have been leaving the Research and Development Branch have almost all gone back to substantially better jobs than they had before the war. It has been apparent that industry feels that the training which these men have received has contributed to their ability and judgment—in short, it has made them better able to fill important positions in industry. Insofar as possible, we are placing as many research contracts as we can in order to make efficient use of present scientific personnel. In the more important fields, committees have been formed, with industry's cooperation, to plan and guide our activities. In the field of textiles a number of such committees have been appointed. Their contribution has already been substantial; it must continue to be so in the years ahead.

During the last 4 years the contribution of American industry to the over-all war effort has been a striking measure of its patriotism and of its sense of responsibility to the men and women of this country. On the other hand, no one, I am sure, would deny that this attitude is supported by a clear appreciation of the stake that industry has in the future of this country and in a world political and economic structure which will leave us strong and free from foreign domination. The philosophy with respect to military research embodied in such statements as "We will get around to that some day," or, "The other fellow can work out that problem," can lead us into unpreparedness as surely and as rapidly as it has led us in the past. Only by a sound research program, utilizing the best scientific and technical personnel available in the country, can we avoid a repetition of the tragedy which took place between the two World Wars. We must review this problem cold-bloodedly, with great realism. At all times we must keep in mind the dangers involved, which are so aptly stated by General Marshall in his biennial report to the Secretary of War:

"We finish each bloody war with a feeling of acute revulsion against th'? savage form of human behavior, and yet on each occasion we confuse military preparedness with the causes of war and then drift almost deliberately into another catastrophe. This error of judgment was defined long ago by Washington. He proposed to endow this Nation at the outset with a policy which should have been reasonable guaranty of our security for centuries. The cost of refusing his guidance is recorded in the sacrifice of life and in the accumulation of mountainous debts. We have continued impractical. We have ignored the hard realisties of work affairs. We have been purely idealistic."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT THOMAS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. THOMAS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, permit me to say a few words about my chairman, JOHN TABER, of New York.

JOHN TABER is one of the real leaders, not only of the House, but of the entire Republican Party. No man has had a bigger task in the last several years, in his capacity as ranking member, and now chairman, of the Appropriations Committee. All of us fully realize the importance of his outstanding work in handling the appropriations for the Federal Government, and in keeping constant watch to do away with unnecessary Government spending. We all admire him for his honesty, his fine judgment, and his untiring efforts. The people of his district are indeed fortunate to have a man of JOHN TABER'S caliber and stature as their representative. He is not only a credit to them, but to the Nation.

Carnivals of Waste

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT S. ELLIS
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an editorial from the Washington Times-Herald of June 19.

It appears that the Marshall plan for the relief of Europe is going to take its place along with other carnivals of waste much sooner than its opponents contemplated.

The editorial follows:

FROM ERP TO WPA

Ever since the kickoff of the Marshall plan, or European recovery program a year ago, we've been callously expressing grave doubts about the success of this project to boost western Europe back to its feet with 17 billions' worth of United States aid.

Now, if the Wall Street Journal can be believed (and it virtually always can), these doubts are coming gruesomely true—and this before the ERP has begun really to roll.

The well-known financial paper's Washington bureau reported yesterday that the ERP is already turning, subtly but surely, into a WPA. The WPA, you probably remember, was the giant leaf-raking and boondoggling scheme conceived by President Roosevelt and administered by Harry L. (tax and tax, spend and spend, elect and elect) Hopkins.

Secretary of State Marshall started out by saying that the ERP must help the war-stricken Europeans to help themselves. There was much tough talk a while back about how the United States must insist on European currency reforms, lower tariff barriers, etc., as the price of its food, clothes, machinery, fertilizer, and other forms of aid. Some of this talk came from Paul G. Hoffman himself, and it helped to get him the job of ERP Administrator.

Now, it comes out, various European politicians are saying that they must be allowed to spend our wealth as they see fit; that for us to require them to get businesslike and drop some of their Marxist share-the-poverty devices would be an insulting interference with their sacred sovereignty by Uncle Sam.

Too many of the boys are forgetting promises to use our help as economically as possible, and are upping requests for money and goods all along the line.

And Mr. Hoffman is having trouble inducing hard-headed and experienced businessmen to take key jobs in the ERP machine. A number of those whom he has approached have refused to touch the project with a 10-foot pole. As a result, he is under increasing pressure to take on a horde of leftovers from the UNRRA and lend-lease carnivals of waste—the kind of fellows and girls who did so much to fatten up Pal Joey Stalin's war potential and siphoned enough stuff to Bolshevik Tito to enable him to build the Yugoslav army to the unjustified strength of 800,000.

That's the ERP picture as of now, according to a report which we consider reliable. We're curious to know whether Mr. Hoffman, with the best will in the world, can reverse this trend. If he can't we're curious to know how long it will be before western Europe is on a straight, undisguised WPA dole, leaning on its shovels, and cursing Uncle Sam for not putting out dough in greater and greater amounts every month.

The Next Conscription Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the militarists have adopted the Prussian conscription system, only more drastic than any foreign system, what is the next step to further fasten peacetime military enslavement upon our youth? Already the militarists are planning the next move. Now the propaganda is in the making for compulsory peacetime military service for the young women of the Nation. This proposal will be urged as "necessary for world peace and the security of our Republic."

I am submitting a list of questions to the parents of the potential female trainees, the answers to which may be revealing to the authors of the proposed female conscription legislation. There are some questions too delicate to propound, but the parents should have an opportunity to speak on all phases of this all-important change in their domestic life. For the present an answer from the home folk to each of the 48 questions herein submitted will be helpful to the legislators who have to act upon these military proposals:

COMPULSORY PEACETIME MILITARY SERVICE, FEMALE TRAINEES—INTERROGATORY

1. What would be the average annual number of females called upon for training?
2. What would be the probable annual number of rejections?
3. What would be the size of each annual class of trainees?
4. Would standards of mental and physical requirements be as high as in the Regular Army and Navy Establishments, or would substandards for training be adopted?

41. If a durable peace is not in prospect, would a year's training period be sufficient adequately to train American female youth for war services?
42. Would the rapid advances in military machines, weapons, and munitions render such training rapidly obsolete unless female trainees were frequently called back for refresher training?
43. Will it be possible to achieve a peace so certain and lasting that the Nation would not need a national defense adequate to meet another sudden war?
44. Will the United States be likely to have as much time in any future war to train females for military service as we had in the first and present World Wars?

45. If not, then is compulsory military training for females imperative to our national defense?

46. What other countries, if any, have had compulsory military service for females?

47. What has been their experience with regard to the problems outlined in the foregoing questions?

48. What would be the effect of such a program upon the trend of the Nation toward militarism?

The Displaced-Persons Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AIME J. FORAND
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Times of Saturday, June 19, 1948:

A SHAMEFUL DP BILL

Eighteen months ago a humanitarian drive, worthy of the best traditions of this country, was begun to save some of the lives of 850,000 men, women, and children in the displaced persons camps of Europe. With sweeping support of Americans in every walk of life and of civic, Government, labor, and religious groups, the Stratton bill emerged, symbolizing the highest principles as a basis for taking a fair share of the DP's—400,000 over a 4-year period on the concept of justice for each group of DP's.

That bill died in committee, and two bills subsequently took the Stratton bill's place. In the House, a more moderate bill, but nevertheless humane, was sponsored by Representative FRANK FELLOWS, to admit 200,000 DP's over a 2-year period. In the Senate a bill written by Senators REVERCOMB and WILEY was the antithesis of humanitarianism and deliberately sought to scuttle every high concept of either of the House bills. It cruelly favored one DP group above another, injected the religious issue, and because of its unworkable administrative provisions was a bill of exclusion rather than admission of DP's.

This week has brought a shameful victory for this latter school of bigotry. A joint conference committee approved virtually every narrow concept of the Senate measure and the House yesterday endorsed the conference report.

It is to their honor that four of the Senate-House conferees refused to sign the bill—Senators FERGUSON and KILGORE, and Representatives BOGGS and CELLER. This DP bill's main provisions are these: 205,000 DP's shall be permitted to enter over the next 2-year period, including 3,000 war orphans; 40 percent of admissions shall be allotted to DP nationals of the Baltic states and Poland east of the Curzon line; 30 percent of admissions shall go to farmers, discriminating against other skills; those not in the camps by December 22, 1945, are not eligible for admissions, discriminating against the bulk of Jewish DP's, who suffered the most cruelly during the war. Even the Volks Deutsche are given a boost—permitting these persons of German ethnic origin, many of whom had strong Nazi ties, to compete for regular quota numbers with bona fide DP's.

This is a sad conclusion. There is also no assurance that the 100,000 proposed for the first year's admissions will come into the country, because of the bill's unworkability. Perhaps most significant, this triumph for the Revercomb group holds disturbing portents for the future. Good bills have gone down the drain; a bad bill and a bad precedent bode ill for democracy, which finds discrimination on its books repugnant.

Railroad Retirement Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES B. DEANE
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Speaker, in casting my vote in favor of the amendment to the Railroad Retirement Act I rejoice with that great host of loyal Americans, our faithful railroad employees, that this great forward step to improve the retirement provisions of the Railroad Retirement Act has at last been made possible. It has been too long coming.

At this time I wish to pay my respects to that distinguished Representative and our beloved colleague, Hon. ROBERT CROSSER, of Ohio, for the grand part he has played through the years in championing the cause of our railroad employees. I want him to know that I shall stand by his side as we face the coming months and years in protecting and extending the great benefits of the Railroad Retirement Act.

The amendment we approve today is included in H. R. 6766. It has passed both Houses of Congress. It is now the law of the land.

The Crosser amendment to the Railroad Retirement Act, which became effective July 1, 1947, provided sick benefits for railroad workers at rates comparable to those paid during unemployment, the scale of which was also increased. This legislation provided railroad workers with the most complete and unified plan of benefits existent in the United States up to the present time. Rates are computed according to a schedule of the worker's earnings during the base year and annual benefits covering either sickness or unemployment are payable for a maximum of 130 days during any calendar year.

Four changes are made by H. R. 6766, none of which in any way limit the benefits to railroad workers described above. First, this amendment will increase all pensions and annuities to retired workers and to those who retire in the future, by a flat 20 percent. We all know that the increase in the cost of living during the past few years has hit those on fixed incomes the hardest. This increase during the Eightieth Congress has amounted to over 10 percent. Between 1939 and 1947 the cost of living increased over 60 percent. For retired workers, therefore, this bill to increase the retirement benefits will represent only partial alleviation of the soaring cost of living, but it is essential that the Congress provide at least this increase. The increased annuity will begin in the month after the month of enactment of the bill.

Second, H. R. 6766 provides a guaranty that for an employee dying on and after January 1, 1947, if benefits under the Railroad Retirement Act paid to him and to others with respect to his death do not equal the total of the taxes he had paid into the railroad retirement system, plus a slight amount in lieu of interest, the difference should be paid to his survivors or beneficiaries. This portion of the bill reestablishes the provision for lump-sum benefit payments which was in effect before the act was amended in 1946. It will guarantee on an optional basis to every employee who has contributed to the fund that an amount equal to his contribution, plus a small amount for interest, minus benefits which he has received, will be paid to someone.

Finally, this bill provides for a reduction in the contribution rate paid by employers for the maintenance of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act. The present rate is 3 percent, but this will be reduced on a graduated scale so long as an ample balance is maintained in the fund. The soundness of the railroad retirement fund will be preserved since the rate of contributions to the fund will be increased by one-half percent for each $50,000,000 by which the balance in the account on September 30 of any year is less than $450,000,000, and to graduate back to 3 percent when such balance is less than $250,000,000.

As outlined above the three major purposes of the bill are: (1) It increases the amount of annuities by 20 percent; (2) it restores on an optional basis the provision for lump-sum death-benefit payments; (3) it reduces the employers' contribution, but maintains the stability of the railroad retirement fund.

This legislation has received the support of both the employers and the railway workers. While both groups have modified their position this legislation provides the best answer to conflicting interests. I am especially glad that it has received the support of Congress because it provides an increase in pension benefits to workers sorely pressed by the increase in the cost of living. These people, many of whom live in small communities throughout our land, deserve consideration because they have contributed so much to the successful operation of our railway system throughout the years. Who can imagine the growth and industrialization of our continent, the expansion of cities and markets, without the network of railroads which link together our Nation? And who believes that this would have been possible had it not been for devotion and energy on the part of our railroad workers? While no retirement system can entirely foreshadow the changing conditions which occur, it is important that in some measure we compensate these employees for the loss of income which the change in the cost of living represents to them. Because this legislation does just that, and because it provides a means of reducing the burden of contributions made by the railroads to the fund set it for retirement purposes, while in nowise endangering the continued stability of that fund for workers in the future who will come under its provisions, I have supported it.

The Diamond Jubilee of the Polish Roman Catholic Union of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS S. GORDON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent granted me by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, I am privileged to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a copy of a resolution that has been sent to me by the Honorable Joseph P. Rostenkowski, one of Chicago's and Illinois' leading citizens. Mr. Rostenkowski is a member of the Chicago City Council and was responsible for the introduction of the resolution commemorating the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Polish Roman Catholic Union of America before that distinguished body. The council approved the resolution, ordered it engrossed, and spread it on the official records of that council.

Mr. Speaker, the Polish Roman Catholic Union of America has contributed much to the welfare of its members and has distinguished itself in the fields of culture, economics, and humanity. It has ever been loyal to the ideals of our great country and it has worked unstintingly and courageously through its membership in its behalf.

Mr. Speaker, I know that I express the feeling of the House of Representatives and the Congress of the United States when I extend to the Polish Roman Catholic Union of America our best wishes and our high respect on the seventy-fifth anniversary of this great and outstanding fraternal organization.

The resolution follows:

RESOLUTION

Whereas the Polish Roman Catholic Union of America, a national fraternal organization, maintains its home office in Chicago for the past 75 years and became prominently a part of Chicago; and

Whereas the union that has contributed so much to the economic, cultural, and humanitarian progress of our country deserves the respect and good wishes of every American; and

Whereas the union has always been a strong advocate of the youth movement embodying sports and culture for boys and of the daughters of the union for girls, and has established youth camps throughout the country, where obligations of citizenship are taught and health-building activities carried out; and

Whereas in its broad spirit of tolerance, religion, and civic life, the Polish Roman Catholic Union of America has been of inestimable service to all our people and to this great democracy, whose ideals the union so truly reflects: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the City Council of Chicago acknowledge the diamond anniversary of the Polish Roman Catholic Union of America, now being observed throughout the United States in cities where the union maintains its societies; and be it further

Resolved, That the City Council of Chicago consider this a most appropriate occasion to acknowledge the generous and zealous contribution of the Polish Roman Catholic Union to the progress of Chicago; and be it further

Resolved, That the City Council of Chicago in assembly this 11th day of June 1948, extend the felicitations of the city of Chicago to the Polish Roman Catholic Union of America on the Chicago observance of their diamond anniversary; and be it further

Resolved, That a suitably ornamented and engrossed scroll embodying this resolution be designed, executed, and presented to the Polish Roman Catholic Union as a testimonial of the official congratulations and appreciation of the City Council of Chicago.

Public Housing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I voted for the Wolcott housing bill, the cost of which is estimated to be about $20,000,000, as against the estimated cost for the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill. In addition to the excessive cost, my objections to the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill have been well and forcefully stated by Willford I. King, an outstanding economist of New York, as follows:

It provides for more than $7,000,000,000 to put Government into housing permanently, in addition to the appalling sum of $20,000,000,000 loans or subsidies already made.

The public-housing brigades and propagandists misrepresent the facts and confuse the people. Our investigations show that Government housing never goes to the really poor, and it has never cleared slums.

Public housing, by offering exemptions from taxation, induces purchase of Government certificates of participation in Government housing and makes possible credit for private building in competition. It destroys free economy which in the United States has provided housing unparalleled elsewhere in the world. It overburdens the general taxpayers, exempts capital from taxation, and grants low rents to political party workers and voters to keep corrupt Government in power. It makes immediate the prospect of a million or more votes that will be cast, and in some districts 100 percent, for the local political party that builds the houses, whether that party is Republican or Democratic. It violates the fundamental principle of Government treating all citizens alike and sets up a mechanism of political favoritism.

Socializing activity in housing, by suppressing private initiative, causes scarcity. That has already proved disastrous in every socialized country in Europe. It can be stopped here only by the most vigorous leadership of those who want to save our form of government. To rush to enactment in the closing days of Congress such vote-buying, politically motivated legislation is a perversion of the functions of Congress.

The Housing Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK BUCHANAN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Ingrid Jewell, from the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette:

TAFT-MARTIN FEUD PERILS HOUSING BILL—OHIOAN AND SPEAKER COLLIDE ON PAY RAISE, AID TO EDUCATION

(By Ingrid Jewell)

WASHINGTON, June 17.—The friction between Senator ROBERT A. TAFT, Republican, Ohio, and Speaker JOSEPH MARTIN, Republican, Massachusetts, is beginning to produce fire.

Senator TAFT is quietly furious because Speaker MARTIN is cutting the heart out of his housing bill.

And Speaker MARTIN is wrathful because the Senator is crowding the House leadership into a corner where it looks bad to the liberals, not only on the housing question, but also on pay raise legislation and Federal aids to education.

HOUSING BILL IN DANGER

On the pay-raise question, the Speaker is committed to support raises for postal employees but not other Federal employees; Senator TAFT has said all Federal employees should get a raise.

And on Federal aid to education, the Senate passed the bill, authored by Senator TAFT, only to have the House leadership prevent a vote on the companion House bill in the Education and Labor Committee.

This animosity between the Senator and the Speaker leads many observers here to think no housing bill will be enacted by this Congress. The Wolcott version which will come up for House consideration probably Friday, is considered by the Senator to be so poor, it is unlikely he would agree to compromise on it.

And the House leadership has been at such pains, such parliamentary intrigue, to make the Wolcott bill weak, it is unlikely that leadership would ever agree to compromise in the direction of the Senate bill.

VITAL SECTIONS ELIMINATED

The version of the Wolcott bill now ready for presentation to the House not only omits the four vital sections on public housing, slum elimination, rural housing, and housing research, but also contains some sections considered bad by the proponents of the Taft bill.

Among these sections are:

1. That which would require cash payments for Government-owned multiple dwellings built as war housing, and now to be sold to private owners.

2. That which would permit owners of large rental developments built under the bill to depreciate them 50 percent in 5 years for income-tax purposes.

The House leadership has barred amendments to the Wolcott bill. The Members will either have to vote it up or down as it stands.

The Housing Fiasco

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK BUCHANAN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette:

THE HOUSING FIASCO

The Republican leadership in the House has resorted to unconscionable procedure in denying the American people an adequate long-range housing program.

After a long, bitter struggle, the House Banking Committee last week approved legislation substantially in accord with the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill. That measure, already passed twice by the Senate, included provisions for public housing, slum clearance, and urban redevelopment. It was a broad approach to this country's greatest domestic need.

But then the Rules Committee, led by Chairman LEO S. ALLEN, vetoed the Banking Committee's action by voting 6 to 2 to table the legislation. Now Chairman WOLCOTT, of the Banking Committee, has come forth with another housing bill, an emasculated document eliminating the public housing features of the T-E-W bill. It is expected to reach the floor under an airtight gag rule. The only hope now for a decent housing bill lies in the meager possibility that eventually the Senate might prevail in a joint conference.

Perhaps the best way to drive home the real nature of the blow the House leadership has dealt ill-housed Americans is to state briefly what it means to the Pittsburgh district.

It means, first, that the Pittsburgh Housing Authority's plans for 7,000 more badly needed low-rent housing units, now on file in Washington, are stymied. The needs of 62,000 families in the district's lower-rent market, like those of thousands of others over the Nation, have been ignored. The 30,000 families actively applying for low-rent housing here can continue to cool their heels.

The House action means that work of Pittsburgh's new urban redevelopment authority is severely handicapped. The law creating the authority provides quite properly that before a blighted area can be cleared for redevelopment, housing provision must be made for persons who will be dislocated. Invariably, such areas are tenanted by those in the lower-income brackets, whose housing needs private industry has been unable to meet. The T-E-W bill would make available funds for the redevelopment work.

The T-E-W bill also provided for a subsidy to bridge the gap between the cost of acquiring land for urban redevelopment and the use value of the land after it is cleared. Moreover, it encouraged private housing projects by guaranteeing returns to large-scale investors like insurance companies.

Now these provisions, constituting the real backbone of a housing bill, have been knocked out by the House leadership.

Apparently the reactionary MARTIN-HALLECK-TABER-ALLEN-WOLCOTT clique in the House cares not how many campaign obstacles it puts in the way of the man its party will nominate next week in Philadelphia.

There Is Need for Fair Play

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. L. BARTLETT

DELEGATE FROM ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, the struggle for Alaska home rule has gone on unremittingly for 81 years. The gains have been all too small. But in the long run the fight will be won. We Alaskans know that but we know too that certain big business interests would rather have it otherwise and have fought tooth and nail, on the skirmish line and on the battle line, against the desires of Alaskans to govern themselves as other Americans are allowed to govern themselves.

The newspapers of Alaska which have spoken out in support of the people and in opposition to these vested interests have not been immune from the general attack.

Under the able, progressive editorship of William L. Baker, the Ketchikan Alaska Chronicle has fearlessly espoused the people's cause. Its reward has not come in increased revenues because evidence accumulates to demonstrate that the advertising revenues of the Chronicle have suffered by reason of the editorial position which it has taken. In a colloquy with me before a subcommittee of the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, Mr. Gilbert W. Skinner, dominant figure in the Alaska shipping industry, admitted his companies had withdrawn their advertising from the Chronicle because of its editorial policy. The episode is recounted in a Chronicle editorial which is reproduced here:

THE IRON CURTAIN: IN RUSSIA AND HERE—IN YOUR ALASKA

We have just received a printed copy of testimony before the subcommittee of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, United States House of Representatives. The Chronicle is mentioned in several places because of the boycott in advertising placed on this newspaper by the Alaska Steamship Co. and Northland Transportation Co.

We think Congress this year should recall to mind the wording of the first amendment to the United States Constitution. "Congress shall make no law," it says, "abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." This would mean, by a straight interpretation, that Congress can grant no subsidies from the Public Treasury to public carriers that abridge freedom of the press by refusing to let the papers in which they spend the people's money comment in a critical manner on their types or conceptions of service and rates.

Admiral F. A. Zeusler stood in our office a few short weeks ago and said he had heard criticism in other parts of Alaska about the Alaska Steamship Co.'s boycotting this newspaper. He wanted to know what it meant * * * "Haven't you been getting our special ads?" We replied that we had been getting those over his signature of an institutional type—but not all of them—and that the daily advertisement of ship schedules had been jerked out several months ago at a cost in lost revenue of $48 per month.

"Well, that doesn't go," replied the admiral, "I'll have our agent reinstate it." He did. But 10 days later word came through from Seattle to cancel the advertising again and this time the cancellation included both the daily ad, which had just been reinstated, and the institutional copy which had been running fairly regularly in this paper. Mr. Zeusler's efforts at playing fair with the press boomeranged in a hurry. We think and hope they were sincere and that someone higher than he caused the cancellation. The loss in revenue is over $100 a month (plus Northland's $30 to $35), which means considerable to us during slack times like these. But what profiteth it a man if he gain the whole world and lose his soul? We prefer Lincoln's version: "Let us have faith that right makes might; and in that faith let us dare to do our duty as we understand it."

The lesson is clear: The steamship companies Mr. Gilbert Skinner dominates do not want the Alaska public to know the full facts, to get both sides. He admitted it in the hearings referred to above. Here is the conversation:

"Mr. BARTLETT (Delegate from Alaska). The allegation was made that the Alaska Steamship Co. and Northland had withdrawn their advertising from the Ketchikan Chronicle because they did not approve of the editorial policies of that paper. Do you want to make any comment on that?

"Mr. SKINNER. Did you ask me if that was true?

"Mr. BARTLETT. No. I invited you to make an observation about that if you cared to.

"Mr. SKINNER. Yes, sir; that was done.

"Mr. BARTLETT. The advertising was withdrawn?

"Mr. SKINNER. Yes, sir.

"Mr. BARTLETT. It was because of the editorial policy of the paper?

"Mr. SKINNER. That is true."

The evidence is clear, so the people may know the methods the two big operators use to tighten their monopoly and boost their rates. In the dim, dark ages the king generally forced the press to obtain a license before it could operate. In return for printing favorable news, the king's printer was rewarded with all kinds of royal printing contracts. He was an agent by special appointment. This is apparently the aim for the press of Alaska, which must not criticize; must not defend the people.

Today's newspaper is protected and encouraged by the courts and the legislatures to criticize and to advocate constructive measures. That is its duty except in Russia where there is an iron curtain and in Alaska where there is almost an iron curtain. Do the people of Alaska want this curtain pulled down a little farther in the next 12 months?

While not denying the right of free enterprise to place its advertising where it chooses to, the Portland Oregonian editorially in commenting on what had been done to the Ketchikan Chronicle called attention to the fact that the steamship lines are being subsidized by the Government:

THE PUBLIC PAYS FOR IT

The Ketchikan Alaska Chronicle is on firm ground in protesting editorially the withdrawal from its pages by the Alaska Steamship Co. and the Northland Transportation Co. of paid advertising. Gilbert Skinner, the Seattle man who heads these firms which monopolize the Alaska trade under permit from the Maritime Commission, testified before a congressional committee that advertising had been withheld from the Chronicle because that newspaper criticized the kind and cost of service Alaska receives under the monopoly.

The point is not that free enterprise has the right to place its advertising where it wishes. It is that the Alaska lines operate under Government subsidy, and yet while expending public funds attempt to deny the right of a newspaper to comment as it thinks best on a subject of public interest. We think the Chronicle is right in stating that this boycott—which was a withdrawal of sailing schedules and policy advertisements previously carried—is an attempt to abridge the freedom of the press, as guaranteed in the first amendment to the Constitution.

The misuse of financial power by a company subsisting on the Public Treasury likewise makes more apparent the need to break the Alaska shipping monopoly so that competition may be introduced by ships loading in ports other than Seattle.

Should there be no restraints on a business which is operating in part because of a subsidy paid for by the taxpayer? Apparently not. Apparently that subsidy can be employed in many diverse ways, as the Chronicle has found out to its financial sorrow.

The Ketchikan Chronicle's fight against odds is related in the editor and publisher column, Shop Talk at Thirty, by Robert Hugh Brown. This column told of not only the withdrawal of advertising of the steamship lines but similar action taken by local advertisers after he had printed a letter in which Mr. James Wooten, president of Alaska Airlines, told of threats made against him by representatives of the canned salmon industry if he continued to testify in favor of and to urge statehood for Alaska. The Shop Talk at Thirty column is reproduced here:

SHOP TALK AT THIRTY

(By Robert H. Brown)

The battle for statehood for Alaska which echoes only faintly in the Halls of Congress and seems very remote from the corners of Forty-second Street and Broadway, is having its repercussions among the few and scattered newspapers within Alaska.

Opponents of statehood, including some of the big business interests there, are violent in their dislike for the opposition, as who might not be, but when it comes to the newspapers they use the easiest weapon at hand—advertising.

We get this information from William L. Baker, publisher of the Ketchikan Chronicle.

Last September a subcommittee of the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee visited Alaska under the leadership of Representative FRED L. CRAWFORD and held statehood hearings in Anchorage. James Wooten, president of Alaska Airlines, whom Baker calls a newcomer to Alaska, made a statement supporting statehood. Later he made an affidavit to the committee, which the Chronicle published with CRAWFORD'S permission, in which it was stated Wooten had been warned by nine different cannerymen to lay off statehood or he would lose their business totaling $400,000 in 1947, chiefly transporting cannery personnel to outposts.

Baker tells us that 4 days after publication of the letter a cannery owner who is a major stockholder in a department store, one of the Chronicle's largest advertisers, was responsible for that store canceling practically all of its Christmas business in the newspaper. The boycott continues, we are told. Other business boycotts have been imposed, Baker says, by traveling salesmen and field agents for nationally advertised products who also place the advertising and are unsympathetic to the Chronicle's statehood appeals.

Baker, in his editorials, fearlessly quotes testimony from the committee hearings to the effect that representatives of the Alaska Steamship Co. admitted their advertising had been withdrawn from the Chronicle because of its editorial policies.

Last year the paper published an 88-page statehood edition which has been bought by 3,000 school, college, and public libraries. Thus was the newspaper's conviction on the issue of statehood broadcast. All but one newspaper in Alaska distributed the section and statehood won 3 to 2 in the referendum, Baker states.

More power to this fighting publisher. Advertiser boycotts are not unknown in the United States. Usually they are attempted against the smallest and weakest newspapers. And the Chronicle's loss of revenue must hurt. The battle has been won by others in the past, and we hope Baker wins in the cause of free editorial expression.

The letter described was written by Mr. Wooten. I know that of my personal knowledge. I know, too, that the threat of loss of business was not an idle one. This year Alaska Airlines is carrying no fishermen from Seattle to Bristol Bay, a business which increased its gross revenues last year by almost half a million dollars. Mr. Wooten and Mr. Raymond W. Marshall, chairman of the board of Alaska Airlines, are to be applauded for their courage in resisting these threats. They have continued to urge statehood despite the huge financial losses such a policy has caused for Alaska Airlines. They know statehood will bring more people and more business to Alaska, and they are ready to stick to their guns no matter what the cost may be.

The power of money unwisely used is a terrific threat to American institutions. No better illustration of that could be furnished than in the circumstances surrounding the Ketchikan Alaska Chronicle and the Alaska Airlines cases.

Hon. Clarence Cannon, of Missouri

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT THOMAS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. THOMAS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, permit me to say a few words about our colleague the gentleman from Missouri, CLARENCE CANNON.

I know of no man who has done more for his district in the fields of rural electrification, support for farm prices, and soil conservation. The present high level of progress in these undertakings is the result of his leadership and hard work. Not only the people of his great agricultural district benefited by his outstanding efforts and good judgment in these fields but also all the farm people throughout the United States. I know that the membership of the House will join me in the hope that the people of Congressman CANNON'S district, and the Nation, will continue to benefit by many more years of his service in Congress.

Hon. Herbert Hoover

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. GLENN BEALL

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. BEALL. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial from the Cumberland News of June 18, 1948:

TIME RAPIDLY WASHING OFF MUD FROM HERBERT HOOVER

It is doubtful if a President of the United States was more bespattered with mud than Herbert Hoover. In a sentence, he was the victim of one of the nastiest of political campaigns. It is now in the process of redress. It began when Senator ALBERT W. HAWKES, of New Jersey, introduced a bill to restore Mr. Hoover's name to the dam on the Colorado River, originally known as the Hoover Dam but designated Boulder Dam by Harold Ickes.

He was blamed for a depression actually caused by forces that were in motion long before he became President. He was politically smeared with such violent terms that during the period after his defeat for reelection until the inauguration of Roosevelt he was set up in the public imagination by Roosevelt and his "brain trust" as a monster who would be responsible for any calamities that might befall by the day Roosevelt took office. He was pictured as heartless, bungling, and reactionary. When he left office he was probably one of the most hated in the Nation's history. His wise and conscientious counsel went unheard.

He had, throughout his term as President, scrupulously refrained from exploiting the Presidency for his personal monetary gain or the profit of members of his family. He had served without pay, but that fact had been kept a secret until long after he returned to private life.

But, getting back to the dam issue. Mr. Hoover had never asked that his name be restored to the dam for which more than any other man he was responsible. Mr. Hoover did not name the dam himself. It was so named by Ray Lyman Wilbur, as Secretary of the Interior, in 1930. The Roosevelt Dam, the Wilson Dam, and the Coolidge Dam all had been named for incumbents. The Roosevelt in this case was Theodore Roosevelt. The Norris Dam had been named for Senator Norris while he was in office.

Now, a magazine editor and veteran foreign correspondent, who took some part in spreading anti-Hoover propaganda, has just written a book—Our Unknown Ex-President. It was given a brief review in this newspaper, and on this page, several days ago by Columnist George E. Sokolsky. The book is by Eugene Lyons.

In his book, Mr. Lyons has sought to draw a truer picture of Herbert Hoover; the portrait of a man of dignity and honor and high ability who, rising from humble origin, has crowded into one life span three great careers as an engineer, humanitarian, and public servant. After citing how he had harangued Hoover during the Landon candidacy for President, Mr. Lyons states:

"The marvel to me is that so many men and women are at last coming to an understanding of this amazing man, Hoover. They are beginning to realize what a mistake was made in 1932. Hoover has lived long enough to visualize this change in attitude, to realize he has rewon the respect, if not the affection, of a very large part of the American people."

Mr. Hoover, on learning of the contents of the book, commented that it was a bit embarrassing. He has never been embittered by attack and smear and humiliation. He has remained shy and bashful.

It is gratifying that the book has been written while Mr. Hoover is still with us. Many will agree with Mr. Lyons' conclusion:

"Time is rapidly washing off the mud with which Herbert Hoover has been splattered. The granite of integrity underneath is becoming obvious even to the less perceptive of his countrymen."

Cold War on Israel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW L. SOMERS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. SOMERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to include an editorial, Cold War on Israel, written by Mr. T. O. Thackrey, editor of the New York Post, and which appeared in that publication on June 11, 1948. This editorial calls attention to the present situation in Palestine and the treachery with which the seven Arab nations, financed and led by Great Britain, are conspiring to kill the small and newly organized state of Israel:

COLD WAR ON ISRAEL

(By T. O. Thackrey)

The next 4 weeks will see the greatest concentration of effort to smash Israel's independence by diplomatic conspiracy, taking up where seven Arabian nations, financed and led by Great Britain, failed to exterminate the world's newest democratic nation by force.

The effort will fail.

Israel will never surrender her independence. She will never surrender to again become a chattel of Great Britain. That servitude has been abolished by the blood of men and women and children defending their homes and their freedom with their lives.

But the United States of America has a vital role to play during the weeks immediately ahead.

First, we must make it clear that, just as Great Britain has actively supported the Arab nations—which she created—we intend to equally support our commitments to Israel, which have been iterated and reiterated for more than 30 years.

There is nothing in the truce arrangement which prevents our extending recognition to Israel as a lawful state, and exchanging diplomatic representatives.

That action would serve notice at the outset that we will not be a party to the effort to beguile Israel into surrendering at the council table that which could not be blasted from her in an aggressive war.

Failure to do so, however, will be complete admission that President Truman has wholly abdicated our foreign policy to Foreign Minister Bevin—and that the people of this country will not stand for.

There is another and even more important step which needs to be taken, not a week or 4 weeks from today, but now.

This is notification to Israel and to the United Nations that if the Arabs—and their ally Great Britain—resume their hostile warfare on Israel at the expiration of a truce, the United States will immediately lift the arms embargo to Israel.

The Arab states retain an enormous advantage at the council tables in the absence of such a declaration, for Great Britain has made it clear with deeds as well as words where her sympathies and her support will lie in war, as well as peace.

We have pretended peace and friendship but have acted as enemies would act.

For weary months while murder was being done in Palestine, we prevented Israel from obtaining arms to defend the very lives of her people, permitted Great Britain to embargo immigration to the free nation we called friend, and allowed our citizens and our property to be outraged by any British puppet that cared to show contempt for our stated policies.

Now the real test has come.

The American people demand an American policy toward Israel.

Further, they will make certain, eventually, that Britain receives no American funds to replace those she uses to purchase murder, hostile war of aggression, and to foment anti-Semitism on a Hitlerian scale.

Only action now, while there is time, will bring a real and lasting peace with honor in Palestine. It can be had, in this 4-week period, if we quit playing Bevin's game, and for a change really act like Americans.

Unfair Displaced Persons Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, after many pledges and assurances that relief would be granted to at least 200,000 unfortunate and long-suffering people who have been in displaced-persons camps for nearly 4 years, I was happy that the House originally passed a fairly good bill. Unfortunately, the conferees of the House yielded to the Senate and an extremely discriminatory Senate bill ensued.

It has been charged by many who know that this bill willfully and deliberately discriminates against the Catholics and Jews, and grants special privileges and favors to the Nazis by permitting a greater number of them to come to the United States, which in turn will deprive many of the most-deserving people from coming to our country.

The members of the Committee on the Judiciary, who were also members of the conference committee, in their reports and speeches on the floor have fully explained the discriminatory provision in the bill so I shall not repeat their statements.

However, I insist that this bill will not admit deserving people and it will not help the displaced persons in the main; but who will it help? I will tell you—it will help the Volkdeutsche. For 2 years you are going to take the combined quotas for Germany and Austria, and you are going to issue an engraved invitation to the Volkdeutsche to come in to the extent of 50 percent of those combined quotas. You will thus admit 27,000 of them.

Who are the Volkdeutsches? You ought to know something about them. They were the advance guard who fertilized the field for Hitler's Panzer divisions. They were the natives, citizens, and subjects of Czechoslovakia, Poland, Holland Belgium, Hungary, Rumania, of German ethnic origin. They were what Hitler called the Herrenvolk. They were like the German-American bunds in the United States who turned against the Allies. These Volkdeutsche did all in their power to make it easy for Hitler's advance. Hitler's capture and overrunning of Czechoslovakia and Poland was made far easier for him because of the fifth-column work that was done by these Volkdeutsches. Fritz Henlein was their leader and the main quisling. If Hitler were alive today, he could qualify. He was born in Austria of German ethnic origin.

Are we going to forget so soon the purpose for which this recent war was fought? Are we going to admit these people against whom our veterans fought, bled, and died, and went through the valley of the shadow? I cannot subscribe to this kind of procedure. This is the uttermost injustice.

Mr. Speaker, I am inserting as part of my remarks an editorial which appeared in the New York Times on June 19, 1948, entitled, "A Shameful DP Bill," and a portion of an article written by Walter H. Waggoner appearing in the New York Times, of June 19, 1948.

They read as follows:

A SHAMEFUL DP BILL

Eighteen months ago a humanitarian drive, worthy of the best traditions of this country, was begun to save some of the lives of 850,000 men, women, and children in the displaced persons camps of Europe. With sweeping support of Americans in every walk of life and of civic, Government, labor, and religious groups, the Stratton bill emerged, symbolizing the highest principles as a basis for taking a fair share of the DP's—400,000 over a 4-year period on the concept of justice for each group of DP's.

That bill died in committee, and two bills subsequently took the Stratton bill's place. In the House, a more moderate bill, but nevertheless humane, was sponsored by Representative FRANK FELLOWS, to admit 200,000 DP's over a 2-year period. In the Senate a bill written by Senators REVERCOMB and WILEY was the antithesis of humanitarianism and deliberately sought to scuttle every high concept of either of the House bills. It cruelly favored one DP group above another, injected the religious issue, and because of its unworkable administrative provisions was a bill of exclusion rather than admission of DP's.

This week has brought a shameful victory for this latter school of bigotry. A joint conference committee approved virtually every narrow concept of the Senate measure and the House yesterday endorsed the conference report.

It is to their honor that four of the Senate-House conferees refused to sign the bill—Senators FERGUSON and KILGORE, and Representatives BOGGS and CELLER. This DP bill's main provisions are these: 205,000 DP's shall be permitted to enter over the next 2-year period, including 3,000 war orphans; 40 percent of admissions shall be allotted to DP nationals of the Baltic states and Poland east of the Curzon line; 30 percent of admissions shall go to farmers, discriminating against other skills; those not in the camps by December 22, 1945, are not eligible for admission, discriminating against the bulk of Jewish DP's, who suffered the most cruelly during the war. Even the Volks Deutsche are given a boost—permitting these persons of German ethnic origin, many of whom had strong Nazi ties, to compete for regular quota numbers with bona fide DP's.

This is a sad conclusion. There is also no assurance that the 100,000 proposed for the first year's admissions will come into the country, because of the bill's unworkability. Perhaps most significant, this triumph for the Revercomb group holds disturbing portents for the future. Good bills have gone down the drain; a bad bill and a bad precedent bode ill for democracy, which finds discrimination on its books repugnant.

HOUSE VOTES BILL TO AID DISPLACED—BUT COMPROMISE ADMITTING UP TO 200,000 MEETING RULES IS DELAYED IN THE SENATE

The bill, which would finally become law by Senate acceptance, was agreed upon in a Senate-House conference committee last evening. It provides for the admission into the United States in the next 2 years of up to 200,000 displaced persons meeting certain national and employment specifications, 2,000 Czechs who have fled their Communist government, 3,000 orphans under 16 years of age, and up to 15,000 eligible DP's now in this country on temporary visas.

DP COMPROMISE DENOUNCED—SENATE-HOUSE BILL A BETRAYAL, LEADERS HERE DECLARE

Jewish leaders here denounced yesterday the compromise displaced persons bill drawn up by a Senate-House conference committee Thursday night and approved by the House of Representatives. They called it discriminatory against Jews and Catholics and urged Congress to enact more equitable legislation.

Joseph M. Proskauer, president of the American Jewish Committee, said the compromise bill had "all the evils and little of the good of either the Senate or House measures." It constitutes "a betrayal of our basic American traditions," he said.

"Through ignorance or design," he explained, "this legislation in effect aims at deliberate exclusion of Jews and to a lesser extent of Catholics now languishing in displaced persons camps in Europe."

Former Gov. Herbert H. Lehman declared the compromise bill retained "most of the indefensible discriminatory restrictions" of the measure that had been passed by the Senate. In a prepared statement the former Governor said it was "a shock and a disappointment" to all who had hoped this country would assume world leadership in the solution of the DP problem.

He asserted that "the bill deliberately creates a barrier against Catholics and Jews and against the very men, women, and children who through suffering and record of sacrifice deserve fair and sympathetic treatment by our lawmakers."

Rabbi Irving Miller, chairman of the executive committee of the American Jewish Congress, asked congressional leaders to reject the compromise and enact legislation to "expedite and not hinder the immigration of displaced persons."

According to Rabbi Miller, the bill is "a legislative monstrosity which will work irreparable injury to the international prestige of the United States."

The Antitrust Laws Must Be Revised—Healthy Competition, Not Monopoly, Has Made Possible American Know-How, Initiative, and Invention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a bill designed to correct what I deem to be an important tightening of our antitrust laws. While I realize that it is being introduced late in the session and has little or no chance of passage now, I think that this is a measure that should be taken up at the beginning of the next Congress or if we should be called into recessed session this year, it should at that time be considered.

The purpose of the bill is to prevent the creation of monopolies and the substantial lessening of competition in interstate commerce through the acquisition by a corporation of the assets of its competitors.

In 1926 the Supreme Court, in a decision covering three section 7 cases, declared that if the acquiring corporation had so used its stock purchases as to secure title to physical assets of the corporation acquired before the Federal Trade Commission issued its complaint, an order by the Commission was improvident. In 1934 the interpretation of the law respecting acquisitions of stock control, which were subsequently converted into outright purchase of assets, was extended by the Supreme Court, which held that if an acquiring corporation secured title to the physical assets of a corporation whose stock it had acquired before the Federal Trade Commission issues its final order, the Commission lacks power to direct divestiture of the physical assets, even though the acquisition of stock control may have fallen within the prohibitions of section 7 of the Clayton Act.

The testimony before the Federal Trade Commission reveals that during the past 4 years, particularly since the war, there have been 1,800 major acquisitions of manufacturing and mining corporations. A large part of these acquisitions have been made by the large corporations. The testimony shows a definite monopoly trend. Even before the postwar merger movement the Federal Trade Commission found a marked tendency toward concentration.

At the end of 1945 the 62 largest listed corporations held $8,400,000,000 of net working capital, which was largely in highly liquid form. This amount was sufficient to purchase the assets of nearly 90 percent of the total number of all manufacturing corporations in the United States—see Senate Document 17, page 6. It is only reasonable to assume that unless this amendment to section 7 of the Clayton Act is enacted into law, these corporations will continue to use a substantial part of their cash on hand to buy their competitors and thus accentuate the rapidly growing trend toward monopolization.

The National Resources Committee, which made an exhaustive study of many elements of the national economy during the thirties, estimated that in 1909 the 200 largest nonbanking corporations owned about one-third of all corporation assets in the United States. By 1928 they owned 48 percent of the total and by the early thirties the proportion increased to 55 percent.

If the tendency toward monopoly continues, it will crush the initiative of small business. A proper understanding of free enterprise would restrain an all-powerful monopoly that could crush all competitors in the market place. Free enterprise like free speech has limitations. Under the guise of free speech you cannot shout "fire" in a theater. Under the guise of free enterprise a powerful monopoly should not be permitted to crush all competition in fields where there should be competition. Absolute free enterprise is the law of the jungle where might makes right and prescribes all the rules of the game. Small business should be encouraged, not overwhelmed. Small business has made America great.

We do not want big government and we do not want business so big that it is monopolized in the hands of a very few.

Mr. KEFAUVER introduced a similar bill at the last session. I intend to press for its enactment at the earliest opportunity afforded.

Brooklyn Will Miss Him

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appeared in the Brooklyn Eagle:

BROOKLYN WILL MISS HIM

Brooklyn will not seem like Brooklyn with Peter J. McGuinness gone.

That was the name of the man whose great heart stopped beating in St. Catherine's Hospital just before midnight last night—but nobody ever called him by his full name. To all his friends—and they were numbered by the thousands—he was Pete McGuinness.

He was Pete, the politician. He was so meticulously honest that in more than a quarter century of political battling, no one ever raised the whisper of a suspicion of a dishonest penny maneuvered by Pete to his own benefit.

He was Pete the forthright, who spoke what was on his mind, in his own language and his own words. He was Greenpoint's picturesque Pete, who talked of Greenpoint as the "garden spot of the universe" because to him it was just that, and if it was not yet the perfect garden spot, he aimed and worked to make it so. He was Pete the friend of all the hard-working people in and around Greenpoint, whom Greenpoint's people—the factory workers and the small-business men and the day laborers and all the rest—loved because he loved them and was ready at the drop of the proverbial hat to fight for them.

Sometimes his grammar faltered, but his great heart never did. His death is a loss to which Greenpoint and Brooklyn will not for a long time become resigned.

Conferences in Fourth District, Ohio

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM M. McCULLOCH
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I am of the opinion that a Congressman should visit and confer with his constituents as often as time will allow.

I was elected to Congress at a special election on November 4, 1947. The Congress has been in session almost continuously since that date and there has been no opportunity for visits or conferences.

When Congress adjourns I expect to return home and to be available for conference with constituents in the common pleas court room of each county seat between 9 a. m. and 4 p. m., in accordance with the following schedule:

Lima, Allen County: August 17 and 18.

Wapakoneta, Auglaize County: August 19 and 20.

Greenville, Darke County: August 24 and 25.

Troy, Miami County: August 26 and 27.

Celina, Mercer County: August 30 and 31.

Sidney, Shelby County: September 1 and 2.

No appointments will be necessary and any problem or opinion touching official duties will be a proper subject for conference.

Of course, I will be available for conference in my Piqua office during the entire time that the Congress is in adjournment.

Exports

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK B. KEEFE
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

JUNE 9, 1948.

Re exports.
Hon. FRANK KEEFE,
Member of Congress,
Oshkosh, Wis.

DEAR SIR: We previously corresponded with you on this subject, but to no avail.

The condition to which we called your attention has by no means improved, but is steadily becoming more and more aggravating.

The handwriting on the wall likewise is clearer and clearer. In addressing you again on this subject we are not merely concerned about business, but there are far more important factors to be considered which we will soon come to face.

This is a lengthy letter. Please read it. We are not pleading an individual cause.

When referring to "our business" in this letter we are merely using it to bring out actual facts.

Our business is to manufacture machinery and we are primarily occupied with the manufacture of wrapping machines—approximately 90 percent of our production—and also bread-slicing machines, which we produce to operate in conjunction with our automatic bread-wrapping machines, one of the several types of wrapping machines we manufacture.

Our business for many years, prior to World War II was world-wide and our greatest exports were to England, approximately 20 percent of our production.

At the start of the war we turned over all our facilities and personnel to war production 100 percent.

At the end of the war, like thousands of others, we converted to civilian production 100 percent.

At about the same time we had word from our London agents they had a backlog of orders for Hayssen wrapping machines but that the situation was such that they could not import our machines, and that, as the picture unfolds led to conversation, meetings, letters, cables—all further leading to the idea of manufacturing Hayssen wrapping machines in England.

Now that appears ordinary business procedure and should cause no alarm when it is viewed as only a single case, but the rub is that hundreds, probably thousands, of such business deals have already been consummated and more are in the process of being closed.

What about this? Nothing at all while we are riding the crest of sham prosperity and being lulled into deeper sleep by false sense of security.

Our company is only the foothill of the mountains of this Nation. Like other manufacturers we have been doing very well since the start of the war and probably would not be very much concerned about this situation if it were not for the months of November, December, 1947, and January, February, March, 1948, when we found the backlog of orders had suddenly melted away to a point where we were compelled to discharge an ample number of employees, reduce working hours, all against the face of a rising buyers' market and naturally disgruntled employees—mind you, not yet threatening.

Then matters changed—reasons are well apparent to you—Marshall plan, war talk, etc.

Once again we are busily engaged in manufacturing our machines on full-time basis—not too seriously concerned about exports to noncontiguous countries—and again we have that sense of security, but we do not become aware of the falsity of this sense until we begin to look into the future and start considering the over-all picture and realize the pitfall up ahead.

To give and help our neighbors is Godliness. To give some of ours and the all of some others is not Godliness, it is sincere foolishness and spells chaos.

Our company is but an example. We are situated in a community of some 40,000 inhabitants and average employment is 100 persons. We have already explained the nature of our business and relationship to export.

The export business to England has been cut off entirely. Up to recently we have enjoyed some export business with Australia, New Zealand, Belgium, Switzerland. This export business has also been cut off and you can easily surmise the reasons given—no dollars.

Our Canadian representatives have been indicating the same for the past several weeks, though we are still fortunate in being able to ship machines to that country.

To cap this we are approached personally and through the mails to make provisions for the manufacture of our machines in these foreign countries and if it is not with the gesture that others are planning to copy the machine if we do not step in and make arrangements for the manufacture of these machines for a paltry commission, it is an outright threat that unless we concede to such plan the machines will be copied outright and built with or without our approval.

Unfortunately we are helpless to do anything about this—one way or the other—either to go over there and establish manufacturing branches or to stop any action of copying and building our machines.

As we have already intimated—we are busily engaged here flooding the markets with machines to businesses that are riding a crest of false prosperity. Naturally we find it impossible to do both, although it would not be impossible to step up production with equipment, machinery and trained personnel that we have available to handle the export market from here.

The point we are trying to bring out in this connection is twofold—

1. While we are being lulled into a deep sleep of security by this false sense of prosperity we are likely liable to lose a great deal of our export business through establishment of branch manufacturing plants in foreign countries or through outright carrying out of threats by copying and building machines by others over there, which will only be made possible and profitable in such cases where manufacturers over here refuse or cannot otherwise comply—regardless of threats to go over there to manufacture.

2. The labor problem will not be felt as long as we ride on the crest of this false prosperity, but which sooner or later will come to an end—when we have given as much as some of "ours" that we can give and the all of "some others"—labor.

Let us go back to our company. That labor problem—as far as exports alone are concerned—may be anywhere from 15 to 25 percent of our employment and just so many families will be out in the cold unless they can be absorbed by other industries and that is very questionable when that situation arises.

The manufacturer will suffer some profit losses—some of the more unfortunate by these tragic events will lose all.

Now, it should not be overlooked that we are but one of many others who are being approached in this manner—some have acquiesced to these demands—others are sitting on edge and can be saved if action is not long in coming.

We are not entirely adverse to the idea of lending a helping hand to those in need, but that help should not be to the utter detriment of the giver.

It is probably too late to save us in our predicament because we have already been handed an ultimatum that if we did not agree to come over there to manufacture or otherwise send them complete drawings, jigs, dies, etc., or detailed drawings to manufacture the same, they would commence to copy our machines as of May 15, 1948.

It may be interesting to note that we have offered to temporarily trade our machines for commodities, but that has been turned down as an unsatisfactory proposition and in the course of the same conversation we have been informed that they were only interested in selling for cash and recalling cash balances so accumulated to their country immediately.

While there may be no crying demand for export business, it is nevertheless important that we strive to keep what we have even if it is necessary in helping to reestablish others on a footing to give them additional help.

It would be sheer folly, however, in helping others to create adverse conditions here and moreover establish direct competition with ourselves after we have accomplished our mission.

Summing this up in a single paragraph, conditions now are such that we are being rocked to sleep by a false sense of security through the creation of sham prosperity by distribution of materials and wealth throughout the world. This situation, however, cannot continue for an indefinite period. As a progressive people we can and will recuperate given a fighting chance but we will not be so happily situated if after we wake up with a sudden jolt we find ourselves competing with the rest of the world building and offering the very products we previously exported to them, the know how and manufacture of which they obtained through duress, threats, unfair and unbusinesslike methods.

The matter, in our opinion, is serious and, as already intimated, unless curbed in time will prove a boomerang to business and a serious blow to labor.

The case here is only briefly stated with belated question, Will we be prepared for the loss of this export trade? How will business and labor take this set-back?

Copies of this letter will be mailed to various governmental heads and to others who might be interested.

We will appreciate hearing from you in this connection. We would like to know your reaction to this, and if any action is contemplated.

Yours very truly,
HAYSSEN MANUFACTURING CO.,
F. HORWITZ.

New Johnsonville Steam Plant Only Temporarily Lost

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, we Members from the Tennessee Valley are terribly saddened with the vote that has just been cast where, by a majority of 15, we have lost during this session the appropriation for the steam plant at New Johnsonville, Tenn. Only a further refusal of the Senate and a change of several votes in the House can now save this necessary project. This seems unlikely.

We did the best we could in the House. Every Member was contacted and the facts justifying the project were presented. We thought we had enough votes to win. The Republican leadership in the House, however, decided to make a vigorous party fight over this issue. The leadership of the majority put heavy pressure on several Members whom we expected to vote with us. The whip was cracked again and again—and we lost.

But it is a temporary loss only. The power requirements of the valley, the needs of national defense, and the remarkable record made by TVA weigh heavily in support of this steam plant. The case presented for it was so overwhelming that the force of public opinion, fairness, and good business judgment will require the building of the plant. We must and we will continue our effort until the money is appropriated to commence its construction. We ask that our friends in and out of Congress stand with us and help in our future efforts. We ask that those who voted against the appropriation reconsider the facts. We hope they will come down to the valley and see for themselves the sound progress being made in building up a great section of our country. We want them to study again the necessity of this plant in relation to the airplane, atomic energy and the whole defense program. If they will do this—they will join in correcting the error made here today.

The facts justifying this plant are unanswerable; our position is sound; our case is meritorious and on the good American principle of "doing what's right" this Congress must give this project the go-ahead signal—we must never and we will never give up the fight.

War Housing Disposal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK BUCHANAN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include at the conclusion of my remarks a letter signed by every member of the six-man Republican delegation from Connecticut in the House of Representatives and released to the press in October 1947. This letter registers a strong protest against the sale of permanent war-housing projects in Connecticut under preferences and procedures, almost identical with the preferences and procedures which title II of the so-called Wolcott housing bill—H. R. 6959—passed by the House yesterday would enact into law, on a mandatory basis, with a deadline date, and with no administrative discretion allowed.

It is to be noted that every member of the six-man Republican delegation from Connecticut in the House of Representatives yesterday voted in favor of these preferences and procedures which, on behalf of their constituents, they publicly denounced a short time ago.

I make these brief remarks so that the good people of Connecticut may see that the Republican members of the Connecticut delegation in the House are perfectly willing to promise one way and vote the other way, not only on general matters, but even on specific vital matters affecting their constituents most intimately, in which their promises were individually made and now have them individually broken.

I quote from hearings on investigation, disposition of surplus property:

HEARINGS BEFORE THE SURPLUS PROPERTY SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS, EIGHTIETH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION, PURSUANT TO HOUSE RESOLUTION 90 AND HOUSE RESOLUTION 100

(Part 5)

HEARINGS ON DISPOSAL OF WAR HOUSING UNDER THE PROVISIONS OF THE LANHAM ACT, AS AMENDED, AND HOUSING AND HOME FINANCE AGENCY PUBLIC REGULATION 1, DECEMBER 12, 1947

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Did you three gentlemen vote for the Wolcott bill?

Mr. MILLER. I did not. I spoke against reporting it out of the committee. In my small town the citizens will be asked next week to authorize the expenditure of funds to build 28 houses for veterans. It will be hard to sell them that idea when the Federal Government is selling this housing project in the community.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I voted against the bill myself, because I could foresee situations like this. So you and I see alike on that.

Mr. MILLER. I am for veterans' preference, but at least three of the Legion posts in that district have adopted resolutions opposing the sale under this regulation at this time. Maybe 2 years from now the situation will be different. It would mean the forced removal of nearly 3,000 families in that area.

Mr. FOOTE. I am not complaining particularly about the Wolcott bill. I am complaining about the regulation. I think the nub of the thing is failure to consult and pay some attention to the wishes of the people in the community, which Mr. Foley in his letter says he is bound to do, and says he has done. Under the Lanham Act as originally passed—that was before I came down here—it provided for the disposition of these properties as expeditiously as possible.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Within 2 years after the cessation of hostilities.

Mr. FOOTE. Hostilities, I think, have ceased temporarily.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. The President has not proclaimed a cessation of hostilities within the meaning of the act, but the Wolcott bill supersedes that, in my opinion.

Mr. FOOTE. They have a year and a half to dispose of these projects, and I assumed, and I think the Banking and Currency Committee assumed, that they would not go in a congested area and proceed to sell this Lanham Act property.

Statement of Hon. Antoni N. Sadlak, a Representative in Congress from the State of Connecticut

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am the Congressman at Large in the district. I would merely be emphasizing the same contention that has already been put forward to you. I think we should get on at this meeting to hear the gentlemen who came down here from Plainville.

The genial chairman mentioned there was another Congressman from Connecticut present, JOHN DAVIS LODGE, and if there were no conflict I am sure Mr. PATTERSON and Mr. SEELY-BROWN would also have been present.

Thank you.

Mr. RIZLEY. Congressman LODGE.

Statement of Hon. John Davis Lodge, a Representative in Congress from the State of Connecticut

Mr. LODGE. There is very little I can add. Congressmen MILLER and FOOTE are familiar with the matter.

I would like to stress one phase, and that is that, as I recall, under the Lanham Act public interest is mentioned. It seems to me it isn't in the public interest to dispose of this housing, whether it is done under regulation No. 1 or any other regulation at this time. I think you have to take into consideration the effect the disposal would have. I know in Bridgeport, in my district, housing is practically impossible to find. It might be a good idea to think twice before feeling compelled to dispose of housing of this kind at this particular time.

I thank the chairman and this subcommittee for the opportunity to appear.

Mr. RIZLEY. Thank you, Congressman.

I think we should hear from the housing people first, and then we will hear from the people from Connecticut.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Washington, D. C., October 23, 1947.

Hon. RAYMOND M. FOLEY,
Administrator, Housing and Home Finance Agency,
Social Security Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FOLEY: The State of Connecticut has, as you no doubt know, an acute shortage of housing. During and since the war, there has been a heavy population increase in this State. Housing construction has not kept pace.

It is our understanding that under Public Regulation 1, your agency proposes to dispose of federally owned war housing. This would, of course, mean the eviction of thousands of tenants who would simply have no other place to go. It is our belief that no considerable proportion of these tenants wishes, or is able, to at this time purchase these houses. However, under existing conditions, they may be forced to buy whether they can afford it or not.

Recently, in a letter to his excellency, James L. McConaughy, Governor of the State of Connecticut, you stated, "It is our conclusion that our policies should conform with the wishes of Congress as expressed in these hearings and by the passage of the bill referred to." As a matter of fact, the so-called Wolcott bill which called for the disposition of this housing was not considered by the Senate, and of course was not passed. Consequently, it is difficult at this time for any one to determine the wishes of the Congress.

We believe at this time, when there is a considerable discussion of the necessity for increased Federal aid to housing it would be most unwise to dispose of the presently owned Federal projects of the kind described.

We have met with housing commissioners, members of disposition committees, and representatives of tenants, here in Connecticut, and are enclosing, for your information, a copy of a resolution passed at a meeting October 22.

There is also, as you know, a very real problem for persons who might buy this housing in that many of the towns concerned waived all normal zoning and sanitation regulations. Until some adjustment can be made on these matters. It would seem unwise to contemplate sale.

We feel very strongly that insofar as the State of Connecticut is concerned, your agency should withhold action until such time as Congress has the opportunity to act.

We will, very much, appreciate your cooperation.

Yours very sincerely,

RAYMOND E. BALDWIN,
United States Senate.
WILLIAM J. MILLER,
Member of Congress, First District, Connecticut.
ELLSWORTH B. FOOTE,
Member of Congress, Third District, Connecticut.
ANTONI N. SADLAK,
Member of Congress at Large, Connecticut.
HORACE SEELY-BROWN, Jr.,
Member of Congress, Second District, Connecticut.
JAMES T. PATTERSON,
Member of Congress, Fifth District, Connecticut.
JOHN DAVIS LODGE,
Member of Congress, Fourth District, Connecticut.

The Railroad Rate Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALFRED L. BULWINKLE
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I am quoting an editorial from the New York Times of Friday, June 18:

THE RAILROAD RATE BILL

The Eightieth Congress succeeded in writing a new record into legislative history when the House voted, 297 to 102, to override President Truman's veto of the Bulwinkle railroad rate bill, sustaining a similarly one-sided vote in the Senate, for this marked the third time within a week that Congress had defied the President on major legislative issues.

To many it will seem that the President added needlessly to the friction between himself and the Congress when he undertook to negate this measure. The legislation, passed by clear-cut congressional majorities, had the support not only of an overwhelming majority of shippers, business groups, and farm organizations, but of the very Government agency charged with regulating the carriers, the Interstate Commerce Commission. Yet in the face of these facts Mr. Truman elected to go along with the antitrust division of the Justice Department, which has repeatedly given evidence that it seems to enjoy harassing "monopolies" that either have ceased to be monopolies or never were monopolies.

The Bulwinkle bill exempts railroads and other common carriers from prosecution under the antitrust laws for entering into agreements on rates with the sanction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Despite the assertions of the Justice Department, this does not introduce anything that is basically new in railroad rate-making practice.

Rates, in an overwhelming majority of cases, are initiated by the carriers themselves. This measure merely extends statutory sanction to the joint preparation of tariffs by the roads concerned, subject to approval by the ICC. To say, as does Mr. Truman, that this represents "a departure from the present policy of regulated competition" is absurd. The railroads have been subject to antitrust regulation for more than a generation. The only difference between them and most industries is that enforcement was entrusted in their case to the Interstate Commerce Commission instead of the Justice Department. The present legislation, in fact, would probably never have been sought had it not been that the Justice Department insisted on trying to superimpose its own concepts of monopoly on those of the Interstate Commerce Commission, a body infinitely better equipped, both by training and political detachment, to render and enforce intelligent judgments in the highly technical realm of railroad rate making.

Americanization Day Exercises at Jersey City, N. J.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. HART
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, recently I inserted in the RECORD an account of the annual Americanization Day exercises conducted in Jersey City, N. J., under the auspices of the Captain Clinton E. Fisk Post, No. 132, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States. At that time the speech delivered on that occasion by Ray H. Brannaman, commander in chief of the VFW, was not yet in my possession. It having recently come to me, I now include it in this extension of remarks:

It is a privilege for me as commander in chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars to assist the Captain Clinton E. Fisk Post, No. 132, of our organization in making the seventeenth annual Americanization Day parade the most successful and memorable in the history of this inspiring spectacle.

The real value and significance of this demonstration of patriotism and loyalty are to be found, I think, in the very purpose for which this Americanization Day parade was organized. The members of the Captain Clinton E. Fisk Post of the Veterans of Foreign Wars realized that the citizens of your city and State, as well as of the entire Nation, must rededicate themselves to those ideals and principles on which this Nation was founded to combat the insidious and destructive growth of communism in America.

The malignant cancer of communism which has entered the bloodstream of our democracy must be cut out or the body politic of America will surely be destroyed.

Immediately steps must be taken to rid our Federal Government of Communists and their fellow travelers who would incite unrest, inefficiency, and disloyalty leading to the overthrow of our democratic form of government.

Industry, business, and labor must also awake to the danger of communism within their ranks. For there can be no question that many of the strikes, labor-management disputes, unwarranted increase in prices and the creation of deliberate scarcities of essential items were caused by the Communists to sabotage postwar production and prosperity in America and to prevent the economic recovery of the free nations of Europe.

This is the immediate danger which we must acknowledge and resolve. But the final defeat of communism in America and the other free nations of the world depends upon the intelligence, courage, and determination of the youth of our Nation * * * the future leaders of our Republic.

Armed with the intelligence to appreciate the inestimable value of their heritage of freedom and opportunity, the youth of America will exhibit that same courage and determination to defend their heritage, with their lives if necessary, against internal or foreign aggression as have their predecessors throughout the history of this democracy.

It is obvious, however, that appreciation cannot exist without knowledge and understanding. And today in America there is a great need for a revitalization and revamping of our education system to insure a more detailed and thorough teaching of those democratic ideals and principles which are the foundation and strength of our country. If the future welfare, security, and prosperity of America are to be entrusted to today's school children, they must be provided with the tools with which to work.

Unquestionably the greatest weapon we can place at their disposal is an awareness on their part of the terrible price which has been paid for the freedom and opportunities they enjoy. We can endow them with no more powerful defensive force to help safeguard America than the intelligence to evaluate the real menace of communism and other ideologies which advocate the overthrow of our democratic institutions and way of life.

A necessary adjunct to this program of academic education is a healthy environment, physically, socially, and economically.

The foundation of our national life is the individual home. Today in America countless thousands of parents are unable to provide their children with adequate, decent homes because of the desperate housing shortage which exists. The exorbitant high prices charged for even meager shelters has forced other families to curtail or eliminate normal social, educational, and financial advantages which all parents would confer upon their children. These benefits have contributed to the establishment in America of the highest standard of living of any nation in the world. And they are important. At least thousands of our fellow citizens thought enough of them in the past war to give their lives so that they might be preserved.

The Veterans of Foreign Wars also believes that a great deal can be done in each community to expand and improve athletic and recreational facilities which will take our youngsters off the streets and give them the opportunity to learn the practical lesson of cooperation. They will also be taught that basic concept of competition which has characterized our American way of life for more than a century and a half.

This concern for our children's future, translated now into terms of better living conditions, greater supervision of our educational system, increased athletic and recreational facilities, will insure healthier, more mature, intelligent, and responsible citizens. It will also insure that America's future leaders will be wise and determined enough to defend our heritage of freedom against communism or any other foreign ideology which has as its basic purpose the overthrow of our Government and the enslavement of our people.

A rebirth of patriotism and a rededication to the principles which are the foundation and strength of our democratic government are our immediate responsibility. Constant vigilance and a continued determination to make whatever sacrifices are necessary to protect the United States against impending Communist aggression are the price of our independence.

Inadequate national security and a policy of isolation, appeasement, or indifference can cause America to be invaded and defeated today, even as we wait for our children to come of age and assume their responsibility for defending our Republic tomorrow.

Reciprocal Trade Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. KUNKEL
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include my radio broadcast transmitted over Station WHP, Harrisburg, Pa., on May 29, 1948, relating to the extension of the reciprocal trade program:

This week the Republican Congress approved a further extension of the reciprocal trade program. This was done despite every effort by the Democrats to end the reciprocal trade policy. Every action taken by them was calculated to destroy completely this governmental policy of ours and at the same time to throw the responsibility for so doing upon the Republicans.

I thoroughly believe in the principles behind the reciprocal trade treaties. Indeed, after my studies in connection with conditions in Europe, as a member of the Herter committee, I am convinced that it is essential to the welfare of the United States for us to import much more than we have in the past. If we are ever to receive actual payment for the goods we export, then we must give foreign nations the opportunity to ship their products to us. Unless we take these imports and fit them in with our economy it will be difficult to carry to fulfillment the objectives of the European recovery program or to establish a sensible postwar world.

My personal belief is that President Truman, the Democratic leadership of the House, and the opposition were disappointed not because the present bill was a bad one but because the bill reported by the Ways and Means Committee was such a good bill. It was not open to any legitimate criticism by any proponent or advocate of trade treaties. The attack on this principle was based entirely on the theory that the extension had to be "as is" for a 3-year term. While the two changes made were assailed as crippling, it is not easy for any fair-minded person to see how they can, in fact, fail to improve and safeguard the trade-treaty policy.

Let us examine the disputed points in the new bill.

First of all, there is the question of whether it should be an extension of 1 year or 3 years. In answering this, do remember that the length of the extension does not affect existing treaties. All treaties, either concluded in the past or to be concluded during the time of extension, are valid until canceled by a President of the United States. They do not even die automatically when the other contracting nation (as in the case of Mexico) cancels its concessions. Now, a 3-year extension would have bypassed the Eighty-first Congress—the next one. In past five extensions of the trade treaties even the Democrats only once have proposed an extension which would have bypassed a full Congress. Furthermore, you cannot bypass a Congress even though you would like to do so because each Congress can legislate for itself. Therefore, any argument for a 3-year extension is completely invalid.

At first I thought a 2-year extension would be preferable; after hearing the arguments, I changed my mind. A new President, as well as a new Congress, will be inaugurated next year. They should be able to make their recommendations on this important subject. If President Truman is reelected, then he can call the turn. Every Republican Presidential candidate has endorsed the trade-treaties agreements principle. If elected, the Republican President should be given a chance to say how it should be applied.

There are two additional important arguments in favor of a 1-year extension. Under the European recovery program, with which the principal of reciprocal trade is correlated, the so-called Watchdog Committee set up to survey the operations of the Economic Cooperation Administration, must report to Congress on its operations and make recommendations for changes during the early part of the next session of Congress. Thus the present termination of the extended Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act will coincide in time with the report to Congress on this matter, so intimately tied up with the questions involved in international trade. This is a most natural and happy result.

In addition, the next Congress is to consider the charter of the International Trade Organization. This body has been working on the general principles of international trade for many months, both at Geneva and later in Habana. If it adopts a program, legislation of a permanent character relating to our trade with other nations will be required. At that time it will be essential that we review completely our present trade program and policies. This would be true whether the extension had been for 1, 2, or 3 years.

Those two things—I shall not go into detail about them because of lack of time—are intimately connected with the ultimate objectives of the reciprocity program. They should all be considered together and weighed together. A 1-year extension assures that this will be done. The other changes are in the administrative process. The Tariff Commission is substituted for the Committee on Reciprocity Information. Previously the CRI, established by Executive order and composed of representatives of interested executive departments, held hearings. It was conclusively shown that this Committee never made any recommendations. The members were not paid, they were merely picked from the Government agencies. They did not even keep a record of the testimony given to them in most cases. They merely sat, looked wise, and listened to explanation—or pretended to—from representatives of American business, agriculture, industry, and labor. They never prepared a report. The members were not even permanent. The President or the State Department could change them at will and did so.

In place of this the Tariff Commission, a nonpartisan body appointed by the President and composed of three Republicans and three Democrats, has been substituted. This body is composed of technical experts chosen because of their knowledge and ability in connection with questions of foreign trade and the tariff. During the years of its existence, the Tariff Commission has been praised by anyone who knows anything about its operations as an organization. It is noted for performing its functions in a disinterested and purely professional way. Since the appointments are made by the Presidents and since practically every member of the present Tariff Commission has been appointed by either President Roosevelt or President Truman, to the great believers in lower tariffs, it is inconceivable that this body would not be most freely disposed toward the principle of lowering tariffs. The argument that the Tariff Commission would act in a manner to sabotage the trade-treaties program is ridiculous under the circumstances.

Now, the Committee on Reciprocity Information has no power or authority whatever. The Tariff Commission, under the terms of the House bill, is charged with the duty of recommending to the President the limit to which tariffs can be lowered and the limits to which they can be raised. If within these limits so recommended—and these recommendations are secret—the President can negotiate freely and make final and binding agreements. The Tariff Commission is charged with the duty of keeping in mind the national welfare and the national defense in judging how far tariffs can either be raised or lowered. Let us suppose the President does not want to follow the advice of the Tariff Commission. This is the second change in the act. The President can, if he so desires, reduce or raise tariffs below the limit set by the Tariff Commission. But, if he does so, then the final agreement must come before the Congress for disapproval. If both Houses of Congress—the Senate and the House—acting individually, disapprove the agreement made by the President then it is invalid. If the President can command the majority in either House, then the agreements he concluded cannot go into effect. This is the same principle embodied in the Reorganization Act which President Roosevelt requested and which the Congress enacted.

The President initiates the agreements exactly as he does today but if he goes beyond the limits recommended by the Tariff Commission, then he must submit the matter to the Congress with his reasons for doing so—and presumably they would have to be good reasons if he has done so—and then the Congress has the opportunity of disapproving the agreement if (1) it does so within 60 days, and (2) if both Houses give a majority vote against it.

As a matter of fact, this entire issue is more or less moot. The tariff is a means of controlling foreign trade in these days of import-export controls, distorted currencies, embargoes and subsidies. People with whom I have discussed this problem—both in this country and in foreign countries, including people in the State Department, agree that little, if anything, can be done within the next 5 years. This is not the fault of the United States. It is the fault of world conditions. Furthermore, the United States has already negotiated trade agreements to the hilt. We have used up practically all the authority given to the President. Any further trade agreements which might be concluded would be limited in scope. So, the whole problem is more academic than real.

There can be no real free trade in the world until war and the threat of war has been removed. As long as there is a probability of war, countries will place embargoes and restrictions on the raw materials and commodities essential to their national defense. The reciprocal trade treaties were claimed to have been a prevention of war. They have been in effect for some years. The result was World War II. When you argue that trade treaties prevent war you are putting the cart before the horse. After you take the necessary steps to end all wars, then there is a real opportunity to improve trading conditions throughout the world.

Now, let me summarize the benefits from the present bill as contrasted with just a simple extension.

1. It will take the trade treaties and foreign trade and commerce problem from a partisan administration for all time to come. It will make it an impartial national policy which all can support.

2. It will tell the world that our country intends a bypartisan individual determination of the economic facts involved in these treaties.

3. It will tell the world that if there is a real controversy, the ultimate decision will be made by the elected representatives of the people. In other words, that our international cooperation depends not only upon the President, but upon the continued cooperation of the President with Congress in protecting our own economy and our national security.

4. It will remove the doubts concerning the constitutionality of the whole trade treaties program. Congress has always been considered to have control over foreign commerce. Whether Congress could completely delegate this authority to the Executive is a question which has puzzled some of our best lawyers. By placing certain limits, tenuous as they may be, upon the authority this question of a complete delegation of legislative authority to the Executive is eliminated. In other words, the program is changed from one probably unconstitutional into a similar program having all the advantages of the former program but in a manner which is clearly constitutional. The administration should welcome this because the one thing which would really ruin the whole policy would be a Supreme Court decision holding the program unconstitutional. That would not only end the program but it would void every agreement previously made.

The Late Fred Richardson

OF
HON. E. E. COX
OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, when Fred Richardson, fatigued with life and exhausted from toil, bade this world farewell and his spirit passed through the Golden Gate and heard the heavenly accolade "Well done, thou good and faithful servant," the Nation lost a valued citizen and the Congress a devoted friend.

For more than 30 years this good man devoted the energies of his body and mind without stint and without limit to the cause of good government. Like the lighthouse to the lost mariner, he served as the guide and counselor to many people bearing the heavy responsibility for the proper conduct of the people's business and the enactment of just laws.

He was a profound student of government and believed, as the great Jefferson said, that "The art of government consists in the art of being honest."

The character of our departed friend was built upon the eternal rock of principle and truth, and from the course pointed out by his high sense of right he never departed. He was wise in resolution and patient in performance, always mild, always merciful, always strong, always good. His great talents he consecrated to honest aims, and for no reward except that which comes with a consciousness of work well done. His was a heart and mind that was filled with love and joy and worship. May God bless his memory.

America Needs More TVA's

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following remarks made by me in debate with Congressman BEN F. JENSEN, of Iowa, over the Columbia Broadcasting System:

Public ownership of power is desirable, for it is the only proven method by which the power potentials and rich resources of the great river valleys of our Nation can be fully developed for the benefit of the American people. The great flood in Oregon and the terrible destruction and loss of life which followed in its wake once again underscores the immutable fact that these rivers and the wild energy which pours through them must be harnessed. They can only be harnessed by an over-all coordinated approach on a regional basis, made possible by publicly owned projects such as the Tennessee Valley Authority.

The rivers of the United States belong to the people—that is provided for in the Constitution. It is the Government's duty to develop these rivers for the use of the people. Public ownership of power is not socialization but fully in keeping with the intent of the Constitution.

A headlong attack has now been launched by an association of private power companies on public ownership of power in general, and the Tennessee Valley Authority in particular. Headed by a $65,000 a year lobbyist Purcell Smith, a former head of a private power company once controlled by Samuel Insull, this group approaches the subject of power purely from the standpoint of rates. Here we find the very crux of the entire question of public versus private ownership of power. The Federal Government which is after all the people's Government responsible to the people, approaches the ownership of power from the larger standpoint of developing the great river valleys of our Nation—to stimulate free enterprise in the development of new industry, to bring cheap electricity to the farms, to rehabilitate the soil through fertilizer programs and check its erosion by flood control.

This is the kind of free enterprise and progress our forefathers brought to the early pioneering of America. It is one of the very purposes for which our democracy was born. * * * for such a vast undertaking as the development of a great river valley and the area surrounding it can only be accomplished fully by public ownership through the Federal Government, as exemplified by the Tennessee Valley Authority. It is obvious to all that private power interests have never had the motive, the facilities or finances for the execution of vast multi-purpose development of our Nation's river valleys.

As a Tennessee Congressman I have been privileged to take an active part with many of my colleagues in Congress in seeing to it that the Tennessee Valley Authority was allowed to progress and develop to the best interests of all of the people.

In 1933 the Tennessee River was almost useless for navigation, its power resources were undeveloped, its turbulent waters were a danger both in the valley and beyond the river's mouth, along the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. The economy of the region was almost wholly based on agriculture and the land, which supported the people, was approaching exhaustion. Great forests and farm woodlands alike were depleted. Abandoned farms, barren and eroded hillsides scarred the landscape and foreshadowed a future of poverty and despair. In but a short span of years the Tennessee Valley Authority publicly owned power changed all this. In 1933 before TVA in the dark age of private power ownership, one farm in 23 had electricity. Now every other farm in the area is served and we look forward to the day, in the near future, when every farm will have electricity. More than 1,800 new manufacturing and processing plants have been established in the Tennessee Valley. Only four have actually moved in from other areas of the country. During the war years this area played a leading role in the production of things vital to the war effort.

The small clique of private power interests would have you believe that they speak for free enterprise, but the people are familiar with this Samuel Insull brand of free enterprise, the kind of free enterprise that produces enough profit to pay $65,000-a-year lobbyists and places quarter-of-a-million-dollar budgets at their disposal with which to attempt the old shell game of pressure politics in the Nation's Capital.

Purcell Smith and his lobby have centered their present attack on the Tennessee Valley Authority's requested appropriation with which to begin construction of a new steam power plant at New Johnsonville, Tenn. Power is one of the essential tools of modern progress; demand for it increases steadily. Present development in the increase of the hydroelectric power will bring the capacity of the TVA system to a total of 3,270,000 kilowatts to meet the rising demands for power in this area. The Tennessee Valley Authority is the sole power supplier for a region of 80,000 square miles. To meet the requirements of more than 800,000 existing consumers of electric power and more than 100,000 additional farms to be served in the next few years, it is vital that the TVA be allowed to build this additional power plant.

The purpose of the act etablishing the TVA in 1933 was to develop the area's resources for the benefit of the people, to promote their prosperity, their enterprises, to raise the level of their incomes and to strengthen the entire Nation by making the valley more productive. The TVA has accomplished all that and can point to a glorious record of accomplishment. Those of us who believe that public ownership of power is in the best American tradition of producing the most good for the most people will see to it that no lobby of private power interests will ever put a lid on the continued healthy development of the Tennessee Valley Authority, which has brought a better life to so many Americans.

Projects like the Tennessee Valley Authority are not subsidized power, as the lobbyists would have you believe * * * the Federal Government investment in TVA has proven to be a good business proposition. It pays its own operating expenses and continues to improve the area it serves. It will fully pay for itself in time out of the reasonable profit it is allowed to make.

To the fatuous charge made by the private power lobby that the public development of regional sections of our Nation throws unjust tax burden upon other parts of the country, I would say this: I believe the people of Tennessee would always expect me, as their elected representative, to lend my wholehearted support to the development of similar projects in other great river valleys of the United States, for I am sure they are convinced, as I am, that progress anywhere in America is progress everywhere in America.

Income Tax Reduction Bill: The Dingell Statement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT L. REEVES, JR.
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. REEVES. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL] has had a wonderful afterthought. In the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at page A3711 he has included remarks relating to a bill he introduced 7 years ago on the subject of Federal income taxes. He has requested that his extension of remarks be added to the remarks he extended in the RECORD on February 2 in rebuttal, he says, to my remarks on the same day. In the permanent RECORD his remarks will appear to have been made in the Committee of the Whole House on February 2. Actually they were written more than 4 months later.

Wholly disregarding the personal reflections against the gentleman from Missouri which the gentleman from Michigan so carefully expressed in his extension of remarks—and they should be disregarded, of course, in all charity—it is quite obvious that the sketchy bill referred to has little to do with the merits of the matter under discussion. It represented such a hasty and superficial approach to the problem of equalizing the income-tax liability of married couples in all States that the Ways and Means Committee gave it exactly the consideration to which it was entitled. They completely ignored it and took no action whatever with respect to it. That is the record, for all who wish to read it. And it made so scanty an impression on the gentleman from Michigan himself that in replying to me on February 2 he did not then even remember having introduced it—and that is the reason for his request that his belated recollection and reference to it on June 10 be placed in the RECORD for February 2 with the rest of his remarks.

For the 7 years after August 2, 1941, when his bill was introduced, the gentleman from Michigan did absolutely nothing about the matter, although his party controlled the Congress and the Ways and Means Committee, and the unfair tax discrimination against married couples in the non-community-property States had become well-nigh intolerable. In all that period the gentleman from Michigan remained completely silent on the subject. That is how he "long labored" over the matter, as he puts it.

I am satisfied with my original statement of the situation. I repeat my challenge of the correctness of the gentleman's statement. What were his exact words? He said that universal income splitting to equalize the Federal tax burden on married couples in all States was—and note his words carefully—"an item of Democratic origin which we proposed in the consideration of H. R. 1—the first tax-reduction bill of 1947." Aside from the fact that that claim is not borne out in any respect he now abandons it completely and moves the date of alleged origin back 5½ years prior to H. R. 1.

It is gratifying to know that the gentleman thinks that "it is quite all right for a freshman Member of Congress to take an interest in important legislation." His leave is neither needed nor asked, but I think he may well regret his slurring implication.

The Late J. Frederick Richardson, Coordinator of Information, House of Representatives

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL STEFAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, the death of J. Frederick Richardson, Coordinator of Information of this House, on May 16, brought sorrow to his scores of friends on either side of the aisle.

More than a quarter of a century ago, "Rich"—as so many of us knew him—came to the Hill as a newspaperman. His adept mastery of the written word, his skilled counsel, his devotion to constitutional government was valued and used alike by committee and by individual Member. It was in those days that he was to raise a banner which he would keep aloft as long as he lived, a banner which bore the device made immortal by Ethan Allan at Ticonderoga, "In the name of the Great Jehovah and the Continental Congress."

He left these Halls to meet the challenge of hard work and brilliant accomplishment which his career held in store for him. But never, in those achievement-packed years, did he forget the indestructible bonds of fellowship which united him to Congress. In his chosen field of endeavor, helping Congress, he was—like Roland—"without master, without peer." When he returned to us last year, as Coordinator of Information, he was received by all of us who knew him and given the welcome accorded the homecoming of a tried and trusted friend.

J. Frederick Richardson was a twentieth century crusader for the America we all serve. Those near to him have suffered a great loss. This Congress is bereaved. Let our monument to his memory be our determination, translated into action, to preserve for all posterity the American way of life to which he gave his selfless devotion.

Constructive Expansion of Social Security

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE P. MILLER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, a veritable blueprint for legislative achievement of constructive expansion of social security has been available to Congress in the form of H. R. 16, Eightieth Congress, first session, known generally as the Townsend program.

It is tragic that the Members of this Eightieth Congress have been denied any opportunity to debate on the floor and to apply these principles to the problems plaguing the lives of millions of United States citizens.

The cost of all Government bureaus, including aid to agriculture and highway construction, is less than one-fifth of the expenditures originated by war. Social welfare, health, and security cry for substantial expansion. In this era of unprecedented prosperity—yet featured by tremendous hardship for those with low fixed income—the forgotten man is the work veteran—a work veteran is a person who has retired after about four decades of economic service or regardless of length of service is incapacitated.

The men who supplied the capital equipment without which the war would have not been won are entitled to retirement payments in return for past services. The active workers of today have inherited the country as a going business concern with farms improved and factories equipped to supply the current standard of life. As a self-respecting economic organization our Nation cannot deny to its retired workers and their dependents a current income to provide comfortable living. In meeting its responsibility to work veterans the Nation may serve its self-interest most and best.

NOT SPENT BY GOVERNMENT BUREAUS

What will the expansion of social security do? It will tend to hold down the peak of excessive capital investment and fill the valley of inadequate long-run consumer demand. In stifling an undesired boom it will avert depression. It will insure continuity of production and investment. The money collected for this purpose is not expended by Government bureaus. Bureaucratic organization is lessened rather than increased. the United States Treasury merely serves as a channel for the diversion of part of the tax money from sources where it would be used largely for investment into the hands of work veterans for goods and services. Since these veterans are numbered mainly among the low-income group, consumer markets may be expected to receive the continuous support essential to continuous production and investment.

POSTWAR BUSINESS ACTIVITY

The adequacy of investment funds is visible to the naked eye in our productive plant reflecting expansion and capacity beyond our dreams. The excesses of investment are confirmed by the periodic booms in the production of capital goods far above the ability of consumers to absorb the output. Most of the analysts of American business trends foresee a post World War II pattern of movement very similar to post World War I. This would mean high business activity extending into the mid-fifties. Large deficits in goods and ample availability of funds combine to confirm this probability. Investment in fixed capital is anticipated to exceed all prudent limits. Then the unavoidable collapse. It is not a happy outlook.

We do not like depressions. We do not like taxes. Which is least to our liking? The depression of the thirties cost us in curtailed output as much as the present national debt. A tax may be productive. The gasoline levy has built our highways. Statesmanship in taxation can create enduring prosperity. Tax revenue to be expended as outlined herein may be the answer to our prayers for an end to boom-and-bust. Many will oppose it because old habits of thought cannot be changed. Many believe or profess to believe that investment is the main road to permanent prosperity. In spite of recurring disasters based on this premise they cling to their views. They do not accept consumption as the mainspring of economic activity. Yet, is there not overwhelming reason to sustain consumption as the means to insure continuous production?

WE COULD DISAPPOINT STALIN

Stalin is said to be waiting for our depression. He appears to feel certain of his ground. We could disappoint him. Perhaps the cue to our success lies in Federal taxes. If a sufficiently large proportion of the national income flows through the United States Treasury to the people, to maintain the required equilibrium between consumption and investment, the era of prosperity may be made perpetual. No longer, then, any fear of a foreign "ism" boring from within. Private enterprise will become invincible from internal or external attack.

Tax collections, as suggested, would not be impounded for administration and expenditure by an expanded bureaucracy, but would go immediately to those whom we have called work veterans for the reason that over a period of 40 years their labors have been responsible for most of the capital equipment which gives to the Nation its current productive capacity. Inherently, these men and women, now retired, are the partners of the active members of our economic society and have earned a share of the current income. The weight of the evidence suggests that such sharing of income would expand the long-run output of the Nation to result in the increase of general per capita income. All should gain.

AN UNBEATABLE TEAM

Our paramount need is a greater degree of stability in economic life. We require protection from the excesses of overexpansion to avoid the disaster of underconsumption. Leaving out of account a major crisis in foreign affairs, all the ingredients of an overinflated business boom are present. Zooming economic activity may continue on its merry way far beyond the confines of rhyme and reason. There is still time to apply restraint and intelligence.

For 160 years we have tried to beat the game of boom and bust—and failed. We have never harnessed consumer spending and investment as a team. Investment is permitted to run far ahead. Finally, we tie investment in its stall for a few years until consumer spending catches up. If we would only harness them together, they should make an unbeatable team.

Failure of Enactment of Federal Aid to Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES B. DEANE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my great disappointment in the refusal on the part of this House to pass at least some token legislation in behalf of that great host of loyal Americans—our faithful and sacrificing school teachers.

This Congress stands indicted. The great majority of our teachers have the same feeling, but this House in the same breath says "No" to our teachers.

Those of us who have labored so long for Federal aid for education depart from this session with the knowledge that at a time of great emergency the leadership of this House shut the door in the face of one of the most loyal, honest, faithful, and patriotic groups of Americans that can be found—I refer to our school teachers scattered throughout the length and breadth of this land.

We shall not stop in our fight for equal opportunities to these devoted school people. I might say we have just begun to fight.

If S. 472—which was passed by the Senate on April 1, 1948—had been enacted into law, it would have authorized the appropriation of $300,000,000 of Federal funds annually for the support of elementary and secondary education in the States. If H. R. 2953—which on July 15, 1947, was favorably reported to the full committee by the House subcommittee on measures relating to education generally—had been enacted, it would have authorized the appropriation of $200,000,000 for the first year of operation of the act and increasing amounts thereafter for the same general purpose as S. 472. The failure of the Eightieth Congress to pass one of these bills, or a similar measure, has resulted in immeasurable loss to the Eighth District of North Carolina, to all the United States, and to the whole world.

It is a great loss in the world struggle of democracy against communistic totalitarianism. Democratic education is the most powerful weapon for use against dictatorship. Ignorance is the breeding ground for the communistic ideology. Thomas Jefferson warned us that "If a nation expects to be ignorant and free in a state of peace, it expects what never was and never will be." H. G. Wells predicted that the fortunes of the world will depend upon the outcome of a race between education and catastrophe.

Democracy cannot function in the United States unless all its citizens obtain the basic education to permit intelligent and informed participation in the work and life of the Nation. We cannot lead the world struggle against communism, nor even preserve our own Republic, unless its people are sufficiently well educated to understand the basic principles of democracy and to apply them to current problems. Furthermore, we cannot win a war, if one should come, unless our people as a whole have superior technical and scientific training to that of the enemy. During World War II the Federal Government found it necessary to spend billions of dollars in training not only military but also civilian personnel in practically all subject fields, at all educational levels. If we continue to leave education almost entirely to the States, we may not win the next war, if there be one, because we shall not have time adequately to educate the whole population.

The failure of the Eightieth Congress to pass a Federal-aid-to-education bill has resulted in a loss to every State in the Union. Let not the Representatives of the rich States deceive themselves with the idea that their States would have contributed most and received least under the measure. The provision of adequate standards of education for all is becoming increasingly necessary to the national well-being. The high mobility of our population makes the educational deficiencies of any locality a national concern. Many thousands of our people migrate annually to wealthy industrial centers from relatively poor areas in which educational facilities are inadequate. Mere enlightened self-interest demands that the richer States protect their citizenship and economic security by promoting the level of education in the poorer communities from which they will inevitably draw a part of their population.

The failure of the Congress to provide for adequate Federal participation in the financing of education causes a continuation of loss to the citizens of the Eighth District of North Carolina. It must continue to educate, besides its own future population, many young people who will move to other parts of the country. This activity is costly even though these young people go out inadequately educated to meet the needs of highly industrialized areas into which they move. Under S. 472 the people of the Eighth District would have received about $2,427,750 of Federal aid to education next year. The Federal Government is not fulfilling its responsibility to the Eighth District to aid in the education of about 104,000 school-age children future citizens of the United States.

Because of the many inquiries I have received from educators from every section of my district on what the proposed legislation on Federal aid to education would mean to them, I give below the estimated allotment of Federal aid to the 12 counties of the Eighth Congressional District under S. 472.

County	Number of children 5 to 17 years of age [1]	Column (2) × $23.40 (estimated Federal allotment per child in North Carolina under S. 472) [2]
(1)	(2)	(3)

Unpunished Murder

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ELLSWORTH B. BUCK
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, a 21-year-old graduate of Kings Point Academy, an officer on an American-flag ship, was recently struck down without warning by a disgruntled messman in a cafe in French territory. Subsequent to the ship's departure, with the assailant aboard, the young officer died of his injuries. The murderer is now at large in this country, immune from arrest or punishment.

The State Department advises that the murderer's extradition is prohibited under a controlling 1909 treaty, as construed by the Supreme Court, because citizens of the contracting nations are exempt from its provisions. I say it is high time for a new treaty or a new Supreme Court ruling.

Amazing as it may seem, Coast Guard authorities are without authority even to relieve this murderer of his seaman's papers. They will continue powerless until S. 1077, approved by the Senate last July, is brought out of the Judiciary Committee and before this House. Until its enactment, disciplinary cases on the Coast Guard docket, involving every crime of violence, now numbering 943, will grow steadily, but no action will be taken to protect the courageous and law-abiding men who man our ships from these hoodlums.

This—when we talk of strengthening our merchant marine.

Government Subsidies for Air Lines

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN F. KENNEDY
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I received a six-page letter the other day from a former Member of this House who now represents the Air Transport Association of the big certificated air lines, attempting to refute the remarks I made on the floor of the House on April 28, on the subject of discrimination against the veterans' air-cargo companies.

I ask permission, Mr. Speaker, to insert into the RECORD, the entire text of Mr. Ramspeck's letter to me, and my reply. While I will not burden this House with a verbal recitation of the details, I wish Mr. Ramspeck's letter to be inserted verbatim, not only for fairness in comparison with my own, but also in deference to his years of distinguished service in this House. This air-transport business has become so important to the taxpayer and the public generally, that Congress should consider clearly the argument of both sides of this controversy.

The heart of the difference between the former Representative from Georgia, who now represents the certificated air lines, and myself, who in this case can be said to represent the interest of the veterans, is really over two matters:

First. Are the public payments to the air lines for carriage of the United States mails excessive, or are they not?

Second. Is there a place in the commerce and security of this country for the newly formed veterans' air-cargo companies, or is there not?

I am very critical, Mr. Speaker, of the fact that the Civil Aeronautics Board has determined that the mail rates of the Big Five be at about 60 cents a ton-mile, and I note with interest that this rate, which the taxpayers are asked to pay, is about five times the CAB rate—13 to 16 cents a ton-mile—which Mr. Ramspeck considers fair for the carriage of cargo. His letter to me does not explain this tremendous difference, and I will gladly insert into the RECORD any information which he gives in the future in reply to my request for an explanation of this difference. It is painfully apparent to me, however, that the taxpayer is being required to pay the air lines not on the basis of services rendered in the carriage of the public mail, but on the basis of the deficits run up by those air lines. This system, in effect, means that those who do the worst, get the most from the Public Treasury.

In contrast to the present subsidy practice, which Mr. Ramspeck evidently approves, I note with interest that the independent air lines that are applying for permission to carry cargo are not asking for any subsidies from the taxpayers.

It is, and has been, my contention, Mr. Speaker, that the public would be relieved of the burden of air line subsidies, which run into millions of dollars per year according to the report of the distinguished Representative from Kansas [Mr. REES], if these air lines were to develop the new cargo business. But they have, in good part, ignored the new cargo business, an assertion supported by the fact that the newly formed veterans' air-cargo company—even though operating on a shaky basis, without capital, and without certificates from the CAB—have carried more freight than all the certificated air lines put together which are backed with $70,000,000 in mail pay per year from the Government.

It is my contention that these newly formed veterans' companies deserve a chance to develop the new air-cargo business which they, more than any other group, have pioneered. That is why on April 28 I said that it was shameful that the CAB had not given a single certificate to any of the veterans' air-freight companies who have been waiting on the CAB's doorstep for over 2 years.

For M-day, the military have stated their needs to be several thousand freight planes. The entire fleet of the certificated air lines, as quoted by Mr. Ramspeck, even admitting for the moment that passenger planes are easily converted to be all-cargo planes, is only around 20 percent of the military requirements. It is, therefore, obvious to me, Mr. Speaker, that every new freight plane that can be brought into our commerce is a necessary addition to the military reserve. Since, according to the Commerce Department, the veterans' companies already possess around 125 cargo planes, and would likely bring into use a great many more if they would receive certificates from the CAB, I naturally conclude that this group would be a significant addition to the security, as well as to the commerce, of this country.

Under unanimous consent, I insert in the RECORD the complete text of the letter to me from Mr. Ramspeck of the Air Transport Association, and the complete text of my own point-by-point rebuttal:

AIR TRANSPORT ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C. May 19, 1948.

Hon. JOHN F. KENNEDY,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. KENNEDY: I am writing you with regard to your recent speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the subject of air freight.

We believe that the sources of some of the data contained in that speech have misled you into incorrect conclusions and we assume that you will, of course, afford an opportunity for both sides of the case to be heard.

There are strong indications that such statements as were contained in your speech, and have appeared in very similar form elsewhere, are part of an effort which has been going on for some time by the air freight carriers to influence the decision of the Civil Aeronautics Board—a semijudicial body—before which the air freight case is pending.

Here are the facts:

1. You refer to the "kicking around" that is being received by the so-called independent air freight carriers. The record shows plainly that quite the reverse of this supposition is true. The Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 demands a certificate of convenience and necessity for any carrier desiring to operate under the act on a common-carrier basis. The independent air carriers, not having granted such certificates, since June 10, 1947, have been operating under an exemption from the Civil Aeronautics Act granted to them by the Civil Aeronautics Board. The exemption affords the independent carriers every advantage enjoyed by the certificated carriers under the terms of the Civil Aeronautics Act. They are allowed to publish schedules, to advertise for and solicit business, in fact to do anything in the air transport business—and all this without the responsibility required of the certificated carriers. The independents have had and have more advantages than any carriers in the history of air transportation. They are not required to service any particular points but can pick the high volume stops at random. The independents have been coddled and pampered as a result of this exemption from the law. They are not required to conform either to the safety or operational requirements rigidly enforced upon the certificated carriers.

It must be remembered that these independent air carriers could not have entered any other form of transportation without certificates of convenience and necessity. For instance, they could not have purchased trucks and gone into the interstate trucking business without full certification and regulation.

They operated as contract carriers for some time before they even applied for certificates as common carriers. By their own testimony they did finally apply because they realized that their operations had become common-carrier operations and they would sooner or later have to obtain certificates.

2. You constantly refer to these independent air carriers as veterans' air lines. The records of application to the Civil Aeronautics Board by these carriers show that only a minute portion of the capital invested in the principal independent carriers' organizations (that is, the five lines which have been considered for certification and who do the vast majority of irregular carrier business) could possibly be referred to as veterans' money. It is true that the independent carriers are attempting to masquerade in GI costumes purely for the purpose of garnering public opinion and sentiment in their favor, but we challenge any of these five independent carriers to show that a major portion of the capital has been provided from the life savings accounts of returning GI's. We believe it will be found that most of the money is being provided by large New York banking concerns, colossal family fortunes, or has been drummed up in stock-selling operations on a purely investment basis. Besides, the certificated air lines employ some 30,000 veterans (approximately 30 percent of the total employment). The importance of the success of the industry to these 30,000 wage earners is probably greater than the few stockholders in the independent game.

3. You refer to the fact that the Civil Aeronautics Board has been slow to act with reference to certification of the independent air carriers. If the CAB has been deliberate, it has been acting in line with the recommendations proffered it by the President's Air Policy Committee and the Congressional Aviation Policy Board, which strongly asked that the air freight-air cargo subject be dealt with carefully and deliberately and with a full recognition of economics, safety, and operations.

4. You refer to the national-defense aspect of the independent air cargo fleet. We thoroughly agree that the national-defense aspect of civil air carriers is a most vital one, and one which affects the public directly. But to infer that the independent air carriers have more to offer in this regard than the certificated air lines is far from the truth. The planes flown by the certificated carriers are the same planes which successfully shuttled back and forth over both the Atlantic and Pacific in the hands of the military as well as certificated lines under contract during the war. Your argument that few of the certificated air liners are capable of ocean transportation is thereby completely disproved. The scheduled air-line fleet now numbers in excess of 1,000 planes. These airplanes are available on a few hours' notice in any national emergency, and the fleet was so utilized in 1941. However, the certificated lines have so expanded and improved their fleet since 1941 that they can offer to the military today 632 percent more emergency lift capacity for just such use as was available in 1941. This is, I believe, the only element of national defense, with the exception of the atomic-bomb project, which has actually grown since the end of the war. On the other hand, the planes of the independent carrier group number something between 40 and 50 against the 1,000 of the certificated fleet. The only difference between the two types of airplanes is that all except 60 of the certificated air liners are equipped with seats. The 60 all-cargo planes of the certificated fleet more than match the capacity and availability of the independent operators, and it is only necessary to remove the seats from the 900 passenger-cargo-carrying planes in order to effect their usage for cargo lift. This is only a matter of hours under emergency circumstances.

One of the announcements made recently by the independent carriers is that they are planning to lease airplanes from the military in order to expand their operations. It is difficult to see how these carriers who have not bought a single airplane from a manufacturer since the war was over can expect the public to believe that their operations contribute mightily to national defense when they intend to lease military planes already in existence for the purpose of such aid. This certainly is not adding either planes or capacity to the total military emergency lift.

5. With regard to your discussion of competition, it is necessary to understand the declaration of policy enunciated by Congress in enacting the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938. This act made mandatory in the exercise and performance by the Civil Aeronautics Board of its powers and duties, the following:

(a) the encouragement and development of an air transportation system properly adapted to the present and future needs of the foreign and domestic commerce of the United States, of the postal service, and of the national defense;

(b) the regulation of air transportation in such manner as to recognize and preserve the inherent advantages of, assure the highest degree of safety in, and foster sound economic conditions in, such transportation, and to improve the relations between, and coordinate transportation by, air carriers; * * *

(c) competition to the extent necessary to assure the sound development of an air transportation system properly adapted to the needs of the foreign and domestic commerce of the United States, of the Postal Service, and of the national defense;

(d) the regulation of air commerce in such manner as to best promote its development and safety; and

(e) the encouragement and development of civil aeronautics.

It will be noted that in these statutory provisions the CAB is required to promote the sound development of an air transportation system properly adapted to the needs of the commerce of the United States, of the postal service and of the national defense. It will be noted that the air transportation system of the country is to be regulated in a manner which will foster sound economic conditions in such industries and that in so doing, the CAB is to permit competition only to the extent necessary to assure the sound development of the air transportation system.

It should be clear that this provision is not a direction from the Congress to the Civil Aeronautics Board to consider competition an end unto itself and it is not a direction to authorize additional competition for reasons which are not consistent with the basic precepts stated. It clearly is an instruction to add competition only when additional competition is necessary to assure the sound development of the air transportation system, and then only to the extent required. The entire philosophy of regulations embodied in the Civil Aeronautics Act is a control of both the nature and the amount of competition. Excessive competition under the philosophy of the act is as much an evil as monopoly, and the act, I believe, provides against both.

6. In view of the effect that a superimposition of an entirely new cargo-line structure on top of the present certificated airlines' structure is having and will have on the regulated air transport industry, it is well to review the current status of the Nation's air transport industry:

The certificated air lines collectively lost approximately $6,000,000 in 1946. They lost a total of more than $21,000,000 in 1947. A total loss of the two postwar years of $27,331,164. All except 5 of the 35 certificated air lines had net operating losses in 1947. It is simple to see what the added competition asked for by the independent air carriers would mean to the already gloomy financial status of the air transport system. You can judge for yourself whether or not there is any basis for the charge of monopoly when you consider that 91 percent of the total air traffic of the United States moves over routes with two-carrier competition, 59 percent moves over routes having three-carrier competition, and 13 percent moves over routes having four-carrier competition. The serious result of such competition already in effect is further shown in the reduction in load factors from 90 percent in 1945 to approximately 69 percent in 1947. The condition of the certificated air lines is further indicated by the fact that total investments in the air lines represented by common stock or equity money decreased from 90 percent in 1945 to 41 percent in 1948. During the same period money represented by preferred stock increased from 7 percent to 17 percent, and money obtained through long-term obligations increased from 3 percent to the startling figure of 42 percent.

By far the greatest volume of cargo developed by all types of carriers involves movement over transcontinental routes. Between the east coast and the west coast four transcontinental carriers certificated for passenger, mail, and property currently operate. Yet of the total operating loss suffered by the domestic air lines in the United States in 1947, approximately $16,000,000 of such amount was lost by the transcontinental certificated carriers. Yet it is over these routes and in spite of policy provisions of the Civil Aeronautics Act that duplicating air lines and route structures for the transportation of property is proposed.

7. We would like to set straight the facts regarding the highly touted so-called rate war referred to in your speech.

Prior to the independent carrier exemption order in the summer of 1947, the independent air carriers were not required to file any rates whatever. At that time the certificated air line rate level was approximately 26½ cents per ton-mile. The air lines publicly announced and filed with the Civil Aeronautics Board on August 1, 1947, a joint tariff providing for 20 cents per ton-mile. The independent air carriers, with full knowledge of the 20-cent figure, then filed rates at 13, 14, and 15 cents per ton-mile, and some of their rates were as low as 11 cents per ton-mile. The certificated air lines found that the independent carriers were only operating between big cities and were attracting only specific commodities. The certificated air lines left their rate structure at 20 cents, but filed rates equal to the independent carrier rates of 13 and 13½ cents per ton-mile on those specific commodities. The independent air carriers then shouted "rate war."

The opinion of the Civil Aeronautics Board on the motions of the Air Freight Forwarder Association decided October 2, 1947, spells out the facts of this case very clearly. It states that the reduction of specific commodity rates by the certificated air lines "admittedly * * * is competition, even though it may not be competition at every point. This is the very privilege that the uncertificated carriers asked and were granted. The exemption (from the Civil Aeronautics Act) accorded them certainly was not that of a one-sided right, namely, the right to compete against the certificated carriers and the privilege to be protected against competition against them."

In the international picture, sufficient competition is just as evident. On the north Atlantic routes there are three United States certificated carriers in competition with each other as well as with British Overseas Airways, Air France, Sabena, KLM, and others.

8. The opinion of the Civil Aeronautics Board quoted above also strongly refutes your argument that subsidy by the United States Treasury has supported the certificated air lines in their "war" with the independent carriers. The opinion of the Board reads: "No action that the Board has taken or is now taking places subsidy of the United States Treasury behind this effort of the certificated carriers to meet the competition of the noncertificated carriers. This venture, so far as this Board has expressed any concern, whether for gain or loss, depends on their own funds."

Recognition by the CAB that the 20 cents per ton-mile certificated air-line rate is a purely compensatory rate is highly inferred in the decision on the air freight rate case where 16 cents per ton-mile was set as a compensatory rate. In order for the argument that the certificated air lines are using Government money to fight the independent carriers to hold water, it would have to be shown that the rates charged by the certificated carriers are lower than compensatory rates could be.

With best wishes, I am

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT RAMSPECK,
Executive Vice President.

JUNE 1948.

Hon. ROBERT RAMSPECK,
Executive Vice President, Air Transport Association of America,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN RAMSPECK: I have read your letter of May 19 with great interest, not only because of the importance of its contents, but also because of the respect I have for the long years of distinguished service which you contributed in the House of Representatives.

Unless you have objections, I plan to insert into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the entire text of your letter to me, as well as my reply, because I think the subject of air transportation has become of such importance to the taxpayer and the public generally, that a clear statement of both sides is called for.

At the beginning I should like to make it clear that I have never been involved with any aviation interests, and have only the public interest at heart. I have always looked out for the interest of my fellow veterans of World War II, and it is on behalf of those veterans who have been trying to form new air cargo companies since the end of the war in what I conceive to be the public interest that I come into debate against your distinguished self, who, having resigned from Congress, now represents the certificated air lines which are the members of your Air Transportation Association.

Perhaps the simplest method for me to answer your letter is to go over, point by point, the eight objections which you raise to my speech of April 28, on the floor of the House, entitled: "Discrimination Against Veterans' Air Cargo Lines."

1. KICKING AROUND OF AIR VETS—TRUE OR NOT?

You object to my complaints against the kicking around which the air vets have been getting, and you allege that "the independents have had, and have, more advantages than any carriers in the history of air transportation. * * * The independents have been coddled and pampered as a result of this exemption from the law." I should judge that if the present situation of the veterans is as comfortable as you describe, they would not be trying to change their present status by applying to the CAB for certificates of convenience and necessity. Of course, as you know, the lack of certificates from the CAB makes it almost impossible for these air freight groups to raise from private banks and other sources money needed for development and expansion, and consequently they have been, since the end of the war, in a very uncomfortable and restricted financial position. As you also know, the lack of a certificate of convenience and necessity restricts the air carriers operating abroad under economic regulation 292.1 to "irregular" or "occasional or infrequent" operations.

In this uncertain status, a veteran company operating abroad cannot provide adequate service to the trade and is, itself, in a precarious position. As Raymond A. Norden, a 32-year-old Air Force veteran, now president of Seaboard and Western Airlines, said about his own company: "In a word, if it succeeds with the trade to a point where some degree of regularity is obviously called for, it may violate the (CAB) regulation and thus effectively succeed itself out of business."

I judge that if receiving certificates of convenience and necessity from the CAB would bring only additional responsibility and no additional advantages to the veterans' air freight groups, you and the certificated airlines who are members of your organization, would not be making such strenuous efforts to keep the veterans from getting those certificates.

2. INDEPENDENT AIR CARRIERS—ARE THEY VETERANS OR NOT?

You allege that the five air freight companies currently under consideration by the CAB for domestic certificates are attempting to masquerade in GI costumes. Not only are the vast majority of the employees of these companies, veterans, but in addition my information is that the men who are running these air lines have spent quite a bit of time in GI costumes during the past few years.

Slick Airways

The president and principal organizer of this company, Earl Slick, is in his late twenties and served with the Army Air Forces from 1942 to 1945. I believe your comment about colossal family fortunes has very little to do with the fact that while he did apparently inherit money from his late distinguished father, he is a veteran and is doing a splendid job in financing and running his company.

Willis Air Service

It is my understanding from reading the CAB examiners' report in the air-freight cases that this air line was formed after VJ-day, largely with and by young men who had been involved in naval aviation, and I note that the president and executive vice president, Mr. Willis and Mr. Rose, both saw considerable service with the Navy.

United States Airlines

The president and secretary-treasurer both appear to be veterans of the Air Corps in World War I.

The Flying Tigers Line

The president, and principal founder, Mr. Robert Prescott, appears to have held a commission in the Navy until he transferred to the Flying Tigers to do combat work in China. The other top officials and organizers seem mostly to be bona fide veterans.

California Eastern Airlines

This company started 2 years ago, hauled more freight than anyone of the certificated air lines, but has just gone into bankruptcy through inability to wait any longer for the CAB to grant its certificate of convenience and necessity, and through its inability to raise sufficient capital from private banks in the meantime while lacking a certificate. I understand that the president at the moment, who was called in for the financial reorganization of the company, is not a veteran, but that a substantial number of the original organizers served with the Army Air Forces or ATC in World War II.

Of course, there are, as you know, a lot of other air freight companies run here and abroad by veterans of World War II, but since you did not mention them in your letter, I will not take the time to do so now, and hence confine my rebuttal to the facts about only the five domestic air-freight companies which you mentioned. The point is that the initiative in getting these air-freight operations going has largely emanated from a number of relatively young men who wanted to apply in peace one of the talents they learned in war—moving large quantities of freight by air.

It was in World War II that air cargo was really developed on a big scale, and these young men who are now veterans, underwent what amounts to a new experience in air transportation. Unfortunately, a lot of the top officials in the already-established air lines did not have that experience, or if they did have it, it did not sink in very far, and many of them appear to be managing their companies on the basis of their prewar experience when air transportation was largely a matter of passengers and mail and a few boxes of cargo in the nose of the airplane.

The fact that these veterans' companies, even without certificates, already haul more freight than do the established lines which are members of your association, is to me pretty good indication (a) that they want to go into air freight on a big scale and have been trying hard to pioneer this new business, and (b) that your members, which possess far more capital and other resources, have been making only half-hearted efforts in that direction.

Now you point out that the certificated air lines employ some 30,000 veterans. I have no means of checking those figures, and I would certainly like to know your sources of information. But you will surely recognize, and I am sure that this principle has occurred to you more than once in your long years as a Member of the House, that some young veterans would prefer to establish their own businesses rather than simply take a salaried job in an already-established enterprise.

How would the important personages in the certificated air lines, now members of your association, have felt if a quarter of a century ago they had been denied the opportunity to establish their own companies, and had before them only the alternative of taking a salary job in some already established business? As Americans, we have always believed that the door to going into business should not be slammed in the face of the next generation. And we are not going to forget that principle now.

3. CAB SLOW TO ACT—TRUE OR NOT?

The applications of most of the veterans' air freight companies were made early in 1946, over 2 years ago. I do not know how you can justify the delays of the CAB from 1946 to the present by quoting the reports of the President's Air Policy Commission (which after all did not come out until January 1948) and the Congressional Aviation Policy Board (which did not report until March 1948). While it is true that these two temporary boards were somewhat cautious about air cargo, I did not see that either of them recommended that the present air transport industry be frozen against newcomers—which is obviously the effect of stalling off the applications of newcomers. I think it is regrettable that any Government agency should have taken so long in handling a case as the CAB has taken with the various applications of the veterans' air freight companies, and as I have pointed out, after some 2 years of applying on the part of several dozen veterans' air freight companies, to date not a single one of the air vets have received a certificate from the CAB.

While the CAB cases are no doubt complicated, and while the air cargo cases in particular doubtlessly involve a subject matter unfamiliar to many persons connected with the CAB, it seems to me exceedingly unfortunate that these cases should be taking the CAB twice as long to handle as the average truck cases decided by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

4. NATIONAL DEFENSE—ARE THE VETERANS' AIR FREIGHT COMPANIES HELPFUL OR NOT?

As I said in my speech of April 28 on the floor of the House, the military will need, ready and operating, on M-day, several thousand C–54 freight planes, or a smaller number in new type large-pay-load air freighters. The certificated carrier fleet, even granting your statement that passenger planes can be easily converted to cargo work, would not exceed 20 percent of the total military requirements. Therefore, I cannot see how it is to the interest of national defense to drive out of business the veterans' air freight groups who have, according to the Commerce Department, around 125 all-freight planes which could become part of the national defense fleet.

Now you say that the veterans have not yet bought any new cargo planes. I assume that until the vets can raise money on the basis of being able to show the bankers a certificate from the CAB, they will be unable to buy new planes. But their past record, their current interest in, and their future plans for air cargo on a big scale, lead me to believe that quite a lot of new planes would be put into commercial service if these veterans could get the status that they deserve from the Government.

Now about your paragraph No. 4. I want to ask you three questions of fact, and I ask them in all sincerity because I am frank to admit that I do not have all the information on the subject of air transport that I would like to have, and I want to be thoroughly fair in presenting the facts to the House.

a. How many all-cargo planes of 4-motor C–54 type or bigger (in pay-load) do the certificated air lines now have in use?

b. How many postwar type cargo aircraft have been purchased by the certificated air lines since the end of the war?

c. Of the thousand planes which you say the certificated air lines could offer to the military in war, you admit that over 900 are primarily designed for carrying passengers. You state that these passenger planes could be turned into all-cargo planes for the military in only a matter of hours. It is my understanding that to convert a luxury passenger plane into a freight plane suitable for the specifications of the military is a very considerable undertaking indeed, in fact so lengthy as to cast great doubt on the auxiliary military value of 90 percent of the entire air fleet of the members of your association. Naturally, this is a very grave question and one not to be answered lightly, and I would appreciate receiving some authentic information, supported by actual experience and if possible by the military authorities, on just how long and how difficult it would be to convert the passenger planes owned by the members of your association into all-freight planes, and whether or not the resulting converted planes would meet the military specifications for overseas freight work in a future war. The information I receive from you I will place in the RECORD, so the Congress will know all the facts.

5. CIVIL AERONAUTICS ACT OF 1938—DOES IT RULE OUT THE AIR VETS OR NOT?

I am fully cognizant that the Civil Aeronautics Act, as do most of the regulatory acts of the Government, attempts to outline a middle road between monopoly on the one hand, and excessive competition on the other. I am simply saying that in my opinion, the CAB, in its administration of this act, and you and the members of your association in your public interpretations of this act in connection with this matter, have so far tended to overbalance the act a bit too much away from free competition.

6. LOSSES OF THE CERTIFICATED AIR LINES—DO THEY RULE OUT ADMITTING THE AIR VETS TO THE INDUSTRY OR NOT?

I am fully aware that the certificated air lines lost some $20,000,000 in 1947, and I understand that it is a very grave situation indeed. It has been my feeling that these losses might have been in the past, and might in the future be relieved, if the certificated air lines really went into air cargo on a big scale and brought in some new business. My impression is that the potentials are big enough to nourish both the certificated air lines and some newcomers, too. I would certainly like to obtain your comment on this possibility. I would also like to know if you, or the members of your association, have made any thorough study of the real potentialities in domestic and international air cargo.

7. RATE WAR—WAS IT A RATE WAR OR NOT?

In my speech on the floor of the House on April 28, I commented that it was indeed strange that while the certificated air lines on the one hand were asking for greatly increased mail pay from the Government, they were on the other hand cutting their air cargo rates, a move which the veterans charged was intended to put them out of business through a rate war. You say that there wasn't any rate war and quote a brief passage from a CAB opinion of October 1947.

You doubtlessly are familiar with the more recent document of the CAB in the Air Freight Rate Investigation, dated April 21, 1948, in which, on pages 26 and 27 the CAB finds: "Present competition * * * has resulted and will result in unduly low, depressed, and noncompensatory rates and charges for the transportation of freight by air, and that these practices have, and will result in unsound economic conditions in the air freight industry within the United States."

I guess the above is the legal way of saying that there really was a rate war.

Besides, the CAB records disclose that your 20-cent tariffs were filed after, not before the 13-cent tariffs of at least one of the veteran freight air lines. And furthermore, how does a carrier keep from attracting specific commodities? In view of the rate policies of the ATA carriers in every other field, passenger, express, mail, and most overseas freight, isn't it clear that the low-rate policy in domestic air freight is beyond doubt an effort to exclude the only non-ATA competition which your air lines have found in the domestic field?

8. SUBSIDIES

It is my contention that the big certificated air lines have been getting through the CAB, from the taxpayers, an excessive amount of mail pay. On the one hand the CAB determines that a fair rate for carrying cargo by air is between 13 cents and 16 cents a ton-mile, and on the other hand, at the petition of the big air lines, it decides that around 60 cents or 70 cents a ton-mile is a fair rate for carriage of the mails. About the mails, it certainly is my impression that the delivery, ground handling, and pick-up are performed by the United States Government, and, furthermore, the mails which are delivered to the air lines certainly represent business which the air lines do not have to solicit. Both of which facts make me wonder why the mail rates are so much higher than the cargo rates. I would certainly like to see your explanation in detail as to why carrying mail by air costs almost five times as much as carrying cargo by air.

If you have no objection, I intend to put the full text of your letter, as well as mine, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, so that the public may see both sides of this debate. I will gladly insert into the RECORD such additional material as I receive from you, and I will willingly retract any of my assertions if you can demonstrate to me by any relevant facts that the rates paid the air lines for carrying the mail are not excessive, that the freight potential is too small to justify allowing the veterans and other newcomers into the air-transport industry, that the veterans' air-freight companies are not important to defense, or that any of my other statements are in error.

I, and those interested in this debate, will be very glad to see your answers to the specific questions I have posed, particularly in paragraphs numbered four and six.

The air-transport industry is extremely important to the public, and since it is so intimately associated with the operations of the Government, the public should have a chance to see all sides of the issue.

With kind regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

JOHN F. KENNEDY,
Member of Congress.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 18 (legislative day of Thursday, June 17), 1948

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, 1 month ago, on May 16, there passed suddenly from our midst my beloved friend and the dear and devoted friend of all Members of Congress—Mr. J. Frederick Richardson.

It was but one short year ago that Mr. Richardson was appointed to the honored post among us of Coordinator of Information for the House of Representatives. But not only we who comprise the Eightieth Congress, but Members of many previous Congresses over a period of more than a quarter of a century have felt the influence and valued the friendship and counsel of this brilliant and unselfish man.

Mr. Speaker, there may be some Members present here today who have not yet learned of the sudden death of Mr. Richardson. It was his oft-expressed wish that when he passed from this mortal scene, his friends would remember him as they saw him last. For that reason he had requested his funeral be private—without flowers and, he hoped, without mourning. Rather, he wished his friends to believe, as so beautifully expressed by John L. McCreery:

There is no death! The stars go down
To rise upon some other shore,
And bright in heaven's jeweled crown
They shine for'evermore.

And ever near us, though unseen,
The dear immortal spirits tread,
For all the boundless universe
Is life—there are no dead.

Never was there an individual more wholeheartedly and unselfishly devoted to the causes of good government and the high ideals and sound principles of our American democracy than J. Frederick Richardson.

As Coordinator of Information, he was an institution in himself, and his loss is irreplaceable. His love of country, and his constant efforts to perpetuate traditions truly American found vivid expression in one of his recent studies, Americanism, Fascism, and Communism—a Comparison, of which there have been several hundred thousands of copies distributed.

All who knew Rich loved him. He will ever be revered in the memory of his friends for his fine intellect, for his warm and understanding heart, and for his devotion and service to his country, which began when he put on his soldier's uniform during the Spanish-American War and continued throughout his life to the very end. His mortal remains now rest in Arlington Cemetery with thousands of others who have served their country well.

I would like to quote a few concluding lines from one of the last things he wrote, still only in his penciled notes:

Our flag. There it waves, and, please God, may it ever float free in the breezes; and may we so live in justice, in tolerance, and in liberty that each one of us—of whatever race or creed or station in life—may gaze upon it and in pride and reverence say, "My flag. God bless it."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution:

FEDERICO HENRIQUEZ Y CARVAJAL PROCLAIMED IN BOGOTA "AN OUTSTANDING CITIZEN OF THE AMERICAS"

The following resolution was unanimously approved at the plenary session April 30, 1948:

"A TRIBUTE TO DON FEDERICO HENRIQUEZ Y CARVAJAL

"The IX International Conference of American States.

"Whereas this year of 1948 marks the centenary of the birth of Don Federico Henriquez y Carvajal, an illustrious citizen of the Dominican Republic, the supreme objective of whose life has been a sustained devotion to the achievement and strengthening of the freedom, not only of his own people, but of all the peoples of the Americas; and

"Whereas in the course of his unique existence, illustrative of the highest attainments in civic life in the Americas, his love of freedom impelled him to a fruitful consecration to the task of founding the Republic of Cuba; and

"Whereas Don Federico Henriquez y Carvajal gave cordial and firm support to Jose Marti during the organization of the revolution successfully carried out by the Cuban Liberator in the final period of the continued and dramatic struggle of the Cuban people for their independence; and

"Whereas in referring to Don Federico Henriquez y Carvajal, Jose Marti acclaimed him as one of those men "rare as the lofty mountains, but capable of looking down from the peaks and of feeling with the heart of a people or of all humanity": Now, therefore be it

"Resolved, That our homage be tendered to this outstanding citizen of the Americas."

(NOTE.—Don Federico Henriquez y Carvajal was born on September 16, 1848, in the city of Santo Domingo, capital of the Dominican Republic, where up to this day he has resided always, and will attain his centennial birthday next September 16.—Persio C. Franco.)

[From the New York Times of June 2, 1948]

THE ELECTIONS IN CUBA

The country of Jose Marti must show an example to Latin America by conducting honest elections according to law, free from violence, all the people accepting sincerely and firmly supporting the winning candidates. It would be the finest compliment to the Great Friend of Cuba, Don Federico Henriquez y Carvajal, on the occasion of his glorious centennial anniversary. "Everything for Cuba" as has been preached and practiced by the noble and venerable Don Federico. No man, no party, no doctrine is worth the shedding of a single drop of Cuban blood. The solution of political, social, and international problems by means of violence is pure barbarism. A civilized people ought to use debate, the franchise, the law and the courts. Let us pray that the Almighty God may impart His great blessings on the beloved people of Cuba.

A Sorry Spectacle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is a sorry sight when the statesmen of a great and powerful Nation—the greatest and the most powerful in the world—think they find it necessary, in peacetime, to conscript the youth of the land for military service.

It needs no recital of facts to show that from a productive, financial, and resourceful standpoint, no nation is the equal of the United States—no combination of nations has the slightest chance, at this time, of invading our land or destroying our national supremacy. However, a few indisputable statements should call to the minds of all that we have no justifiable fear of aggression.

We have the only worth-while Navy in the world. We have the atomic bomb—the most powerful single weapon known to man. We have the most powerful air, underseas and on-the-land weapons yet produced. We have the greatest productive capacity of any three other nations.

Two wars have demonstrated that our fighting men, trained or untrained, are the superiors in courage, in endurance and, above all, in initiative, in effective action of any, anywhere. We are told we must help the whole world because it is prostrate. Without our aid, people everywhere will starve or freeze. In the same breath we are told that the starving, the freezing and the helpless will suddenly, overnight, arise, smite, and destroy us.

Proof that our people have the greatest degree of freedom, of prosperity, and the widest opportunity for physical, material, educational, and spiritual advancement in all the world, is shown by the fact that people everywhere, when they desire to leave their native land, choose America as the promised land.

It is a sorry commentary on the statesmen and the leaders of any administration when, after directing the policy of our Nation for 14 years, upon which, we are told, the whole world depends for the preservation of civilization, that they find themselves in such a state of fear, so lacking in confidence in the ability and the integrity of our own people, that they deem it necessary to enact legislation to force the youth of our land into the armed services to fight for its preservation.

One of two things is certain: Either our young men are so lacking in courage, in loyalty, or civilian awards are so superior to those of a military career that they will not enter the service to defend themselves, their kin, their homes, their fatherland; or the need for such service is not, in their opinion, necessary for the preservation of the Nation. The former, I do not believe. The indisputable facts justify the conclusion that all the propaganda, all the publicity put out by Wall Street, the war profiteers, those of a militaristic mind, the internationalists who would surrender a part of our sovereignty by entering into a one-world organization or a military alliance with a part of Europe, has not been able to undermine the good, hard common sense of our youth—otherwise they would flock to the colors and enlist by the thousands.

This country does not need, and cannot survive, a continued draining of its essential and necessary national resources through granting largess to other nations which are controlled and guided by world politicians.

This Nation has millions of courageous young men who would be willing and eager to fight for their homeland; who would eagerly enlist if they thought it to be necessary for the country's security.

They do not believe war is either necessary or inevitable, and they do not propose to voluntarily fight another war, a third one, either as an experiment for world government or to advance the interests of politically ambitious internationalists or fatten the pocketbooks of the makers of munitions.

An Administration which, in command of the most powerful nation in all the world, cannot so guide it as to convince would-be enemies that war would be disastrous for them, who cannot follow international policy which would keep us out of foreign entanglements without bankrupting us, should not be permitted longer to guide the destinies our Nation.

Conscription of men—and women are now in the Army and the Navy—would be but following the policy of a Hitler and a Stalin.

We are making ourselves invincible. While doing that let us remove the causes which lead to war without resorting to a totalitarian form of government or the conscripting of our manpower.

What this country needs above all things is a President, Senators, and Representatives who have the knowledge and the good sense to so guide our Nation that we will not become involved in every squabble, wherever in the world it may occur; that we will not be forever a party in every war, no matter what the cause—no matter how remotely it may affect our national interest. What we need, above all, is a party with a policy designed to first advance our own national interests, preserve the liberty, the prosperity, and the opportunities of our own people.

A President and a political party which cannot, guiding the destinies of the most powerful nation in the world, keep it free from bankrupting itself, regimenting its people, destroying its foundation—the Constitution—and drafting its young men for foreign war, is a failure. President Roosevelt made one true statement when he said, "We have nothing to fear but fear itself." He might have added—fear generated by those who profit out of war through the shedding of American blood on foreign soil.

Propaganda by the Soil Conservation Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ALBERT L. REEVES, JR.

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 18 (legislative day of Thursday, June 17), 1948

Mr. REEVES. Mr. Speaker, Federal law makes it an offense to expend funds appropriated by the Congress for propaganda in support of or in opposition to measures pending before the Congress. Yet the departments and agencies of the Federal Government continue willfully and flagrantly to violate the statute, and both secretly and openly to generate pressure on Congress with regard to pending measures.

This statement is not made carelessly. I have in my possession photostatic copies of documents which show without question how employees and officials of the Soil Conservation Service of the Department of Agriculture have used their time and Government facilities in a propaganda campaign on behalf of certain bills. Let me give you the background of the story.

William H. Colman, an employee of the Soil Conservation Service residing in Cape Girardeau, Mo., attended a meeting at Columbia, Mo., presumably at the request of Howard Jackson, whose title is assistant state conservationist for the State of Missouri. Apparently at least one purpose of that meeting was to instruct Mr. Colman as to how to put the proper pressure on Congress for the benefit of the Soil Conservation Service. Mr. Colman evidently took fairly complete notes on the instructions given and placed them in the field notebook which had been issued to him by the United States Department of Agriculture. That notebook was lost on the streets of Columbia that day and I have photostatic copies of its contents, furnished me by a source which will remain undisclosed.

The problem to which the bills in question and the documents in question relate has to do with agriculture extension work and research. The Soil Conservation Service, in effect, desires itself to do the work of terracing, and building ponds and waterways, with equipment owned and supervised by the United States and directed by the Soil Conservation Service. It is bringing every effort to bear to prevent the farmers from doing the work themselves under the direction of their own extension services, on the basis of technical programs developed for their particular areas, and from employing terracing contractors who are small-business men investing their own funds and serving the farmers on a constructive profit-and-loss basis.

The quotations which follow consist of notes taken from the field notebook of William H. Coleman:

H. Jackson (Howard C. Jackson, assistant State conservationist).

1. Three letters to editor of Post-Dispatch by farmers next week.

2. Two letters to Globe for October 3 editorial. Stress what Soil Conservation Service has done in my district.

3. Minimum of five in soil district counties and one from non (soil district) county.

4. Each bill should be discussed with supervisor's board meeting. Have members ask questions.

5. Two or three farmers to see Congressman.

6. Get every Congressman in soil district. Have him invited to meetings.

7. Have five letters from each district before January 1948.

8. Know State and National key people.

9. Know key editors.

Cultivate State and local Farm Bureau and Missouri Farm Agency Directors. State Conservation Federation.

Mrs. Earl Jackson, head of garden clubs.

See Mrs. Werhn.

Veterans teachers.

Get supervisors to talking more of how Soil Conservation Service helps districts.

I do not think these notes need detailed explanation. They show a concerted, planned program to bring pressure through newspapers and directly on Members of Congress for the passage of legislation which would vastly increase the powers and jurisdiction of the Soil Conservation Service of the Department of Agriculture, and which would virtually wipe out the extension services of the various counties.

Here are some more notes from Mr. Colman's notebook. Not only do they disclose a comprehensive plan to high-pressure Congress and to expand the Soil Conservation Service, but they show specifically a violation of the Federal statute to two instances. The references to "BANTA" in items 10 and 11 relate to our distinguished colleague, the Honorable PARKE M. BANTA, representing the Eighth District of Missouri. The references to "Zimmerman" and "Zim" in items 17, 18, and 19 relate to our late and lamented colleague, the Honorable Orville W. Zimmerman, who represented in this House the Tenth District of Missouri. The notes are as follows:

JENSEN BILL

1. Has definitely defined national land policy. None in Cooley bill. Never been one before Congress. Must have one to govern production.

2. Purdis (purpose?) of Congress to set up use of all agricultural resources.

3. Dykes asked for seventy million: Fifty-two for technical, seven for surveys (capability), ten flood, two for research.

Divorce farm bureau from extension. Have district supervisors understand both bills.

Sixteen percent overhead in Soil Conservation Service.

Thirty years of extension haven't done soil conservation.

COOLEY BILL

1. Sets up 48 different programs.

2. Will destroy districts.

3. What power would supervisors have for running districts if Extension runs it?

Slusher (head of Missouri Farm Bureau Federation) and Burch (Jim Burch, head of Missouri State Extension Service) say districts not needed.

Cooley bill doesn't say any of money will go to district.

Will put soil conservation in pressure group (farm bureau).

Knocked out Farm Security Administration.

Would subject soil conservation experimental work to rivalry with other extension work.

1. Resolutions from Cape and Pemiscot Farm Bureau. Resolutions from Cape and Bollinger supervisors.

2. Letters from priests at Jackson, Portageville, Leopold, and Winegarten to Congress.

3. Letters from farmers and others in Cape, Perry, Scott, St. Francis, Bollinger, Dunklin, Pemiscot, Stoddard, St. Genevieve, Butler, Reynolds, Mississippi, and Iron.

4. Cape Federated Club through Goodwin. Maybe resolution.

5. Affiliate members through Goodwin.

6. Letters to Congress and State office, holders from supervisors.

7. Supervisor's letters to St. Louis papers.

8. Letters to Behyum myself.

9. Talk to Rotary clubs in southeast Missouri (explaining two bills).

10. BANTA obligated to Hall. (This is Len Hall, St. Louis columnist.) Len will see him this week.

11. Frank Groom raised with BANTA.

12. See Hy. Kolmeyer (St. Louis F. Co.).

13. Explain bills to supervisors.

14. Mrs. Wilson to write or see Mrs. Jackson (garden clubs for resolution).

15. Publicity to 35 to 40 southwest papers.

16. Give ammunition to Triple A.

17. J. R. Byrd, Cape County, influence with Zimmerman (the late Congressman Zimmerman).

18. Get Missourian (a southeast Missouri newspaper) to get something in Craig record. Print it and have four sent to Zim. (The late Congressman Zimmerman.)

19. Ronnie (Greenville State soil conservation supervisor) and Zimmerman to see Johnnie.

20. Agricultural committee, Cape Chamber of Commerce.

21. Write Cousin Will re John Richardson (district soil conservation man at Chillicothe) on the two bills.

These notes appear to disclose two flagrant and specific violations of the statute, and in my opinion they demand complete investigation and perhaps further action.

The next extract from Mr. Colman's notebook discloses a somewhat more subtle approach. Supervisors—employees of the Soil Conservation Service, mind you—are encouraged to write their Congressmen for a copy of the Jensen bill on the theory that the request will be interpreted as a vote for it. Similarly, the Cooley bill was to be discreetly criticized. And note this comment:

But don't stimulate a flood of the latter letters. We do not want that at this stage of the game.

Prepare for final action.

I quote the entire sheet of instructions on this point:

Supervisors and others should be encouraged to write their Congressmen for a copy of the Jensen bill and study it. A request for a bill is usually construed as a vote for it. (In view of that fact, it will be well if many of those writing for the Cooley bill indicate that they have heard about it and don't like it and want a copy so they can study it. But don't stimulate a flood of the latter letters. We do not want that at this stage of the game.)

Prepare for final action. Lay the groundwork for a direct line of letters and other communications from the people back home expressing their wishes, to their Congressmen when either or both bills come before the Congress. We may not need that action but the people should be prepared.

The type of letters needed now are a few good ones going in to Senators and Representatives from local people or groups to let Congressmen know what is going on in the way of soil conservation progress; what a farmer thinks of his plan, and the fact that SC helped him do it; a progress report from supervisors to their Senators and Representatives. If these are bona fide letters written by the individuals (or groups), they mean more going in during the fall and winter than a flood of letters when the bills are before Congress. In other words, people should let Congress know they are interested in soil conservation, in districts, and in the SCS all the time.

To cap the climax, Howard C. Jackson, assistant State conservationist for the State of Missouri, wrote a memorandum to Mr. Colman under date of October 7, 1947, about the same matter. It was written on an official interoffice transmittal form of the United States Department of Agriculture, Soil Conservation Service, and I have a photostatic copy of it. It was taken from Mr. Colman's official field notebook. It bears the typed name Howard C. Jackson and the initials HCJ. It is as follows:

Gud Budde former executive secretary of the Missouri Conservation Federation and now more or less engaged in private work with the Outdoor Tourist Bureau and other activities in St. Louis has been a stanch friend of ours throughout all of these years.

Gus has a friend, Guy R. Dixon, who is president of the Current River Chapter of the Ozark Protective Association in Ripley County at Bennett, Mo. He says the old boy is a little eccentric, writes a lot of letters, but is dead serious about conservation. He says he would be a good contact for the foundation that creates interest for a soil district and suggests that one of our men contact him. I would suggest that you plan to take a run over there sometime and look around getting acquainted with those fellows. There is another man down that way, Dr. Z. Lee Stokely at Popular Bluff. I think Dr. Stokely is the postmaster. Pres knows him. He is a radical against high dams and wrote a clever piece a while ago in it and he is active in the Conservation Federation. As I recall, he is hard of hearing but has definite opinions of his own. Pres can give you a little dope on him.

Going back to Mr. Dixon. He has asked for some help as president of his chapter and Gud Budde has suggested that someone might help him set up a series of meetings where you and one of your men would take one or two meetings, help him set up an outline where maybe he could invite someone from the Forest Service and other agencies.

It is just possible that this is a contact that we would want to develop for future use.

Mr. Speaker, I have additional information on this matter. Part of it was also found in the notebook in question. One document consisted of a list of Arrowhead Questions from the Federal Soil Conservation office to the State soil conservation office for use in Missouri. Typical questions on the list of 11 are these:

You know that soil erosion does not stop at county lines or State lines, because rivers don't stop there and streams don't stop there, and neither do dust storms stop there. Don't you think we need a Federal agency working across States lines to take care of these erosion problems?

Isn't it true that the Farm Bureau monopoly bill is contrary to our constitutional Government by a system checks and balances—Federal agencies and States agencies both functioning to best serve all the people of this country?

What right does the Farm Bureau lobby, representing no more than one-sixth of the farmers, have to try to wipe out a Federal conservation agency like the United States Soil Conservation Service with its democratic system of districts operated by local farmers?

"How to get what is needed" is the heading of a section of another outline of methods for obtaining the legislation desired by the Soil Conservation Service. Under this heading are three items which show exactly how the soil-conservation officials propose to apply the right degree of pressure on Members of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I do not undertake to pass upon the merits of the two bills with which the Department and the Soil Conservation Service were concerned. But I insist that so deliberate and flagrant a violation of an express statute forbidding the propagandizing of Congress by Federal employees using appropriated funds must not go without investigation and whatever further action the circumstances may warrant. It amazed me to learn that substantially all of the information contained in this extension of remarks had been submitted to a committee of this House during the current session, and that no action was taken with respect to it. I am making available to the Harness Subcommittee on Propaganda all of the documents to which I have referred and from which I have quoted, and more, with the request that they take action to determine the character and full scope of this propaganda campaign by Federal employees, using Federal funds, and take such further action as in their judgment seems proper.

Let me clarify one point. The information and documents to which I have referred were not given me by the witness who testified before the House committee, nor have I even discussed the matter with him.

Certainly the Congress should not and cannot tolerate further violations of the antipropaganda statute, especially when they are as flagrant and offensive as those indicated by the documents to which I have referred.

Protecting the Fundamental Rights of Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD W. LANDIS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, sufficient time has now elapsed to see that labor has continued, and will continue, its forward progress under the labor act passed by the last Congress. Practically every day brings forth new reports in newspapers, radios, and union publications of increased gains by labor, but instead of these gains being made after time-losing strikes we see, and statistics released from time to time by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics prove, that more and more of these gains now are being obtained through peaceful collective bargaining. That is the real gain for the workingman. The false charges that the labor law would enslave labor and do away with collective bargaining have been proved to be false by the acid test of experience. Labor continues its forward march—through peaceful collective bargaining and by so doing labor is gaining in public support and esteem.

The labor law is working in the best interests of the workingman and the public. The basic rights of labor are fully protected, and so is the public interest.

In the last session three great decisions were made in the legislation then under consideration which were vital to the basic rights of labor and which have done so much to make the act fair and just. First, is the union-shop provision. Second, is the protection of labor's right to bargain on an industry-wide basis.

Third, is the exemption of railroad employees covered by the Railway Labor Act. The welfare-fund action was also of extreme importance.

With respect to the protection given to the union shop and industry-wide bargaining, I wish to pay special tribute to some of the new members on the committee who were so helpful in seeing that the labor law protected these fundamental rights of labor. I refer to Representatives KEARNS of Pennsylvania, KERSTEN of Wisconsin, MACKINNON of Minnesota, NIXON of California, and our friend who passed away recently, that other valiant fighter for the right as he saw it, Representative Tom Owens, of Illinois. Without their vigorous demands for the union shop and industry-wide bargaining provisions, these valuable benefits might well have been lost to labor.

These Members were also strongly insistent on the amendment to exempt railroad employees who are covered by the Railway Labor Act. Representative MACKINNON was the author of this amendment in the committee and made a valuable contribution in this and many other respects. Actually, there was no sound reason to include railroad employees under the labor law, as railroad employees have different bargaining problems, and they have been for many years operating under the United States Railway Labor Act, which deals specifically with their situation. It would have been a mistake to do away with the Railway Labor Act, and Representative MACKINNON was quick to note this undesirable possibility.

I also wish to express my appreciation to Representatives MCCOWEN and BREHM, of Ohio, for their fine support of these measures. They are not new Members but gave valuable support to the above provisions, and I am looking forward to their continued support in the future.

Increases in Pensions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD O. McCOWEN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. McCOWEN. Mr. Speaker, the Eightieth Congress has done much by way of legislation for veterans of all wars, but they have not done too much, and perhaps not nearly enough. The record is good even though it may have been considerably better. In the last week before the recess, two bills for an increase in pensions were passed. Both of these will be of great interest to all who will benefit by them. After much debate as to the amounts of increase, the conference committee between the two Houses made the following report which was accepted by both Houses.

Analysis of H. R. 5588: Provides the following additional compensation for World War I and II, Spanish-American, and peacetime—combat or extrahazardous service—veterans who are 60 percent or more disabled:

Totally disabled:
Wife, but no child	$30.00
Wife, 1 child	35.00
Wife, 2 children	45.50
Wife, 3 or more children	56.00
No wife, 1 child	14.00
No wife, 2 children	24.50
No wife, 3 or more children	35.00
Dependent parent or parents (each)	17.50

Partial disability compensated at percentage of disability of cited rates but no compensation for less than 60 percent disability.

The conference report which was accepted by both Houses for S. 2825, briefly stated, is as follows:

The surviving widow, child or children, and dependent mother or father of any deceased person who died as the result of injury or disease incurred in or aggravated by active military or naval service as provided in part I, paragraph I hereof, shall be entitled to receive compensation at the monthly rate specified next below:

Widow but no child, $75; widow with one child, $100 (with $15 for each additional child); no widow but one child, $58; no widow but two children, $82 equally divided); no widow but three children, $106 (equally divided) (with $20 for each additional child; total amount to be equally divided); dependent mother or father, $60 (or both), $35 each.

Any veteran or the dependents of any deceased veteran otherwise entitled to compensation under the provisions of part II of this regulation or the general pension law shall be entitled to receive the rate of compensation provided in part I of this regulation, if the disability or death of such veteran resulted from an injury or disease received in line of duty (1) as a direct result of armed conflict, or (2) while engaged in extrahazardous service, including such service under conditions simulating war, or (3) while the United States is engaged in war.

SEC. 3. Paragraph III of part II of Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (a), as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

The surviving widow, child or children, and dependent mother or father of any deceased person who died as a result of injury or disease incurred in or aggravated by active military or naval service as provided for in part II, paragraph I hereof, shall be entitled to receive compensation at 80 percent of the rates specified for such dependents in paragraph IV, part I hereof, as now or hereafter amended.

SEC. 4. The increases provided by this act shall be effective from the first day of the second month following the passage of this act.

It was my pleasure to vote for the conference report which provided for the increases described above. Personally, I feel sure that more of the increases should have been made larger, because the total amounts allowed even by the changes still provide inadequate amounts. The present high cost of living should have been given more consideration in fixing the increases. All legislation is a result of compromises, and perhaps the Congress did well to get the amounts as high as they are when everything is considered.

Address of Branch Rickey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK L. SUNDSTROM
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. SUNDSTROM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following address by Branch Rickey, president of the Brooklyn Dodgers, before the National Conference on Community Improvement in Washington, D. C., on May 25, 1948:

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, it is not easy for one coming from my field of play, if you might call it that, to your Nation-wide field of community development, to speak constructively. One might say it is a bit incongruous for me to attempt it, but I am really interested in community improvement. However, I do not come here as one whose interest in the field is to give advice, counsel, or information. Rather, my effort here this morning is to testify to the value of the move this council is undertaking, and to give the opinion of a common citizen of our country who is looking on, seeing what is going on.

I have examined this council's plans pretty carefully, and I know about its work, also the program for these 3 days. Frankly, I don't know of anything more challenging than this program.

The subject assigned to me was, "Recreation—Its Importance to the Community." Well—in a general way, I will talk to that subject, but it is not easy for anyone from Brooklyn these days to talk on any subject specifically. However, I don't have to get back to the ball game. As far as I am concerned I could stay here all day. It doesn't seem to make much difference what influences are around the team these days. It manages to lose with apparent glee and pleasure.

Recreation is an interesting subject. This thing of the citizen seeking relaxation, diversion, play, or useful application of his leisure time, is mighty important. But we should be more particularly concerned, I think, with the immature, the adolescent, the youth. What of him or her?

It seems to me that monotony on a job is bad, but bad as monotony there may be, there is one thing that certainly in the life of young men and boys is worse—that is idleness. Nothing to do puts the skids under almost all of a boy's moral standards.

Leisure is a good thing in the development of any people. It permits understanding of art and other worth-while subjects. You have a chance for cultural enrichment by the use of leisure if society knows what to do with it. Leisure is marvelous for mature people who have high purposes and plans. But 20,000,000 boys in this country do not have plans and many of them do not have high purposes—they do not have any purpose. They are creatures of circumstances. Perchance, they are victims of doing things of least resistance. In some of our cities, we actually have organizations of boys competing with one another in the commission of crime.

I do not think that many boys are inherently bad, however. In fact I believe most boys are inherently good. If they are bad, they need official attention, maybe a psychiatrist, but most all of them have handles to the good in them if you can take hold of them.

To the adolescent, that age which the Germans call the storm and stress period, the great solvent, the great antidote to character ills, to character-breaking conditions, is physical exercise. The organized confusions we have among youth today I think is traceable directly to the negligence of the family. I do not think you can escape that. In some instances, it is perhaps due to entire indifference by the community. That is a frequently contributing factor. And that is why a meeting of this kind and a work of this kind becomes so everlastingly important.

Men don't need rules, or boys either, to make them come in at night, to observe the decent customary rules for athletes when they are physically tired. They just come in at night without being told. Discipline is not a matter of not drinking or not smoking on the part of boys, or not doing any of the obvious things some people are inclined to think indicate an undisciplined person. Discipline is never a superimposed thing.

I'm talking now directly of what I handle most. The organization that I'm connected with looks at as many as 4,000 boys in 1 year—candidates for a career in the playing of a competitive game where you put the dollar mark on muscle and expect it to be clean—to stay clean. I'm talking about the great effort of those boys to make good in this so-called professional undertaking.

What causes them to fail? Where do you find the value of discipline? How does it affect all the careers or all the attempts to make a career? We have learned that discipline is not a superimposed thing—it is not a thing handed down. No man, no baseball club is ever disciplined when it reacts from a sense of fear, from a sense of penalty, compulsions from without. I doubt if it is sufficiently disciplined if its motivation comes solely from a vision of the fortunes of victory.

Discipline is a self-imposed thing—a coming from within, out; an election to do thus and so because of a realization of the compensations that comes as a result. It controls relations with teammates. The right sort of chap devotes himself quickly to his weaknesses instead of playing all the time to his strengths. Those things are not taken up just by the boys' own regulation and thinking—not regularly so. They need systematic program, they need coordination, they need encouragement. The need for these is greatest in the home, but it certainly exists in the community. It can be the solution of many of our national problems.

If you will study the history of sport—take it in China, take it in Japan, take it in Russia, take it in France, other countries, what is the effect over a period of 400, 500, 600 years, on the life and progress of the country? It is a great study. I like to read about it. Take the relationship of sport to the history of the British Empire. That nation invests more in sport than any other country in the world except the United States of America. There you find that preparation for war and other problems takes place on the playfields of the empire.

Let me illustrate. When the British cricket team was playing in Australia (you may recall Collier tells about it in his work on England and the English) in Newspaper Square in London there were great placards—red boards—and on them were three or four headlines of what was appearing in the public print in a particular paper. There was debating in the House of Parliament on Navy appropriations—the Irish question was quite acute at the hour—they had a problem with one of their distant colonies, but headlined above all were these words: "England's big task."

Collier knew about all the other things, but he relates that England believed the big task had nothing to do with all these important national and international problems of the Empire. The English cricket eleven was playing in Australia and on that day the Australian eleven had made an unexpectedly large score. It was England's big task to meet or beat that score on the succeeding day. Challenge to the Empire.

We think we have great attendances over here at some of our contests in football and baseball. In England recently I saw an attendance of one hundred-and-thirty-odd thousand at a single athletic event. The significance of this lies in the fact that in England they recognize that public interest in sport is a sound investment—a recognition of such importance that a mere handful of men have controlled the destinies of two-fifths of the inhabitants of the world for centuries.

I am not advocating for one single second that we have a proletarian government that controls sports, particularly professional. I want enterprise to be there, the creativeness of competition in sport. It benefits everyone, and I want no control but I would like to see sports tremendously stimulated.

I would almost like to see an addition to our official Cabinet family, perhaps under public health. The one selected should have enough authority to do a great job in finding out what stimulation to competitive sport, what games in all fields would do in our country to the cost of our criminal procedures, and what it would do to the minds of youngsters in this country.

You can't do this just simply by stimulating games. That isn't enough. You've got to go deeper than that. Competitive games without any emphasis whatsoever on the sportsmanship of them can lead you nowhere at all. It could lead you into unsportsmanlike conduct. Somewhere in the program there must be the motto: "Not honors, but honor." There must be a searching for some of the equivalents of such virtues as may come out of war, if any.

Professor James wrote an essay on the Moral Equivalents of War. It is deeper and more comprehensive than the application I would like to make of it in one particular. It seems to me that Professor James might have written an extra paragraph if he had cared to do so—it would fit the picture perfectly.

If he had said that the moral equivalents of war in the United States of America are to be found in sports, in competitive games, the stimulation of youth everywhere to use its leisure in sports, he would have helped. Relaxation, recreation, the change from work, the employment of time, bring better results than misuse of youthful leisure with no challenge and nothing to do.

I think that sports have a very definite place in this program of community improvement. It is so easy to organize it. You have so many sympathetic forces back of it. All the boys, all the men, yes, and the girls, love the competitive challenge. It is physical exercise. Think of what it would do if the world would employ in an all-sports program just a small part of what we are putting into armament.

The psychology of it is emphasized by a case involving my own boy. He went over to Edinburgh to the Boy Scout jamboree and came back with commodities traded with a boy from Czechoslovakia, one from Italy, a boy from Scotland, and another chap—four of them. They corresponded for a time and then one day when we were talking at the dinner table about results of the First World War, the fourth chap who was present spoke up and said: "I don't see how we can fight people like that." He told about the other boys and named them. He said, "It just seems to me if everybody knew everybody like I know Sam," and he named the other boys, "they just couldn't fight."

There isn't any link in all creative thinking that brings men quicker to understanding of one another than competitive games—any kind of games where sportsmanship itself comes into the picture. There isn't much luck about it in the creation of good boys. Things don't just happen anywhere without cause. Baseball games are not lost or won without a reason for it.

This thing called fortune, or good fortune, or bad fortune, is a pretty dangerous thing to talk about or to give any credit to—to the extent to which a man attributes his success or his failure to the workings of chance. It seems to me, and at least to a baseball club, attributing things to luck becomes ineffective in controlling the destiny of one's own work and a person becomes ineffective in controlling any part of the outcome of his games.

Things just do not happen that way. When boys do all they can, and teams do all they can to win, they've done everything humanly possible in physical effort, in intelligent effort. The outcome is on the board, and usually that team has what is known as good luck. And if it does not, it has what is known as bad luck.

Some years ago there were two great ends on the University of Michigan football team, one being an All-American. The Michigan team had played the University of Minnesota team early in the season and had lost. Then it played a number of other games and didn't lose any, and was coming up against the University of Minnesota team for the final game of the year. There wasn't much chance to win, in the opinion of Coach Hurry-Up Yost.

The week before they played that game with an expectancy of losing it, because Minnesota's comparative scores had been better, they made very definite, specific preparation. Not quite according to the vogue—not the traditional coaching. You may recall that particular game, which is in the history books and has been widely written about by commentators and in sports pages for years; it resulted in a score of 7 to 6 in favor of Michigan.

During the entire game, only one time did Michigan have the ball in the Minnesota end of the field. Minnesota made something like six or seven hundred yards in rushing and passing that ball and Michigan had something like 30 or 40 yards, in a total of the game. Defense, defense, defense, and within their own 10-yard line several times, was the lot of the Michigan players.

In the last 1 minute of the game, Michigan was defending on its own 5-yard line. The University of Minnesota was ahead 6 to 0. The halfback on the Minnesota team fumbled. The ball was in the midst of 22 men. A chap named Oosterbahn (recently appointed coach of the University of Michigan football team) picked that ball up. He didn't fall on it. According to the rules and practices of good coaching he should have done so. Instead he picked it up, really scooped it with one hand. He shook off a tackler here, a tackler there. He changed his course twice and ran 95 yards for a touchdown—on a flukey fumble. Then Michigan kicked a goal and won a game.

About 3 or 4 weeks later I was on a peninsula in Michigan—a little old hotel in the evening after a day of hunting. I noticed a youngster coming in at the hotel entrance. I called to him, "Harry, come over here." It was Harry Kipke, the assistant coach of the team. He was over there making a high-school speech, trying to get another good athlete, I imagine, for the University of Michigan. He came over, and we were talking, I suppose rather happily and gleefully, about the great season Michigan had had, and how in the final game we beat Minnesota for the championship in the Big Ten.

I was a Michigan man—Harry was—it was a natural celebration. There was a little old wizened fellow—must have been about 75, with a little scraggly beard, sitting in a big leather chair about 5 or 6 feet from us. He kept crossing his legs back and forth and smoking his pipe. Finally when we had talked and talked about it—yes, it was a great game—he got up and he said, "Gentlemen, I can't stand this any longer. I'm a graduate of the University of Minnesota class of 1877." Then he said, "I want to tell you that it's scandalous. We won so many yards. We made so many yards—we made so many first downs."

He was mathematically perfect. He told how we had been on defense the whole time and came to the point where Oosterbahn violated the first rule in the book of good coaching when he picked up that football and undertook to run with it and got away. "Lucky," he said. "Luck, pure luck, and Michigan's always had it," said he. We were subdued, as we saw him making his way off in nervousness out of the hotel lobby.

Harry Kipke turned to me and said, "He's right. Of course Oosterbahn did violate the usual, but there's something that the Minnesota grad doesn't know. On Monday morning before the game, the coaches decided that they'd have to do things differently. We outlined the plan that we adopted that afternoon when we met all the players.

"We took aside Oosterbahn and the other ends, but particularly the two regulars. Then we put assistant managers and substitute players on the field with their arms full of footballs. The ends were not allowed to enter scrimmage all week. Instead they were to run up and down the sidelines with the other boys throwing rolling footballs in front of them until," he said to me, "Oosterbahn could take two at a time, one in either hand, on a dead run.

"They were perfect on it," he said, "and they were coached not to fall on footballs. They must take chances." Luck? If so, I could give you illustrations by the score on the point.

Luck is what's left after you've done all you can. After you've invested yourself fully in the job in front of you, with what intelligence you have, what information you can get, with what energy, what industry you can put into it—you give it all you've got, and what comes out of it is luck. And if you haven't left very many loopholes for negligence or mistakes, it's probably good luck.

Luck is the residue of design. This great effort that we have in mind here, this great program and its challenge to American communities everywhere, is, in the opinion of a humble citizen who comes from the field of professional sport, the investment of ourselves, fully realizing what the results may be, and can be. The talent to work with, the ease of organization, the facility for enlisting community sentiment back of it all certainly are available. Let's utilize them.

I just give testimony, that's all; not advice or counsel. You are in front of a magnificent opportunity, and may all good citizens recognize it.

Now Is the Time To Build Ships

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following pamphlet issued by the National Security Division of the American Legion:

NOW IS THE TIME TO BUILD SHIPS

In March 1947 President Truman appointed an Advisory Committee on the Merchant Marine to study a problem that must be solved * * * how to build and maintain a strong, up-to-date American merchant marine.

The five prominent Americans who undertook the study as an important public service were: K. T. Keller, president, Chrysler Corp.; Marion B. Folsom, treasurer, Eastman Kodak Co.; Andrew W. Robertson, chairman of the board, Westinghouse Electric Corp.; James B. Black, president, Pacific Gas & Electric Co.; E. L. Cochrane, vice admiral, United States Navy (retired), formerly Chief, Bureau of Ships, and president, the Society of Naval Architects and Marine Engineers.

The President's Advisory Committee studied the problem from every angle. A report was made to the President after 8 months of detailed analysis.

The recommendations in that report are important to you and your country.

For our merchant marine must be strong.

It is absolutely necessary to our national security. It is an important part of our peacetime economy.

IT MUST NOT HAPPEN AGAIN

Twice in one generation this country has been forced into emergency shipbuilding programs of huge size.

Why? Because this country would not maintain an adequate merchant marine. And a ready and strong merchant marine, like the Army, Navy, and Air Force, is indispensable to our national security.

In World War I only a few of the ships begun under our war program saw service because the conflict ended before we could complete more than a few ships under that program.

In World War II the results were better, for then we had the advantage of a modest shipbuilding program started about 3 years before Pearl Harbor. With that as a start, we were able to get into high gear on our war shipbuilding program with less waste of time, money, and lives. But even with that preparation, it was several years after Pearl Harbor before our full shipbuilding potential could be made effective.

Next time we will not have a screen of time, distance, and allies behind which we can work until we are ready. Our best hope of preventing a "next time" is to get ready now.

PASSENGER SHIPS COME FIRST

In any emergency, passenger-carrying ships are the number one requirement. Our troops should not be transported as cargo as many of them were in World War II.

On December 7, 1941, we were down to 113 ships in active passenger service, capacity 38,000 passengers. Our initial troop movements were critically delayed by this lack of troop carriers.

Today we have only 48—capacity, 17,000 passengers.

And not one passenger-carrying ship is being built in this country today. Even the most recent Government plans (if carried out) would add only a few passenger ships, and none before 1950.

But 173 passenger-carrying ships are being build in foreign yards today. Other nations recognize a need we neglect.

The President's Advisory Committee recommends that by 1953 we build 46 new passenger ships, capacity 20,000 passengers.

WE ALSO MUST HAVE CARGO SHIPS

Our cargo fleet of modern ships is in fair shape today. But we still need additional types to round out that fleet, such as refrigerator ships and others for special services.

Moreover, the efficient useful life of a ship is only about 20 years. The ships we do have are all about the same age. They will all grow old together.

If we let that happen, we may some day have a huge rebuilding job..

What we need is a steady, yearly replacement program to keep our fleet of cargo carriers up to date and efficient in all classes, for trade and defense.

The President's Advisory Committee recommends that such a program be begun at once.

WE MUST NOT THROW AWAY OUR SKILL

It takes special skills to design and build a ship. It takes years of steady work to perfect those skills.

The engineering knowledge and unique skills that must go into the designing and building of a ship must be used constantly. If not, they are soon lost. And once we lose them, our progress ends.

Without shipbuilding there will be no jobs in the shipbuilding industry. The craftsmen and engineers will turn to other industries for employment, as they have been doing. Those men will not come back without some hope of steady work. Without that same hope, young men will not be drawn to shipbuilding as a career.

The only way to stop this disintegration is to begin the steady shipbuilding program recommended by the President's Advisory Committee.

The Committee says: "Shipbuilding skills * * * are essential national assets and must be preserved."

WHAT ABOUT THE SHIPS BUILT DURING THE WAR?

During the war we could not manufacture enough modern equipment and machinery to build more than a limited number of high-class cargo ships.

Therefore, most of the ships we built were especially designed for multiple production in newly built shipyards. Those ships were fitted with equipment and machinery that could be mass-produced in a hurry. That was the only way we could meet the critical need.

The result was a great number of the slow Liberty ships that did their war job and did it well.

But that kind of ship cannot ordinarily compete on regular trade routes with the fast new vessels now being built by other countries.

Hundreds of our war-built Liberty's are already laid up. Many more will be laid up as the volume of relief shipments decreases.

These ships cannot be considered as part of our permanent merchant marine. They were just as expendable as tanks, trucks, planes, and all other war equipment. When no longer required for foreign relief cargoes, their only value will be as a reserve to supplement our active fleet in case of emergency.

Only modern, efficient ships comparable with foreign-flag ships now building can keep the American flag on the high seas and provide and maintain the fleet required for national security.

Both our trade and defense will suffer unless we start a shipbuilding program that, year after year, guarantees us the most efficient ship designs and the best ships.

WHAT WILL IT COST?

The cost of the recommended passenger-ship program is not large compared with the cost of other vital parts of our national economy and national security.

On the basis of the President's Advisory Committee estimate, the cost to the Government of building the 46 passenger-carrying ships would not exceed $300,000,000. The cost to the private ship operators would be about the same.

Spread out over a 6-year building period, that is a cost of about $50,000,000 a year to the Government.

Many times that amount is spent every year to help support other essential elements of our economy.

The Government supports the entire cost of the Army, Navy, and Air Force. These are necessary security costs.

The merchant marine is equally important to our national security, and most of the cost is borne by the shipping industry.

In addition, a strong merchant marine is an important factor in our economy and national prosperity.

Other maritime nations maintain strong merchant marines.

WHY ANY COST TO THE GOVERNMENT?

We pay the highest wages in the world to maintain our American standard of living. Likewise we require the highest safety standards on our ships. It therefore costs more to build ships in this country than abroad. It, likewise, costs more to operate American ships than foreign ships.

A large part of our foreign passenger and cargo trade today moves on the important trade routes of the world with scheduled sailings in competition with foreign ships. Certain of these routes, which include practically all our passenger services to foreign ports, are designated by the Government as essential. Operators on these routes are eligible for Government aid to enable them to complete on equal terms with foreign operators.

Because the cost of building a ship in this country is greater than that abroad, the Government absorbs that difference so that American operators on the designated routes may have new ships built at the same cost as their foreign competitors.

The Government also absorbs the difference between American and foreign ship-operating costs in order to place American operators on these essential routes on an equal footing with their foreign competitors. This also helps American operators accumulate sufficient funds for necessary replacements and additions to their fleets.

Shipbuilding, ship repairing, and allied marine industries form a widespread industrial structure.

They utilize material and equipment from almost every State in the Union. The wages paid to men in these activities have a Nationwide effect. Thus marine industry is important to our national well-being.

This outline obviously can touch upon only a few of the high spots of the problems involved and on the more important recommendations of the President's Advisory Committee.

But the four practical, successful businessmen, and one retired high-ranking naval officer, who made the study for the President, produced a searching analysis of the merchant marine and shipbuilding problems and recommended a program to help solve these problems.

The recommendations are sound and should be acted upon.

You can help solve this problem.

Think it over.

Talk it over.

Let others know what you think should be done.

Veterans' Affairs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on the subject of veterans' affairs, and the need for the adoption of additional national legislation which will be of value to the discharged serviceman. As a veteran myself, I have always been interested in the development of a sound program to assist those who were in uniform, and I know that most veterans and nonveterans—as well as many of my distinguished colleagues—share my view that such a program is both just and necessary.

When I first came to Washington as a freshman Congressman, I expected to see some constructive veterans' legislation enacted into law. I felt that the election of a number of World War II veterans to the Eightieth Congress was a good sign, and that we would be able to get something done in the field of veterans' affairs. I was encouraged by the introduction of several hundred bills during the first few days of the session which related to the problems of our veterans.

GOP FOLLOWS A DO-NOTHING POLICY

But my optimism did not last. Many fine bills were introduced but nothing happened to them. They were killed in committee, some in the House and Senate Veterans' Committees, and others which passed this hurdle of receiving Veterans' Committee approval, in the Rules Committee.

I soon discovered that the Republican leadership in Congress was not interested in a veterans' program. They were interested in giving tax relief to the big corporations and the wealthy income groups. They were interested in passing the Taft-Hartley law, which takes away the hard-earned rights of labor. They were interested in curtailing the Roosevelt farm program, and destroying our late President's program for full employment, social security, and the realization of his economic bill of rights. My Republican friends had no time to spend on veterans' affairs—only a minority were interested in the veteran and his problems. As a result, little was accomplished during either session of the Eightieth Congress in the line of veterans' legislation.

Let us look at the record: During the first session, only three minor veterans' measures were enacted into law. One was the bill permitting veterans to cash their terminal-leave bonds; another measure provided for the expansion of the on-the-farm training program; and the third granted a 20-percent increase in the tiny pensions paid to veterans and their dependents of the Civil War, Spanish-American War, and the Philippine Insurrection. All other needed veterans' legislation was ignored completely, and the problems of our ex-servicemen were ignored completely.

During the second session the GOP majority had a chance to redeem themselves, but again they refused to do anything constructive in the field of veterans' affairs. As the second session comes to a close, we find that very few veterans' bills have been passed. One bill raised subsistence payments for veterans attending college from $65 to $75 per month for single GI's, from $90 to $105 per month for married veterans, with an additional $15 being allowed for veteran students with children. Another bill raised the income limitations for veterans taking on-the-job training from $175 to $210 per month for single veterans, and from $200 to $270 a month for married veterans, with an additional $20 being allowed for veterans with a wife and two children. A few other minor revisions of present laws have been made. More liberal veterans' benefits were provided for service-connected disability, and widow's benefits were increased in case of service-connected death. Veterans who acquired tropical diseases have been made eligible for disability benefits. However, none of this legislation deals with the major problem of the veteran.

Mr. Speaker, this is the record of the Republican Party regarding veterans' legislation—this the GOP legislative program for the ex-serviceman. It is a record of miserable failure, and proves that the Republican Party has betrayed the veterans, just as it has betrayed the people during the whole life of the Eightieth Congress. There are plenty of necessary and important veterans' bills which have been pending for months and there is no excuse for this failure to take action.

A VETERANS' LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

I wish to use the remainder of my allotted time to discuss the big issues in the field of veterans' affairs, and to indicate those major legislative proposals which should be enacted into law. In other words, I am attempting to outline a legislative program which would, in my opinion, provide constructive and practical solutions to the problems facing our ex-servicemen. It is a program of action which is just the opposite of the do-nothing policies of the Republican Party.

I. NEEDED: A HOUSING PROGRAM

The first plank in any sound veterans' program is housing legislation to build enough homes to relieve the present housing shortage, and meet America's long-run housing needs. It is generally agreed that—from the standpoint of the average veteran—the No. 1 problem in America today is housing. As everyone knows, the present housing shortage is acute with some 3,000,000 families in the United States being forced to live doubled-up with relatives and friends because they cannot find homes.

Some 40 percent of these homeless families belong to veterans of World War II—over 1,000,000 GI's cannot find homes for their families. Hundreds of veterans back in my district are victims of this unhappy situation. In Duluth there are over 1,000 veterans' families living with relatives and friends, in Hibbing there are 500 veterans' families without homes, and in Virginia there are some 300 homeless veterans' families.

To make matters even worse, the purchase price and rentals on the few new homes available are high. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, a home which sold for $5,000 in 1939 is now priced at $10,000—an increase of 50 percent. The average sales price for all homes built during 1946 and 1947 was over $8,000 each. Loans to GI's for house financing during 1947 have averaged $8,200, which means that veterans who have built homes have had to mortgage their future. New homes are renting for an average of $65 per month and up.

But the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency has estimated that the average veteran cannot pay more than $4,000 to $5,000 for a home, and cannot go over $40 per month for rent. Hence the current high housing prices and rentals mean that decent housing is so expensive that it is completely out of reach of the average veteran's pocketbook. He cannot afford to build a home, or to buy one even if he can find a house for sale—he cannot afford to move into an apartment when one is available due to high rents. The destruction of rent controls last spring by Congress—and the enactment of the anemic so-called rent control bill which allowed rents to rise nearly 10 percent since July 1, has created additional hardship for our GI's.

This discouraging picture makes housing the No. 1 veterans' problem, and the first proposal in my program for veterans is legislation to whip the present housing shortage. In my opinion, Congress should adopt the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill to build 15,000,000 new homes during the next 10 years, with at least 2,000,000 to be constructed within the next few months. I am convinced that this measure is the only logical solution to the veterans' housing needs.

Unfortunately, the Republican leadership has repudiated this sound and constructive proposal in favor of makeshift and piecemeal housing legislation, most of which cannot pass before adjournment, and which, if passed, would not furnish the decent housing that our exservicemen need and deserve.

II. INCREASE EDUCATIONAL SUBSISTENCE PAYMENTS

There is a crying need to increase the subsistence payments to veterans who are attending college in order to implement the objectives of the GI bill of rights. When Congress adopted the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 it was the intention of the legislative branch to guarantee educational opportunities to all veterans who wanted to go to school. Several million ex-servicemen have taken advantage of this opportunity to improve themselves by attending college.

Today the entire GI education program is in danger due to the increased cost of living. Since the program was instituted the cost of living has increased by more than 40 percent, and many veterans are unable to make both ends meet while attending school. To cope with this situation Congress did raise subsistence payments during this session, but the increase was far from adequate. At the present time single veterans get only $75 per month while attending school, and married veterans receive $105 per month.

I need cite only a few facts and figures to demonstrate the seriousness of this situation confronting GI education. According to several studies, the average monthly expenses of single veterans attending college is $121—yet the monthly subsistence check is only $75. Monthly expenses for married veterans come to $198 but the GI law only provides these men with $105 a month.

Some 48 percent of the 2,000,000 veterans now in college are married, and three-fourths of them must work part-time, and half of their wives must work, to obtain enough money to continue their school work. One-fourth of all single veterans are also forced to work to supplement their subsistence checks. Furthermore, three-fourths of all GI's are going into debt while attending college.

During the last 2 years some 600,000 veterans have quit school, and over half of this number have dropped out of college because present subsistence payments are inadequate to meet school expenses. Thus we see that the purpose of the GI bill of rights of providing education to all veterans is being defeated by the inflationary rise in the cost of living.

This threat to the veterans' education program must be met by additional legislation to increase monthly subsistence payments; the $10 increase for single students, and the $15 raise for married students granted by Public Law 411 (80th Cong., 2d sess.) is wholly inadequate to offset the present high cost of living. I believe, in view of present inflationary living costs, that subsistence payments for single veterans should be increased to $90 per month. Married students should receive at least $125 monthly, with liberal allowances for each child.

III. EDUCATION FOR CHILDREN OF DECEASED VETERANS

The children of veterans who were fortunate enough to live through the war have their futures assured somewhat by the GI bill which gives educational rights to their fathers, who may then be in a position to guarantee education to their children in the years to come.

But what about the children of veterans who were killed? Pensions paid to their widows are not enough to educate the children, and they may go through life handicapped by the fact that their fathers died in the service of their country. In fairness to these fatherless children, I maintain that the GI bill of rights should be amended to give the children of deceased veterans financial assistance to permit them to obtain an education. Furthermore, I believe that widows of veterans who died in the war, and the wives of disabled veterans, should be given these same educational benefits.

IV. MORE LIBERAL LOANS TO VETERANS FOR BUSINESS AND FARM OWNERSHIP

One of the dreams of thousands of veterans is to own their own business or farms. This is certainly a worth-while objective, and one which should be encouraged. It is desirable—not only because of the veteran—but also because it is good for the Nation. The encouragement of small individually operated business enterprise is helpful in preserving our free competitive economy. To help veteran tenant farmers become farm owners makes for a healthy agriculture.

For these reasons, I recommend the expansion of the farm-tenant-purchase program, and the appropriation of adequate funds for this program to furnish credit to tenant farmers for the purchase of farms. Such credit should be available to veterans and nonveterans alike. I maintain that the Republican majority made a big mistake last year when they reduced the funds from this program from $35,000,000 to $15,000,000, and regret to say that the same mistake was repeated this year when the Congress again approved only $15,000,000 for this worthy purpose.

I also believe that terms on business loans to veterans should be liberalized to allow more veterans to enter the business field and establish their own individual commercial firms.

V. LIBERALIZATION OF PENSIONS AND BENEFITS FOR VETERANS AND DEPENDENTS

Everyone agrees that veterans who have suffered disability during service are entitled to compensation, and that their widows and children are entitled to death benefits. Congress has already established an elaborate system of disability and death benefits and pensions. Unfortunately, this system is subject to several grave weaknesses.

In the first place, monthly payments established by existing law are now completely inadequate due to the high cost of living. For example, a veteran may receive benefits as low as $13.80 per month for a service-connected disability, with monthly payments going no higher than $138 for total disability. In case of service-connected death, the widow receives only $60 per month with an allowance for each child. A veteran with a non-service-connected disability obtains a monthly pension of $60, and a widow receives only $42 per month in case of non-service-connected death.

Although Congress has just passed a bill increasing veterans' benefits by $21 per month in case of 60 percent or more disability ($35 increase in case of veteran with two dependents), and raising widows' benefits in case of service-connected death, the pension payment structure is wholly inadequate to meet the rising cost of living. It is impossible for a widow to exist on $42 per month, or a veteran to live on a $60 monthly pension.

In the second place, legislation governing veterans' pensions and benefits contain several loopholes which cause many injustices. For example, a single veteran with a non-service-connected disability cannot obtain a pension if his annual income exceeds $1,000—in case of a married veteran, the income limitation is $2,500. The same income limitation is true of widows of veterans involving non-service-connected death; widows without dependents are ineligible for pensions if their annual income exceeds $1,000, and $2,500 if there are dependents. Today, almost any job pays more than $1,000 per year, and although this is not enough to live on, many veterans and veterans' wives find themselves ineligible for a needed pension because of this limitation.

Another type of injustice which arises from existing legislation occurs when veterans develop tuberculosis after discharge. In many instances this malady was service-aggravated, but the GI cannot become eligible for service-connected benefits.

Congress should recognize these weaknesses in our present pension and benefit system, and face the issues squarely. In my opinion, veterans' pension and benefit laws should be liberalized as follows:

First, benefit and pension payments should be increased by 30 percent to make up for the increased cost of living. In addition, I believe that such payments should be anchored to the cost of living by establishing a sliding scale. Thus, when the cost of living rises all such payments would adjust upward automatically, and vice versa.

Second, the $1,000 per year income limitation for veterans and veterans' widows governing non-service-connected pensions should be increased to $1,800. I might mention that I introduced H. R. 2566 last session to eliminate this inequity, but the Veterans Affairs Committee has chosen to ignore it to date.

Three, veterans' pension laws should be amended to provide service-connected disability to those who have developed tuberculosis after discharge, when such disease was service aggravated and diagnosed within 2 years after separation from the armed forces.

And four, additional legislation should be enacted establishing a Federal program to stimulate the employment of disabled veterans in industry—this could be accomplished by allowing some kind of a tax-reduction bonus to those employers who cooperate with the Government program.

VI. EXPAND HOSPITAL SERVICES

The present hospital facilities for veterans are altogether inadequate, and such facilities need to be expanded to meet present needs. Under the law, hospitalization is guaranteed to every veteran honorably discharged who served in time of war, but additional legislation is needed to make this effective. I need only to mention the present situation at the Veterans' Hospital in Minneapolis to demonstrate this to be a fact. At the present time, there is a waiting list of 750 veterans who have non-service-connected disability requiring hospitalization at the Minneapolis hospital—often serious cases are forced to wait 10 days, and many tuberculosis and psychiatric cases are required to wait over a year before admittance. It is estimated that Minneapolis needs to expand its facilities by 200 beds to meet its needs. This same overcrowded situation exists all over the country, and I maintain that Congress should make additional appropriations for increasing hospital facilities. I also insist that the service program for the care of the blind and the amputees should be improved.

VII. ADEQUATE APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

At the present time, the Veterans' Administration is greatly understaffed due to lack of funds, and this results in long delays in the processing of veterans' claims, and applications for pensions, GI education authorizations, and so forth. Lack of funds has also forced lay-offs of personnel, and the closing of veterans' service offices.

I maintain that the action of the Republican majority in reducing VA funds during the first session by $35,000,000 represents a false economy which has meant less service to the veteran. A further reduction in VA funds during this session, which has resulted in staff reductions, is certain to undermine the work of the Veterans' Administration. I believe that the Congress should be more generous in the future, and that the VA should be given enough funds to allow for the efficient performance of its duties.

VIII. FULL EMPLOYMENT AND AN ECONOMY OF ABUNDANCE

The proposals that I have made so far relate largely to the veteran himself, and are based on the assumption that the GI has certain problems of his own, arising as a result of his time in the service.

At the same time, we all know that the veteran is a member of the community, and his interests cannot be divorced from the interests of the community itself. In other words, the veteran wants about the same things as the nonveteran, and his future is linked to that of his fellow citizens. Thus the veteran is, in the last analysis, interested in the maintenance of full employment and full production, social-security and health insurance, the expansion of the Roosevelt farm program, the encouragement of small business, and the development of our natural resources. The veteran requires any legislation which benefits the Nation—he desires a guarantee of the good life for all the people, and peace throughout the world.

Mr. Speaker, the program which I have outlined contains the essentials of a program which reflects the basic interests of our 13,000,000 ex-servicemen. I claim that it is practical and that its objectives are possible to realize. I maintain that Congress has a moral obligation to take action along these lines if we are to keep faith with those who only recently stood at the gates of death in the service of freedom, and offered their lives in the defense of their country.

Transfusing Your Own Blood

OF

HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, the following release from Samuel B. Pettengill is worthy of much thought, and should be read by all who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

TRANSFUSING YOUR OWN BLOOD

Something of the real scope of the saving made possible by the tax-reduction bill has just been revealed. The figures are startling. They show how false is the booby bait of Federal aid.

Mississippi, one of the poorer States of the Union, benefits by keeping within its borders the tidy sum of $17,000,000. Throughout the Nation, in the pocketbooks of all of us, there is left $4,500,000,000 that, except for the tax-reduction measure, would have vanished in the maw of Washington.

Senator MILLIKIN, of Colorado, put the figures into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Too few of us see them there. They show, for instance, that in Indiana $108,000,000 are saved to that State; $164,000,000 to Texas; $273,000,000 to Ohio; $37,000,000 to Oklahoma; $81,000,000 to Maryland; and $474,000,000 to California.

The money left in the States is now available for local and State taxation. In nearly every one of the 48 States the Federal tax cut equals the cost of their schools and libraries. When too much money is siphoned off to Washington, the taxpayers and the States feel poor. They then go to the Nation's Capital to beg for Federal aid—the return of their own money, less the political brokerage collected by the politicians on the Potomac.

For every dollar the average American taxpayer has been paying for the support of his State government, he has been paying five to seven dollars to Washington, D. C.

It is said that the States need more schools, hospitals, etc., and don't have the money to finance them. But why? Because Washington drains their money away.

Federal taxes should have been reduced more than they were. The managers of the tax cut, however, were threatened with a veto. They wanted a bill that would be sure of enough votes to override Mr. Truman's desire to keep the money flowing into Washington for the 2,040,000 Federal bureaucrats to get a slice of. Other Federal spending should now be cut by whatever the Marshall plan costs us.

The New Dealers say that the tax cut was nothing but a political gesture; that when the election is over, the taxes must be reimposed. They should be told that if the administration can't run national affairs with $38,000,000,000, we will get an administration that can—and, indeed, for even much less.

The endless appetite of the Federal Government for the people's money must be resisted, and that calls for organization. It is tragic how poorly supported are the organizations which carry on the fight year after year for economy in public spending. Every person who has paid income taxes has benefited from the cut. The cut would not have been made without the organized support of various taxpayers' associations and citizens' groups. What a grand thing it would be if every person should now resolve to contribute 10 percent of the money saved for him by this tax cut to the support of those groups which made his savings possible. Then the fight could go on successfully.

Year after year, businessmen and homemakers pay for insurance against fire and burglary. The losses from these hazards are infinitesimal compared to the losses from wasteful public spending—the loss of money and the loss of liberty.

In short, the Federal Government causes economic malnutrition and anemia in the States, and then gives them a blood transfusion from their own veins—charging a fee for doing so.

SAMUEL B. PETTENGILL.

Delay in Draft Law Unlikely To Weaken United States Diplomacy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following timely news commentary by David Lawrence which appeared in last night's Washington Star:

DELAY IN DRAFT LAW UNLIKELY TO WEAKEN DIPLOMACY OF UNITED STATES—ADMINISTRATION FAILURE TO SHOW ITS NEED LEAVES CONGRESS HESITANT

(By David Lawrence)

Outwardly the controversy over what kind of a draft bill to pass could be mistaken for a conflict of interest between isolationists and internationalists or between advocates of preparedness and opponents of larger armament.

But no such definitions or cleavages can be justified. The truth is that the President and the Secretary of State have failed to make out a case for the need of peacetime conscription. This means that just ahead of a national election, Members of Congress of both parties are hesitant to vote for a draft.

This may be called plain politics, but it is at the same time the manner in which the electorate reacts, irrespective of partisanship. There are as many Democrats as there are Republicans who fear the consequences of a draft bill on the attitude of voters.

REPORTS TOSSED AROUND

It isn't as if there were a war in progress into which America might suddenly be drawn. The threat of war with Russia has been dramatized again and again but without conviction. The House of Representatives, during its debate on the draft bill, tossed around one report that the Secretary of State did say war was possible and another that he said there was no pressing emergency. Whatever he said was said in an executive session and serves only to underline how uninformed the American people are as to what is the nature of the military crisis that confronts them.

The diplomatic relations between Russia and the United States have, of course, been strained but the Russian "peace offensive" successfully disseminated the impression that war isn't likely in the immediate future. The American Government's rejoinder to the "peace offensive" was weak and clumsy, and hence the draft bill suffered.

Much more important as an influence in retarding the draft law from being passed in the form desired by the armed services was the propaganda attributed to the supporters in Congress of the 70-group Air Force. Over the protests of the President and his Secretary of Defense, Congress appropriated more money than was requested in order to put into being a 70-group Air Force. The explanation heard in the corridors of the Capitol was that by voting more planes there would be no need of a draft. As a sheer matter of exchange, many Members were willing to spend more dollars than to vote to tear up the lives of the younger generation and interrupt their schooling and their working careers with 2 years of military service.

GROUND FORCES NEEDED

As it turns out, Congress voted the 70-group Air Force and still has been confronted with a demand for a draft bill. Many members have hesitated to go along with the peacetime conscription because they honestly believe an Air Force can do everything. They have been told by some overenthusiastic airmen that both an Army and a Navy is relatively inconsequential and that, if only enough airplanes are provided, American security will be assured.

Now the ground forces feel themselves in need of a draft law to supply the enormous numbers of men needed to handle the installations and mechanical work at the bases where airplanes take off and land.

While the armed services have each been eager to get their necessary appropriations, it does seem nevertheless that not a very strong case has been made for the draft—at least one strong enough to convince Congress, many of whose Members still feel that a mild draft law with a deferred date will accelerate recruiting and bring the necessary personnel into the armed services long before the actual need for war service will arise.

Since war isn't regarded as imminent, a draft law that takes effect after election isn't likely to weaken the diplomacy of the United States, for the important fact psychologically is that there is to be a peacetime draft.

The Matanuska (Alaska) Colony

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. L. BARTLETT
DELEGATE FROM ALASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith a very interesting article under date of June 15, 1948, appearing in the Valley Frontiersman, a newspaper published at Palmer, Alaska. This is the location of the colonization undertaken some 13 years ago which was the occasion of much criticism. It was known as the Matanuska Valley Colony.

It is known that the Matanuska Valley is one of the best and most promising areas in Alaska from the standpoint of agriculture and that it is the leading farm region in point of acreage and production in the entire Territory at the present date.

Questions have frequently been asked about the present status of the colony and the article here inserted will be found extremely interesting and very informative. It appears that some 49 of the original settlers are still there and that most of the farms which were abandoned during the early years have since been taken up by others and are now producing.

During the summer of 1946, a group of agricultural research scientists from the Department of Agriculture visited Alaska for the Appropriations Committee and made an exhaustive study of the agricultural potentialities of the Territory and of the need for an agricultural research program. This matter was discussed at length at the hearings of the subcommittee the following winter. These discussions and the report of the research group may be found on pages 1812 to 1869 of the hearings on the appropriation bill for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year 1948.

The article referred to follows:

STATISTICS SHOW VALLEY'S PAST

Modern Valley settlers, who may think they've had it rough on the way to Matanuska, when spring floods washed out highway bridges this year, should talk to M. D. Snodgrass. Mr. Snodgrass, formerly colonization agent for the Alaska Railroad and now a local realtor, would tell them a bit about how the first settlers came.

The occasion of the valley's recently celebrated thirteenth anniversary of Colony day set Mr. Snodgrass to thinking of the faces that have come and gone through the years he's known this valley. He decided it might be interesting to find out just how many of the present-day settlers could be traced back to the days of the real pioneers.

So Mr. Snodgrass set to work with notes, maps, and farm ownership records of the Alaska Rural Rehabilitation Corporation. He found the first group of what he terms the original settlers, who came here between 1912 and 1917, were pioneers in the truest sense of the word. Of that original group which settled here in a 5-year span more than 30 years ago, Mr. Snodgrass cataloged 17 still living in the valley.

The first 2 of the 17 to reach the valley came by rowboat from Knik. They were E. J. Tomlinson and A. A. Cobb, who arrived in 1917. They were followed within the next 5 years by these folks:

Gust Haller, J. J. Bugge, J. E. Edlund, G. Gustafson, Carl Engstrom, S. Fleckinstein and wife, C. Thorpe and wife, Ashley Egtvet, Roy Cornelius and wife, Ben Marino, Charles Marino, P. N. Johnson (R. Anderson), Jens Hansen, Gus Swanson, and Mr. and Mrs. Adam Werner and family.

In the years between 1917 and 1929, when no active colonization plans had yet stirred national interest in the Matanuska Valley, Mr. Snodgrass records 11 more early residents who are still living in the valley; some of them came to live at the old town of Matanuska and others went on to Wasilla. Since there were neither roads nor planes yet, the going still was tough for the homesteader who chose the Matanuska Valley. These are the 11 who glimpsed a bright future in this untried agricultural center of the north:

Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Tryk and family of Wasilla, Fred Nelson of Wasilla, Pete Nelson of Wasilla, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Cadwalader and family of Wasilla, Mr. and Mrs. Gerritt Synder and family, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Kepler, Ed Ueeck, Jacob Berg, Glen Cope, Mr. and Mrs. Emil LaWalter and Mr. and Mrs. M. D. Snodgrass and family, all of Matanuska.

From 1929, the Alaska Railroad became interested in developing the Matanuska Valley and made some effort toward bringing farm families from the States to settle here. Mr. Snodgrass recalls that there were 55 of these families, of whom there remain 46 still in the valley. However, some of the 46 settlers have forsaken their farms in favor of Palmer businesses. Their names include:

Mr. and Mrs. S. B. Cook, Mrs. Lamp (Johansen), Mr. and Mrs. J. R. Monoghan and family, Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Lossing and family, Mr. and Mrs. Harold Thuma and family, Mr. and Mrs. Harold W. Moore and family, Mr. and Mrs. C. V. King and family of Wasilla, Mr. and Mrs. F. N. Hurd of Wasilla, Mr. and Mrs. Ty Wilson and family of Wasilla, Earl McHenry, Bill Edlund, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Gagnon, H. L. Grantram and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Jack Cope, Mr. and Mrs. William Hoskins, C. C. Brix, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Clark, Horace DuFour, Mr. and Mrs. L. O. Hayes.

Some British Views of the Marshall Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, the following is a release from Samuel B. Pettengill which I think explains the attitude of some of the British conservatives with reference to the British loan and the Marshall plan, or the European Cooperative Administration program, which Mr. Pettengill has entitled "A Message to the Nation." It clearly shows some British views of the Marshall plan:

A MESSAGE TO THE NATION

As a policy, the Marshall plan has been approved. The money has been authorized to be appropriated. But the actual appropriations are still to be made. That will be up to Congress each year the plan is continued.

It may seem incredible to those who favored the Marshall plan that important Britishers object to receiving the money.

The London (England) Express is the most widely read newspaper in the world. It says:

"The belief must be reiterated that the loan (the previous loan of $3,750,000,000) did nothing but injury to Britain and the Empire, and the Marshall plan will have the same effect."

Last January the same newspaper said: "It therefore becomes the urgent and manifest duty of Britain—her duty to herself, her people, and her future—to declare that the American proposals are utterly unacceptable. The British people are not prepared to sell their financial independence for the cigarettes, prunes, and dried eggs of the Marshall plan. Stand on your own two feet."

We should recognize that there are Britishers who oppose socialism and realize that the Marshall money helps to keep the socialistic Attlee government in power, just like subsidies from Washington to the boss of any political machine in America.

Britain exported only 1,000,000 tons of coal last year. But in 1935 she exported 35,000,000 tons. There was a day when Britain paid for her wheat with her coal. Britain is now stepping up her coal exports, but with the help of the slave labor of prisoners of war who should long ago have been sent to their homes under every rule of international law.

In England, the Society of Individualists is trying to stop the march of the Socialist politicians to complete ownership of the industry of Britain. I quote from one of their bulletins entitled "A Message to the Nation":

"We, of the business community, claim:

"That without our work mankind would still be in a state of primitive barbarism.

"That recent experience has proved the inability of governments to perform our functions and satisfy the economic needs of the people.

"That supplies of the means of life, whether from at home or from abroad, are steadily and rapidly diminishing, because governments are not subject to those economic forces which govern and control the work of individual enterprise.

"We claim the right to shoulder responsibility.

"We have worked for profit on the terms that we paid the losses, and have thus insured to the whole of society the maximum of economy.

"Our traditional freedom acted as a spur to effort. Controls shackle all endeavor. Considered in terms of the work and produce of millions of individuals, the difference between freedom and control is more than sufficient to balance our national deficit.

"We claim that the economic freedom upon which our national supremacy was founded offers the only way out of our present distress.

"We recognize that a return to freedom and competition must mean, for a time, hardship, confusion, and inequalities. It is for the nation to choose between these temporary troubles and permanent destruction by political methods."

SAMUEL B. PETTENGILL.

Conference Report on Displaced Persons

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH B. KEATING

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 18 (legislative day of Thursday, June 17), 1948

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, during my tenure of office I have not encountered a more conscientious and sincere effort to perform a public service than that exhibited by the able gentleman from Maine and the members of his subcommittee. He and they have labored long and faithfully for months on the distressing and heart-rending problem of the displaced persons. They have recently been in conference far into the night in an effort to reconcile the widely conflicting terms of the Fellows bill and the vastly less desirable measure passed in the other body. I realize the great difficulties they have had and sympathize completely with their concern and regret over the adamant attitude they seem to have met.

While the compromise at which they have arrived is some improvement over the original Senate bill, it impresses me as still open to the fundamental objection that it is discriminatory against racial and religious groups and for that reason not consonant with the best traditions of this great country.

Therefore, it seems to me we should return it to the conferees to make another attempt to obtain a more acceptable enactment—one in which we can take pride, rather than one for which we must make excuses.

Address of Prof. Claude Horack

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. HALLECK

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following remarks of Prof. Claude Horack, former dean of Duke University Law School, at the dinner given in his honor by the Inter-American Bar Association and the Duke University alumni, June 16, 1948, Washington, D. C.:

The objectives of the trip through Central and South America and the Caribbean area are to help promote a better understanding between the law schools of the United States and the Latin-American countries. At the present time it is safe to say that only three or four law schools in the United States have a fair understanding of the type and objectives of legal education in these countries, and it is a fair assumption that the Latin-American countries know as little about North American legal education. Each group has a long history and tradition behind it which has affected its viewpoint. Should we be able to effect in even a slight degree a friendly and understanding attitude of one group toward the other, that in itself will be most worth while.

Already there is a very great interest in the interchange of students. Many young men from the United States are applying under the GI bill to study in Latin-American law schools because they see in this an opportunity to represent United States interests in these countries. On the other hand, there are now about 40 students from Latin-American countries who are studying law in the law schools of the United States. It seems quite apparent that this movement will accelerate and within the next few years we may expect a very great interchange. The business interests of the Latin Americas that deal with United States business interests are equally concerned about having in their offices or in the offices of their legal advisers, young men who know something of United States business and traditions and American law. The provision for extension of credit to Latin-American students has already been made by the Association of American Law Schools which now provides for at least 1 year of transfer credit and in some cases, such as in the schools of Louisiana, as much as 2 years.

Up to the present time the difficulty in most schools has been that a school in the United States has not known what to do with a student from Latin America or how to evaluate his credits either for entrance or for law-school credit. In the short time I have been interested in this matter I have already made a great discovery, and that is that I could send transcripts to Dr. Jorge Basadre, of the Pan American Union, or to the United States Bureau of Education, and I would be told what the credits were worth from the standpoint of requirements for admission. If I did nothing else, I would do a great service to the law schools of this country by bringing this fact to their attention. In a few cases on which I had to pass as dean of the law school, I wrote to all the law schools I could think of who had had some experience, to try to obtain some help, at least enough on which to pass a judgment as to the students' qualifications. The information I received was very sketchy and sometimes very inaccurate, yet here was a source of information about which I knew nothing and which would have made it much easier for a student to enter the law school of his choice. As this movement of students gains force, I know that Dr. Basadre's help and that of the Bureau of Education, will be of inestimable value and will do much to promote cultural relations in the Western Hemisphere. So our main objective is to secure better understanding of the purposes and methods of the schools involved in these interchanges and seek to effect a better understanding so that we may get to see the other fellow's viewpoint with the result of securing better relations between lawyers and the countries they represent.

As to the manner in which the trip has been arranged, it is sponsored by the Inter-American Bar Association, the membership of which, as you know, is composed of various bar associations in the hemisphere. We are much indebted to the support given by the American Bar Association, the Bar Association of the District of Columbia and the Women's Bar, the Federal Bar Association, and the many other legal organizations which are members and have contributed through their membership to the support of the association which sponsors this trip. The major portion of the funds have been provided by the Department of State through a grant-in-aid, and I am also indebted to Duke University for the aid which it has given me to make possible this venture.

As to the countries to be visited, this takes in nearly all of the Latin-American republics. After visiting with a number of law school deans in Washington, I will proceed to Louisiana, the one civil-law jurisdiction in the United States, where I will talk with the three schools there to get their ideas about the interchange of students and how it can be best effected. Some day I hope to visit the interesting institution which was established by Judge Arthur Vanderbilt at New York University where at the present time a large portion of the Latin-American law students are studying. There is a most sympathetic interest in the problem in Southern Methodist University where, under the leadership of Dean Robert Storey, an institute similar to the one started by New York University is now beginning operations. Many other schools are considering the problem and are establishing courses which will be of particular value to Latin-American students.

Because of the vast territory involved, it will not be possible at this time to visit all schools, but at least one law school in most of the Latin-American republics will be visited. The first stop will be in Ecuador, then to Peru, Bolivia, Chile, Argentina, Brazil, Paraguay, Uruguay, Venezuela, and Colombia, where the South American trip must necessarily end because this takes up to the first of December at which time the schools of most South American countries begin their summer vacations. The first stop in Central America will be at Guatemala, then to Honduras and to Mexico, and finally a hop to the Dominican Republic, Haiti, and Cuba, and then back to the United States after almost 11 months. A survey can in no way be complete in this length of time, but at least it is a start and I hope it may be carried on by others in subsequent years until we have as full information about Latin-American schools as the American Bar Association now has through its system of school inspection and surveys covering the law schools of the United States.

It is interesting to note that a movement has started in South America for an association of law professors which in general outline seems to correspond with the objectives of the Association of American Law Schools, so that they may discuss law school problems and secure a better understanding of each other, their objectives and methods, and establish somewhat uniform standards for those who are expecting to practice law.

Depression Dangers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD D. DONOHUE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Speaker, without question the most urgent basic economic problem facing this country today is to attain a stabilization of the general level of prices at an appropriate figure. I mean a price level that will make it possible to provide continuing jobs at fair wages for all of our people who want to work. However, the behavior of prices since June of 1946 and the ever-rising living costs demonstrate clearly that prices are not at that appropriate level which will make possible continuing full employment; indeed, the specter of the post-World War I depression is on the horizon.

Statistics released by the Department of Labor point out that over-all cost of living on December 15, 1945, stood at 129.9—with the period 1935 to 1939 equaling 100 points. The figures also show that the index for the cost of all items has continued to rise throughout this year and recently reached 169 points, which represents an unparalleled jump of 30 percent in the over-all cost of living during this time; these increases apply directly to the cost of the basic necessities of life.

These statistics seem academic on paper, but they have definite meaning to the elderly widow existing on a small legacy who figures endlessly how to take care of herself under such conditions. How can she buy a dollar a pound butter and meat, 93 cents a dozen eggs, the other basic foods she needs, and pay rent, medical and doctor bills.

The office girl or store clerk at the soda fountain starts to order a ham sandwich then says, "No; make it lettuce." She needs a new suit to look presentable on her job, and with constantly rising food prices is forced to cut her lunches back to 40 cents. The same problem confronts the student veteran and his wife, the professor's family, those struggling to get along on a small retirement pension, our Federal employees, and the great majority of the people in this country who work for a weekly pay check.

The worker with a $65 a week wage is astounded to find there is not enough money to pay the month's bills. He thought he was getting a good salary. Back in 1939 he would have been doing exceedingly well, but now he and his wife must cut corners very carefully to maintain family living on a decent level. These are the real victims of our current-day inflation and exorbitant price levels.

All the authoritative reports point out that with most manufactured products and some essential raw materials a relatively few big producers control an important part of the total production and directly influence the price that is to be charged.

What that price will be, as demonstrated by the recent price advances in steel, is, unfortunately, all too often, not the adaptation of prices to the requirements of mass market but the price which the dominant big-business men think the traffic will bear. They seek the highest immediate profits without regard for the probable damage to our economy in the long run.

Rigid prices are most often found in industry where the concentration of control has assumed near-monopoly proportions so that we find manufacturers meeting buyers' price resistance by curtailment of supply to avoid the reduction, in price to consumer, which a really competitive market would demand. Our serious economists warn there is paramount danger that industrialists will be tempted to maintain prices at such a high level that our economy will tend to become stabilized at a lower level of production, which will eventually mean widespread unemployment.

I would consider myself utterly remiss in my obligation to the people I represent if I did not offer this reminder that we are obviously pursuing unsound economy policies which invite economic collapse; such a collapse would cost America the confidence of people all over the world in our traditional system of free enterprise.

As you well know the Soviet regime has freely predicted economic collapse for the United States and indeed are eagerly awaiting such a development, because they know that a calamity of this kind would make it impossible for us to continue extending leadership to the smaller nations of the world in their struggle for freedom.

A sound and stable American economy is of vital necessity if we are to prevent the spread of communism and if we are to preserve free democratic processes in this confused, hesitant world.

I earnestly urge my colleagues to give immediate serious attention to this threatening danger of ever-rising prices and unbalanced living costs, in order to protect our own national economic stability and prevent a repetition of our post-World War I economic collapse.

Common Sense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to quote the following editorial from the pen of Mr. Richard Lloyd Jones appearing in the

Tulsa Tribune, of Tulsa, Okla., in the issue of June 5, 1948:

COMMON SENSE

(By Richard Lloyd Jones)

Forty-eight States. Forty-eight stars on our flag. That's the United States of America. Common sense built this country. Nothing has led us into confusions but our departure from the common sense that made us. Nothing can save this Republic but our return to common sense in the management of our common affairs. Have we sense enough to save ourselves?

Ours is a beautiful country. It is a great country. There is no other nation on earth which has so much of everything that is needed to sustain a high level of living, to enrich the lives and enhance the happiness of a people.

Switzerland has mountains. Heroic scenery. But the Alps at their best are not as tremendously impressive as our Rockies, our Sierras, and our Cascades.

Italy has lakes that idle poets love. But nothing more beautiful than our Champlain, Winnepesaukee, Tahoe, Klamath, or any one of a thousand other lakes which have no equal in all of Europe.

And as for scenic harbors our San Francisco Bay and Puget Sound outrank in awe-inspiring beauty the harbor of either Rio or Lisbon.

Our so-called desert lands have colors and flowers unmatched in the Pampas lands of Argentina. On our so-called barren wastes have grown cities the like of which are found nowhere else in the arid areas of the world.

More beautiful even than the magnificence of nature's heroic displays are the fertile farms from Gulf to Great Lakes, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. No other country on earth is blessed with the physical assets that are ours. We have everything with which to enrich our lives. So, why can't we live in peace?

While wise men were drafting the immortal Declaration of Independence which caused the Liberty Bell to proclaim freedom in the new land, men were reading a little book written by a chap whose name was Tom Paine. Tom's little book called Common Sense moved men like the rattle of a snare drum, and the call of the bugle.

It was common sense that caused the Minute Men to leave their plows to fire the shot heard round the world. Freedom was common sense. Common sense pitched the tea in the Boston Harbor. Common sense refused to pay usurious taxes. Common sense shrieked for liberty and got it. Common sense put government into the grass roots of our country.

Our confusions and our high cost of living have all come to pass because we have been misled by demagogs who induced unthinking citizens to take self-government away from the several communities we call States and concentrate all the law-making and taxing power into a central autocracy that repudiates the Republic. This autocracy has developed into a power quite as imperial as that which caused our revolutionary forefathers, fighting for common sense, to turn the redcoats back.

Beginning with 13 States, as the course of empire took its western way, settlements found their geographic boundaries. Stars were added to our flag until now we have 48. A great country. A great country that should be too enlightened to longer be as dumb as we have been to let ourselves drift into economic confusion.

Our confusions have grown as we have centralized our law-making powers into one central capitol, liquidating the self-rule in the 48 State capitols. Our State capitols have all but been abandoned. Not much left in them any more.

The Constitution of the United States, the greatest instrument common sense ever devised, stated in precise terms what should be the function and authority of the Chief Executive, the judiciary, and the legislative branches of the collective government of all the States. After definitely defining how far these central powers could go, the common-sense Constitution definitely drew the line that limited these powers. The Constitution declared that "The United States shall guarantee to every State a republican form of government." Instead of respecting that guaranty, without protest we let the executive branch of the Federal Government take away from each State its republican form of government.

The common-sense Constitution further declares that: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution are reserved to the States respectively."

And it was so done until, attempting to defend the indefensible institution of slavery, the rights of States became confused with a form of property rights that was in violent conflict with human rights.

State's rights was and is the right of home rule. By all the elements of climate and earth New Hampshire differs from New Mexico. New York from Nebraska. Maryland from Montana. Connecticut from Carolina. The local problems should in all common sense be handled by the people's representatives in their own State capitols. It was the common sense of good government in our country's beginning. It is common sense now.

When State's rights prevailed men resigned from the Senate of the United States to accept the higher honor and the greater responsibility of being the Governors of their home States. But we have so far violated both the spirit and the letter of the Constitution that today men use the office of Governor as a stepping stone to get into the Senate. Our Federal Government has reversed the constitutional plan of the Republic.

Without the restraint and interference of Federal monitors our country grew. No New Deal bureaucrat can find a common denominator in the industrial and economic operations of Georgia and Oregon. Individual enterprise was encouraged by local laws to build factories, employ workers who were eager to work, produce commodities that lightened the labors of workers, enriched and embellish-d the people's lives.

But today under the Federal repudiation of our Constitution everything that can be devised to discourage initiative and enterprise and hinder inventive genius has been put into operation to slow down or stop the wheels of progress. Our "expert" economists who devised these assaults upon our freedoms and the politicians who put these crazy concoctions into operation violated their sacred oaths to uphold the Constitution. Neither they nor the people who fell for their treachery show any conception of the injury they have done. And now, with aggravated stupidity, they suggest injury upon injury, interference upon interference, and confusion on confusion. Nothing now is a greater menace to this Republic than the perpetuation of the centralized power which has robbed the States of their constitutional right to self-rule.

Nothing will return us to the life and to the liberties that made us a mighty Nation but our own rededication to the common sense which Washington's army fought for and which the Liberty Bell proclaimed throughout the land.

Candidates for office will multiply the confusions this summer and fall with an assortment of conflicting, ill-considered economic concoctions that cannot be made to work in a land so broad and so diversified in its industrial and commercial activities as America.

Keep within the Constitution of the United States. Make any man who seeks to be President, every Congressman who seeks office in our National Capitol, and every candidate for judicial powers pledge himself to respect the republics of each of the several States and, obedient to his oath of office, no longer violate the specified limitations of the Constitution of our country.

Common sense made America, and only common sense can save us.

Tobacco Program: Its History, Its Accomplishments, Its Future

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VIRGIL CHAPMAN

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, the term "farm legislation" is comparatively new in American legislative history. Scarcely any laws for the benefit of agriculture were enacted by Congress from the inauguration of George Washington on April 30, 1789, to the inauguration of Franklin D. Roosevelt on March 4, 1933. Practically all farm legislation has become law since the spring of 1933, and the many acts of Congress during the intervening years have resulted in the most successful and beneficial farm program in the history of the world.

At the height of the fictitious prosperity that reached its peak in 1929 farm products could be exchanged for only 91 percent as much of other products as they could be exchanged for prior to the First World War. In the midst of the depression that began in 1929, the disparity became worse, and in February 1933, on the eve of the inauguration of President Roosevelt, the exchange value of farm products for industrial goods had fallen to 50 percent of the prewar average. The exchange value of farm products for taxes and credit was at an even lower level.

No segment of agriculture was at a lower ebb than tobacco. The 1931 burley crop sold for an average of 8.7 cents; fire-cured: type 22, 5.8 cents; type 23, 4 cents; type 24, 4 cents; dark air-cured: type 35, 3.4 cents; type 36, 3.3 cents.

Because of unusual competitive conditions growing out of the depression, which resulted in increased consumption of lower-priced cigarettes, the price of burley in 1932 rose to the munificent average of 12.5 cents per pound. The same disparity between the price of farm products and other commodities was rapidly breaking down the business structure of the country through impairment of the purchasing power of agriculture, America's basic industry.

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 1933

One of the first steps to relieve the economic illness of the country and to deliver the American farmer from economic bondage was the enactment of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which became a law on May 12, 1933. As a base period to establish parity between farm products and the things farmers have to buy, the authors of the bill selected the 5-year period, 1909–14. Some of us who had lived for years with the constantly recurring difficulties of Kentucky's principal money crop and understood the problems of its growers, saw in this act, as introduced, a mirage in a desert; a promise impossible of fulfillment, because the base period 1909–14 would have left tobacco untouched and would have brought no benefits to its growers. The intervening years between that base period and 1933 had witnessed a remarkable transition in the production and processing of tobacco. The burley tobacco of the 1909–14 period was a heavy tobacco used largely for smoking and chewing. The cigarette had grown into a major commercial product since 1910. Scarcely any burley had been used in cigarettes prior to 1915 when about 10 percent of burley went into the making of that growing tobacco product, the manufactured cigarette. The rapidly increasing popularity of the cigarette created a demand for a lighter and finer burley tobacco than had been produced during the prewar period. Our small tobacco group in Congress saw the necessity for a base period for tobacco that would make the Agricultural Adjustment Act operative for the benefit of Kentucky's principal money crop, and succeeded in changing the base period of tobacco from that applicable to all other crops to a 10-year postwar period, 1919–29. Without this change the new farm program would have been ineffective on tobacco and of no benefit to tobacco growers.

AAA UNCONSTITUTIONAL—SOIL CONSERVATION ACT

On January 6, 1936, the United States Supreme Court in the Hoosac Mill case held the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933 was unconstitutional, thus ending the most successful plan that had ever been undertaken up to that time to bring about rational self-governing production control, and to eliminate nerve-wracking uncertainty and wild fluctuation from tobacco markets. Without delay our tobacco group began conferences among ourselves, with representative tobacco growers, and officials of the Department of Agriculture, with the determination to develop a plan consistent with constitutional limitations that would permit a continuance of the benefits that had accrued to tobacco growers during the 2 years of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933.

Early in 1934 the Department of Agriculture had estimated that 50,000,000 acres of farm land had been destroyed by washing away and that an additional 50,000,000 acres had been almost as severely damaged. The Congress passed the Soil Erosion Act for the improvement and preservation of soil as one of our most valuable national resources. The first step we took in trying to find a legislative substitute for the invalidated Agricultural Adjustment Act was by enactment of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act of February 29, 1936. It provided a base for production adjustment of tobacco that complied with the doctrine laid down by the Supreme Court in its decision holding the original Agricultural Adjustment Act unconstitutional, but it proved insufficient standing alone as a solution of the tobacco growers' problem.

STATE COMPACT LAW

We later sought to implement it by the enactment of the State compact law, which was a clearly constitutional method of adjusting tobacco production, without benefit payments, depending for its strength on the valid exercise of the police power inherent in the sovereignty of the States. After the requisite number of States failed to adopt a compact law pursuant to the act of Congress authorizing such compacts, we were confronted with the necessity of seeking another solution of our problem.

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 1938

While the Soil Conservation Act fulfilled our most sanguine expectations in the conservation of soil it was extremely disappointing as a substitute for the Agricultural Adjustment Act and resulted in the 1937 crop being the second largest crop of burley tobacco that had ever been produced. We had witnessed the economic wreckage of the section of the country dependent upon burley tobacco when the 1920 crop, following the period of World War inflation, sold for 13.37 cents per pound. We had seen the average price received by farmers for all types of tobacco in the United States declined from 18.3 cents in 1929 to 10.5 cents in 1932, and the farmers' income from tobacco had declined during the same period from $281,000,000 to $107,000,000. We had seen burley tobacco drop from 31.34 cents in the boom year of 1928 to 8.63 cents in 1931, in the midst of the great depression. During the same period we had seen the income from tobacco drop from $86,252,359 to less than $38,000,000. The recurrence of such experiences was unthinkable. A new law was necessary, and out of that necessity came the Agricultural Adjustment Act of February 16, 1938, which, with its subsequent amendments, is probably the most constructive, important, and beneficial law ever enacted for the solution of the difficult and complex problems of agricultural economy.

Numerous amendments have been written into the law. Every time experience has taught us that an improvement was needed the tobacco Representatives in Congress have formulated and sponsored the enactment of legislation to effect the needed improvement. Four important amendments, introduced by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY], and me, became law August 7, 1939. Their enactment led to a reversal of votes on a referendum and saved the quota system. Provision for 3-year quotas was made by an enactment approved May 31, 1940. The hardest fight we have ever had was in the fall of 1940, when we undertook to change the base period for calculating parity from the 10-year postwar period to the present 5-year base period, 1934–39. After weeks of effort the tobacco group succeeded in enacting the proposed change into law.

LAW EXTENDING TIME TO INCREASE QUOTAS

When Congress convened in January of 1942, soon after our entrance into the recent World War, we thought we could foresee an unprecedented demand for tobacco that would result from the increased purchasing power of the American people and the inevitable shipment of huge quantities of cigarettes overseas. Accordingly, we sought to procure a 20 percent increase in burley marketing quotas for the ensuing crop year. Failing in this, I introduced a bill which became a law February 28, 1942, granting to the Secretary of Agriculture the power to raise marketing quotas by not exceeding 20 percent at any time from his original proclamation of quotas December 1 to March 1 of the succeeding year. The burley marketing season has usually started early in December and it is impossible December 1 to forecast accurately the amount of the crop just beginning to be sold. The new law makes it possible for the Secretary to readjust the allotments for the following year if the marketing season reveals the need for an increase of allotments as was demonstrated during the marketing season of 1947–48, following which the Secretary of Agriculture, under the power granted him by the act of February 28, 1942, restored nearly all of the cut that had been ordered by him in the proclamation of December 1, 1947, before the beginning of the marketing season.

QUOTAS PRESERVED IN WAR

In the summer of 1943 quotas were removed from all farm products except burley and flue-cured tobacco. When it became apparent to our tobacco group in the House of Representatives that those types of tobacco, for which there existed an unprecedented demand and which were already bringing high prices, were to be removed from production control and quotas were to be discontinued, because the Secretary of Agriculture could not proclaim quotas in accordance with the requirements of the statutory formula, we held a conference and decided to secure the enactment of a law to continue quotas on burley and flue-cured tobacco notwithstanding the statutory formula. We agreed on such a bill, which by request of the group, was introduced by me and which was enacted into law in July 1943. This action by the representatives of tobacco-growing districts saved the quota system for burley and flue-cured tobacco. There was no need at that time for quotas for dark air-cured and fire-cured tobacco, according to the judgment and advice of representative growers of those types of tobacco and officials of the Department of Agriculture. If there had been a need for quotas then, those types of tobacco would have been included in the act of July 1943, which was supported by the representatives of the dark-tobacco-producing districts. It is interesting to try to imagine the extent of the calamity that would have befallen the growers of burley and flue-cured tobacco, the principal ingredients of the American type of blended cigarettes, in the years following the recent war if we had not provided by that act for a referendum in 1943 which saved the production-adjustment program for those types of tobacco.

DARK AIR-CURED AND FIRE-CURED SUPPORT PRICE

By 1945 the growers of dark air-cured and fire-cured tobacco in the western sections of Kentucky and Tennessee were in need of production control and a support price that would enable them to continue, with a reasonable hope of profit, the production of those types of dark tobacco which had been the money crop of those sections for several generations. Their bill was introduced by Congressman Earl C. Clements, the present Governor of Kentucky, who had the united support of the tobacco group in Congress. The enactment of the Clements bill involved the establishment of a new formula for support prices based on the support price of burley tobacco. The burley support price is 90 percent of parity, and the Clements Act established the support price for dark fired tobacco at 90 percent of the burley support price and the support price of dark air-cured tobacco at 66⅔ percent of the support price of burley.

LAW AID TO BOTH DARK AND BURLEY

This law proved also a great boon to the growers of burley tobacco; in fact, its enactment has contributed a great deal to a balanced economy in the States of Kentucky and Tennessee, which produce the vastly major portion of the three types of tobacco—burley, dark air-cured, and dark fired. Historically, since the early days in Kentucky and Tennessee, the farmers of the western part of those States have depended upon dark tobacco as their chief source of livelihood. The narrow, selfish, isolationist, reactionary tariff policies of the Republican Party erected trade barriers around our country and virtually destroyed the foreign market for dark air-cured and fire-cured tobacco, both of which have always been in large measure export products. When their historic market was destroyed it was natural that people accustomed to the cultivation of tobacco and to dependence upon it as a cash crop should turn their hands to the production of burley tobacco, for which there was a growing demand and the prospect of a profitable price. They were not to be censured for that because it was a case of self-preservation, but the result was very detrimental to the economic welfare of burley growers in central and eastern Kentucky and in middle and eastern Tennessee. The result was that, as burley acreage spread into the dark-tobacco area, the price of burley tobacco was depressed, and the value of burley-producing land declined. Thus, the Republican tariff policy by destroying the export trade in dark tobacco inflicted severe financial loss on the growers of all types of tobacco in Kentucky and Tennessee, with the inevitable ill effect on the entire economic fabric of those two States. By accepting dark-tobacco quotas, which the new price-support plan contained in Public Law 163 made possible, growers of dark tobacco precluded themselves from burley quotas, with desirable results to the producers of burley, fire-cured and dark air-cured tobacco, and the great improvement of the economic condition of the sections dependent upon those types of tobacco as the major source of income.

STOCKS AND STANDARDS ACT OF AUGUST 31, 1935

One of the most important laws in regard to tobacco from a long-range standpoint is the tobacco Stocks and Standards Act of August 31, 1935, which I introduced in the House and Senator BARKLEY introduced in the Senate. Those who understood the importance to tobacco growers and the tobacco trade in general of collecting and publishing statistical information on tobacco by types and grades had long recognized the need for improvement in the law on that subject. Its benefits have been even greater than we could foresee. It has proved of great importance in every phase of the tobacco program since its enactment. It is used constantly by all who deal with tobacco subjects. It has been of inestimable value in the administration of the price-support program, which has maintained a floor under the price of tobacco during recent years.

FIGHTS FOR FEDERAL GRADING ON ALL MARKETS

When the tobacco market showed danger signals of collapse in 1940 it became necessary to provide Federal graders for all markets in order to make available to growers the benefits of the price-support plan, which at that time amounted to 85 percent of parity. There were then 43 burley markets, only 16 of which had Federal grading, and there were 12 dark fired markets, only 3 of which had Federal grading. The price-support plan could not be put in operation at any market which did not have the uniform grading system. It was necessary to get a sufficient appropriation almost overnight to supply graders to all burley and dark fired tobacco markets. Failure to do so would probably have resulted in closing 27 of the 43 burley markets and 9 of the 12 dark fired markets. This was unthinkable. Our tobacco group in Congress, stanchly supported by the Burley Tobacco Growers Cooperative Association and the Kentucky Farm Bureau, succeeded in our effort, and the tobacco growers came safely through another crisis. For several years we experienced difficulty annually in obtaining a sufficient appropriation to maintain the grading system, authorized by the Flannagan Tobacco Inspection Act of August 23, 1935, on all of the markets for tobacco, but after several successful fights for an adequate appropriation the Appropriations Committee became aware of the necessity of uniform grading for the operation of the price-support plan, and during the war years for the maintenance of ceilings as well. Neither plan could have functioned without the important grading service.

NEW PRICE FORMULA FOR CEILINGS

On September 7, 1942, President Roosevelt asked Congress for a new Price Control Act. The economic situation was dangerous, and the war program and the country's economic stability were in serious jeopardy from inflationary increases in living costs. The Banking and Currency Committees of the House and Senate reported a bill which included authority to impose ceilings on farm products including tobacco. I thought it was unfair to impose a ceiling on burley tobacco when its chief competitor, flue-cured tobacco, the other principal cigarette tobacco, had been sold without ceilings in a market that was almost ready to close. The burley market was yet to open, and, under the terms of the bill, as reported, would have been sold under a ceiling of approximately 27 cents per pound, which was 2 cents less than the 1941 crop had brought. However, if there were to be ceilings on burley tobacco, it was necessary to find a different formula for determining what the ceiling should be than the one written into the bill as reported by the committees. The cost of producing and marketing tobacco had increased since the preceding year and the growers were entitled to a higher price. I devised a new price formula for fixing ceilings on burley tobacco, and drafted it into an amendment of 47 words. This amendment, sponsored by Representative SPENCE, of Kentucky, a member of the House Committee on Banking and Currency, and by Senator BARKLEY, of Kentucky, a member of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, was accepted as a committee amendment by both committees, and became a part of the Price Control Act of October 2, 1942. The net result of that 49-word amendment brought to burley tobacco growers $227,609,700 more for the three crops that were sold under ceilings than could have been received for those crops of tobacco if I had not devised the new price formula and it had not been written into law.

FUTURE OF TOBACCO

My idea of a future program for tobacco is as follows:

QUALITY, NOT QUANTITY

First. Growers should specialize on quality instead of quantity. Instead of trying to produce a large amount of heavy, coarse tobacco, they should use every means at their command to grow a fine, light type of disease-free tobacco of such quality that there will be an unfailing market for it at a living price.

CONTINUE PROGRAM UNIMPAIRED

Second. It is necessary that we continue our production adjustment program with sufficient appropriations for measuring land, enforcement of quotas, and for the administration of the acts providing for grading, market reports, and stocks and standards, all of which implement and strengthen the entire tobacco program.

NEW USES FOR TOBACCO

Third. The Seventy-ninth Congress enacted the Agricultural Research and Marketing Act, which is popularly referred to as the Flannagan-Hope Act, in honor of the then chairman and the present chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, both of whom have long records of honorable and constructive service to the cause of agriculture. From the time this bill was introduced I thought I could see in it greater potentialities for the benefit of tobacco growers than for the growers of any other agricultural commodity. I followed its legislative course with great interest and high hope. Very little has been done in laboratories for the development of byproducts from tobacco. A little nicotine and a little chlorophyl represent the extent of accomplishment along that line. Much progress has been made through laboratory experiments with grain and cotton, and useful commodities have been developed from them. I have always believed that there were great possibilities of finding new uses for tobacco. When I think of the almost miraculous achievements of the industrial chemists of America, especially the discoveries during the recent war period, I cannot but wonder what that same chemical genius might accomplish with tobacco. When I go fishing with a nylon line that will hold the biggest fish I ever hope to catch, and I am told that it was made of coal, water, and air, I cannot help wondering what potentialities there may be in a hand of pungent, aromatic, fragrant tobacco. I believe that chemical research will result in discoveries that will find new uses for tobacco so that cheaper grades will not go to the warehouse floor for sale in competition with the finer grades of tobacco, but will be diverted to other profitable uses. Such a result would add greatly to the prosperity of tobacco-growing sections. I earnestly hope that the Congress will make more adequate appropriations for the activities authorized by the Agricultural Research and Marketing Act.

FOREIGN MARKETS FOR TOBACCO

Fourth. There has always been a strong foreign market for flue-cured tobacco. Before the Republican tariff policies practically destroyed the foreign market for dark air-cured and fire-cured tobacco, those types enjoyed a lucrative export trade. Prior to the recent war there had never been any appreciable foreign market for burley tobacco. With adequate appropriations for the administration of the Research and Marketing Act, our Government can be very helpful in rebuilding the foreign market for dark tobacco, and in enlarging the outlet of burley to other lands in which there has recently been cultivated a taste for the American type of blended cigarette. During World War II millions of American citizens in the uniform of our country carried American-blended cigarettes to every section of the earth. In view of the precarious export situation that confronts the growers of flue-cured tobacco as a result of conditions in England, which have in large measure closed the principal foreign market for flue-cured tobacco, I believe it behooves the flue-cured growers and the burley growers to work together in unity to cultivate the taste for the American cigarettes of which those two types of tobacco are the principal constituents. The flue-cured producers can no longer depend on England as the principal market for their product. The burley growers have had little export trade, but hundreds of millions of people in other lands have acquired an appetite for the cigarettes in which the two types are blended.

LONG STRUGGLE FOR EXPORT TRADE

In January 1947 Members of Congress representing districts that produce burley, flue-cured, dark air-cured, and fire-cured tobacco began a series of conferences with representative growers of those types of tobacco and officials of the Government, seeking to devise ways and means to develop an export trade. We sought vigorously, but without much success, to get tobacco into the American zone of Germany. We continued our efforts and did succeed in having tobacco included in the interim aid program. We also succeeded in having it included in the larger and more far-reaching European recovery program. We fought successfully for an appropriation for that purpose, when it was challenged. The only limitation on the purchase of American tobacco of all types by foreign countries is the limitation of funds. There is a demand for dark air-cured and fire-cured tobacco, which was formerly used extensively in many countries of Europe. There is a lively and constantly growing demand for the American type of cigarette made largely of flue-cured and burley tobacco with a little of Maryland tobacco added for its burning quality. Considerable quantities of tobacco are now being exported. A few days ago a rather large transaction was consummated. They will manufacture blended cigarettes in Europe out of American tobaccos. The development of the full potentialities of export trade in Kentucky's principal money crop will go far toward the solution of our surplus problems, and will be an important factor in continuing prosperous conditions in the tobacco growing areas of this country.

UNIFIED EFFORTS

The success that has attended this undertaking has been due in large measure to the cooperation and team work of all interested groups. Members of Congress in both Houses from tobacco-growing States have been unfailing in their efforts. All of the associations of growers of burley, dark air-cured, and fire-cured tobacco, the Burley Warehousemen's Association, and the Association of Dealers in Burley and Dark Tobacco, representing the growers, warehousemen, and dealers of all States in which those types of tobacco are grown, together with the Kentucky Farm Bureau Federation, united in 1947 to form the Burley and Dark Leaf Tobacco Export Association, Inc., of which Mr. John W. Jones, of North Middletown, Ky., is president, and Mr. Hugh W. Taylor, of Washington, is secretary. This united effort on the part of all groups interested in the export of these types of tobacco has already been of great benefit, and a continuance of such unity bids fair to develop the foreign trade that will assure a continuing market for this important commodity.

PRICE SUPPORT ESSENTIAL

Fifth. It is essential that we maintain a price support that is in effect a floor under the price of tobacco. This is the only absolute insurance the farmers have against a return to marketing conditions under which the only man who touched tobacco, directly or indirectly, from the time the seed was sowed in the plant bed until the cigarette was purchased at the store, who didn't receive a fair proportion of the consumer's dollar, was the man who spent a year in the production of the crop. The present support price is 90 percent of parity and that support price ought to be continued indefinitely. The House of Representatives recently passed a bill to continue the support price at 90 percent of parity until July 1, 1950. The Senate also passed a bill, known as the Aiken bill, containing an amendment providing the same support price for tobacco that is provided in the House bill. I hope there will be no failure by this Congress to continue the support price plan now in effect. The conferees have been in disagreement all day. I hope they will reach an agreement before adjournment. If Congress should adjourn without passing such a law, it would be necessary for it to reconvene before the expiration of the present support price December 31, 1948.

THE AIKEN BILL

When the Aiken bill was first introduced it contained provisions that would have completely wrecked the burley- and dark-tobacco programs. When I read the bill, I took it upon myself to request for all interested growers a hearing before the Senate Committee on Agriculture. The hearing was set for April 24, 1948, and witnesses appeared representing all organizations of tobacco growers and warehousemen, together with the Farm Bureau and the Grange. The growers' organizations represented every State growing types of tobacco now under the quota system. We had a preliminary meeting at the Ambassador Hotel on April 23 and agreed on plans for presenting arguments the following day in opposition to the tobacco sections of the Aiken bill in the form in which it was pending before the committee. Following that hearing the bill was reported in a form much less destructive to the tobacco program than it had been prior to the hearing. The following day I issued a statement pointing out that the bill, while a great improvement over its original form, had not been drafted to meet all of the justifiable objections made by growers' representative at the hearing. I stated that the principal objection of the growers to the Aiken bill, as reported, was that it substituted a variable plan for computing parity for the fixed-base period plan now in successful operation, and that it substituted a sliding scale of price supports for the constant 90 percent of parity price support that has met successfully the test of time and experience. Some people defended the price-support plan in the Aiken bill, under which, in a period of large production and declining prices, the price support would decline also, and in years of a short crop, when prices would be high, the support price would be higher also. In neither case would it be of much, if any, benefit to the growers. I continued to criticize the parity definition and flexible price support in the Aiken bill, and emphasized the danger of making the change, in a speech in favor of H. R. 6248 to continue the present price-support program, which passed the House June 12, 1948. It was gratifying when the Senate, in passing the Aiken bill June 17, adopted the parity and price-support formulas, which have worked so successfully in stabilizing tobacco markets and in insuring tobacco growers against disorderly declining markets. It is obvious that, although the authors of the Aiken bill were ambitious to improve upon the present farm program, they learned during the weeks of its consideration that they could not improve upon the parts of it affecting tobacco. The action of the Senate in passing the Aiken bill with its tobacco provisions is a complete endorsement of the tobacco program which has resulted from the united efforts of the growers, the men in Congress representing tobacco States, and the officials who have administered the program from its inception.

SOIL CONSERVATION

Sixth. Underlying the entire tobacco program and essential to its successful permanent operation is soil conservation. It behooves tobacco growers to work together with all other farmers for the continuance of the soil-conservation program that was inaugurated in 1934.

We have had hard battles to secure necessary appropriations for the constructive soil-conservation program since the Republican Party gained a majority in the present Congress, but we must be constantly on guard to retain the gains we have made, remembering always that eternal vigilance is the price not only of liberty but of many other blessings we enjoy as a free people in a free Republic.

Presentation to the Honorable Louis Ludlow, of Indiana

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. PERCY PRIEST
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago in a ceremony in the press gallery tribute was paid to a truly great American, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW].

Under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to include here a transcript of the program on that occasion.

It follows:

PRESENTATION TO HON. LOUIS L. LUDLOW, OF INDIANA, PRESS GALLERY, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JUNE 15, 1948

(Present: Hon. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., the Speaker; Hon. SAM RAYBURN; Hon. JOHN W. MCCORMACK; Hon. ROBERT CROSSER; Hon. MARY T. NORTON; members of the press; family and friends of Hon. LOUIS L. LUDLOW.)

Mr. TRUMAN FELT (secretary of the National Press Club). Ladies and gentlemen, LOUIS LUDLOW has so many friends in the press corps and in Congress, after nearly a half-century in the Capital, that we simply could not see him retire without some small token of our esteem. The president of the National Press Club, one of his successors in that office, had to be absent from the city, covering a certain nonpolitical story on the west coast that you may have heard of and, as a former Hoosier and secretary of the club, he asked me to represent him on this occasion. I am delighted, because I do not know anyone who ever came from Indiana who did not regard Mr. LUDLOW as a friend.

As the word got around, the movement just grew and mushroomed and the only problem was that everyone wanted to make a speech, and we decided about the only way we could solve that problem was not to have any speeches.

We should like to have just a few words, if we may, from the leaders who have served in Congress with Mr. LUDLOW, so I thought I might call on the Speaker and on Mr. RAYBURN.

Speaker MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, Louis, and ladies and gentlemen, all of whom I am sure are friends of Louis. I am happy to be here this afternoon and to join in this splendid tribute. It is a tribute to a fine legislator, a faithful public servant and a grand fellow in every sense of the word.

We know newspapermen make good Congressmen and Louis demonstrated that he was an able Representative. He possesses a thorough knowledge of the many problems before Congress and he has rendered invaluable service to his country.

I am told he is to be presented with a scroll testifying to the esteem in which he is held by his friends. I should like to tell him that whenever he looks at this token of friendship, he will know that imprinted in the hearts of all of us who remain behind will be a memory of a warm personal friend, a fine American and one whom we all love.

We feel sorry at his departure because we realize a fine man and a good public servant is departing. We hope, Louis, that you will enjoy the rest you well deserve and will find happiness and contentment in your memories of the pleasant days passed here in Congress. There is one thing all of us come to realize about this great institution that we call Congress; whether we are Democrats or Republicans, we are imbued with the dominating desire to do that which is best for our country.

Louis has exemplified in a great measure the highest ideals of Congress. Because of his faithful service, his many fine attributes, we all, regardless of party, regret his leaving us.

Louis, may you have many years of happiness in the years ahead. [Applause.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FELT. I know we would like to have a few words from Mr. RAYBURN.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, Louis, and your friends, and I know they are your friends, because long before you became a Member of the House you were in this gallery, as I remember, and had many friends then.

I know with what satisfaction the members of the press expressed their happiness when you were made a Member of the House of Representatives. Yours has been a splendid life and a fruitful life: a fine newspaperman, a capable and efficient and able legislator, and, above all that, one of God's noblemen—an American gentleman in every sense of the word.

Louis, our hearts go with you. You have our friendship that you may cherish, because, if you have an enemy in Washington, in the House of Representatives or any place else, I do not know it.

God bless you and keep you, my friend. [Applause.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Thank you, Mr. RAYBURN.

Mr. FELT. I should like to present this scroll to Mr. LUDLOW and for the benefit of those who have not seen it, I think I shall read it. It is brief and it is a very modest and, I am afraid, an inadequate expression of the sentiments of all of us.

"LOUIS L. LUDLOW, OF INDIANA

"On the eve of his retirement after a long, exceptionally meritorious and fruitful career, first as a Washington correspondent and Hoosier author and later as a Member of Congress, his many friends and colleagues in the Nation's Capital take this occasion to pay their heartfelt tribute.

"A former president of the National Press Club and the first correspondent to go directly from the congressional press galleries to a seat in the House of Representatives, he has always displayed the breadth of vision of true statesmanship and an unflagging zeal to serve the public interest.

"His fellow Washington newspapermen and his colleagues in Congress wish him Godspeed and enjoyment of the rewards of a life whose accomplishments in the arts of letters and lawmaking, whose generous understanding and whose unfailing kindliness knew no narrow partisan or geographical bounds.

"Done this 15th day of June A. D. 1948."

Mr. LUDLOW, it is a great pleasure for me to present this to you.

Mr. LUDLOW. Thank you, Mr. Felt.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. RAYBURN, Mr. MCCORMACK, and friends, I shall not undertake to make a speech, but I want you to know how deeply my family and I appreciate this beautiful gift and the generous and kindly sentiment that inspired it. We shall treasure it always as one of our most prized possessions.

I said I would not undertake, Mr. Felt, to make a speech, but I fell into my old habit of writing and wrote something which I hope will not be inappropriate to the occasion. I shall ask my wonderful secretary, Mrs. Esther Pillen, to read that little article to you, and I beg your indulgence while she does.

(The statement Mrs. Pillen read is as follows:)

"Dear friends, there are times when the tongue cannot speak the language of the heart, and that is the fix I find myself in when I undertake to express my appreciation of the beautiful gift. To all who have participated in this gracious offering, I can only say, with deepest feeling, from the bottom of my heart, 'I thank you.'

"I joined the press gallery in the fall of 1901, nearly 47 years ago, as Washington correspondent of the Indianapolis Sentinel. When I arrived at the Capitol, Col. Daniel M. Ransdell, Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, an old Indianapolis friend, escorted me to the Senate press gallery and introduced me to its Superintendent, Jim Preston, who was as youthful in spirit and action then as he is now. His assistant, who afterward became Secretary of the Senate, was the late Col. Ed Halsey. My recollection is that Charlie Mann was Superintendent of the House press gallery at that time. Shelby M. Cullom, a personal friend of Abraham Lincoln, was a Senator from Illinois. Other prominent Senators were Orville Platt, of Connecticut; Thomas C. Platt, of New York; Eugene Hale, of Maine; and Nelson Aldrich, of Rhode Island. Boies Penrose, of Pennsylvania, arose to the zenith of his power soon afterward.

"In those times the opening day of Congress was an auspicious occasion, when outstanding members of the press gallery upheld the dignity of the press by wearing high hats and long-tailed coats. Being of the common and garden variety and possessing neither type of sartorial equipment, I kept in the background. With two small children, my wife and I found hard going on my salary of $25 a week.

"Only a few persons whose service in the press gallery antedates mine are now living. Senator CAPPER is the only one I recall, although there may be others. When I entered the press gallery in 1901 there were 172 accredited correspondents. Now there are 750, of whom more than 100 are women.

"For years after I came the only woman member of the gallery was Mrs. Isabel Worrell Ball. Her entrance was warmly contested by the male members, who felt that to have a woman around would be a handicap to freedom of speech and action, but she was a woman of stamina, and she kept on trying until she secured the necessary credentials. She later married Col. John McElroy, publisher of the National Tribune, a newspaper devoted to the interests of the Union soldiers of the War Between the States.

"I well remember the derision with which the House Appropriations Committee in the long ago greeted the first suggestions of a small appropriation to develop aviation. There were caustic comments on the futility of man's efforts to imitate the birds, and sardonic remarks about 'Darius Green and his flying machine.' Even after Orville and Wilbur Wright had demonstrated at Kitty Hawk that a flying machine will really fly, the Appropriation members were skeptical and cold to the proposition and unwilling to vote more than the most meager token appropriations. Little did I imagine then that the day would come when as a member of that committee I would vote billions for airplanes.

"When I came to Washington what is now the west section of the House Restaurant was a barroom with a sawdust floor, brass rail, and all the usual accouterments. An Indiana Member of Congress, responsive to the rising prohibition sentiment in his district, was accustomed over a period of years to introduce riders to appropriation bills to abolish that barroom. The House would adopt the rider and a goodly number of Members would go straightway over to the Senate and intimate that there would be no hard feelings if the Senate would kill the rider and the Senate would obligingly do so. But the time came when the Senate decided that if the House wished so ardently to part company with Bacchus it should be permitted to do so. It adopted the rider and the saloon went out of the Capitol, never to return. That was about 40 years ago.

"I was present in the House Press Gallery when the House, under the leadership of Representative George Norris of Nebraska, adopted the resolution dethroning Speaker Joe Cannon by taking away from him the power of appointing standing committees and vesting that power in the caucuses of the two political parties. This action was taken after several days of acrimonious debate. Prior to that time Speakers had packed the committees in favor of legislation which they supported and against legislation which they opposed. The system was penicious in the extreme and its abolishment did not come too soon.

"Uncle Joe Cannon was a commoner of the homespun type and always bought his clothes ready-made. It was his proud boast that he never paid over $30 for a suit in his life. His daughter, Helen, often tried in vain to induce him to have a tailor make a suit to order for him. Finally, she and Jim Watson combined their efforts and persuaded him to be measured for a suit by a well-known tailor by promising that he would not have to pay more than the usual price for a tailor-made suit. When his measure was taken he asked the price and was agreeably surprised when the tailor replied: "Thirty dollars." It was a beautiful suit and Uncle Joe exhibited it proudly to his friends, with many compliments to the tailor on the quality of his goods and the moderation of his prices, but he did not know until a long time afterward that Helen slipped the tailor a $50 bill to square the account.

"I was in the press gallery when a distinguished Representative from Mississippi, one of the quaintest characters I have ever known, in a speech of great volume and vehemence, declared: 'There are times in the lives of all of us when we must rise above principle.' I suppose that speech has been quoted about as often as any ever delivered in the House.

"I was also in the press gallery 23 years ago when Representative W. D. Upshaw, of Atlanta, rushed into the House, secured recognition of the Speaker, waved a telegram and dramatically announced the birth of 'Theodore Roosevelt Longworth. In his haste and excitement he had assumed the newcomer was a boy and had not taken time for verification on that important point. I have never heard what Paulina has to say about this faux pas.

"My mind also recalls in retrospect many more somber and solemn occasions. I was in the press gallery when Woodrow Wilson, in a personal appearance before Congress in joint session, asked for a declaration of war against the Central Powers. I could not then foresee, of course, that later, on a similar occasion, I would vote for six similar resolutions declaring a state of war to exist between the United States and Germany and Japan and their satellites.

"I did not intend to tax your patience by going so far afield, but the thoughtful gift from you and other friends inspires a train of hallowed memories of my long service in the press gallery. My family and I will treasure this gift as one of our most valued possessions." [Prolonged applause.]

Anthony D. Tieso, State Commander, Disabled American Veterans of Massachusetts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include a telephone speech I made on the occasion of a banquet recently tendered in Boston to Anthony D. Tieso, State commander of the Disabled American Veterans of Massachusetts:

Mr. Toastmaster, distinguished guests, and my valued friend, State Commander Tieso, ladies and gentlemen: I am glad of the opportunity to be able to join with you tonight in honoring State Commander Tieso. It is a source of personal pleasure to me.

It is fitting and proper that this group should join together to pay homage to a man so worthy as Tony Tieso. While there are a number of attributes that make for nobility of character in a person, that which is all-important is loyalty, and Tony Tieso has loyalty ingrained in every fiber of his being. When a man is loyal, he is, of necessity, also sincere, devoted, generous, charitable, and is too, a man who stands by his friends and fights for right and justice. Such a man is State Commander Anthony D. Tieso, and we find his loyalty evidenced in innumerable ways.

As a loving and devoted husband and father, he has shown his loyalty to his family, and because of it he is highly respected by all who know him. We hold him in high esteem because we realize that in the application of his love and loyalty to his fine family he strengthens the foundations of our beloved country, for we know that a strong and sound Government depends on a strong family life.

We have seen his loyalty evidenced in thousands of ways during his many years of service at the Boston Navy Yard, when he gave of his time untiringly to fight for the best interests of his fellow-workers, and for the best interests of the Boston Navy Yard. We are all aware of the magnificent results of his efforts.

I can well testify to his loyalty in this, and many other respects for many times during the past 20 years my valued friend, Tony Tieso, has presented to me the cases of hundreds of employees of the Boston Navy Yard, and asked me to go to bat in the interest of a worthy worker. You are all aware of his thorough knowledge of the civil-service rules and regulations, and the fact that because of Tony Tieso there is in the laws of the land today legislation which benefits the civilian employee of the Navy Department, and the United States. I know, because I helped write the legislation.

Tony Tieso has worked hard for the civilian employees in the ranks of the civil service, but, his greatest efforts, and his greatest results have been in behalf of the veteran who fought that his country might live. Tony Tieso has labored arduously in behalf of all veterans but his heart has been with the disabled veterans, and those who are their dependents, their widows, and their orphans. It has been to these beloved ones of our departed comrades that Commander Tieso has unstintingly given of his time, his devotion, and his loyalty.

I say again, a man of such loyalty deserves richly the honor you are paying to him this evening.

To Tony, to Mrs. Tieso, to their fine family, may I say that Mrs. McCormack joins with me in extending to you all our esteem, and our firm hand of friendship.

H. R. 4071, Amendment to Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act of 1938—History of That Act — Differences Between New Law and Old Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. VIRGIL CHAPMAN
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, the adoption of this conference report on H. R. 4071 will restore to the Food and Drug Administration the authority to protect the American people from filthy, contaminated food which becomes dangerous to health while stored in a warehouse after the actual shipment in interstate commerce. Conservative estimates by reliable and responsible witnesses before our committee were that at least 20 tons of such food every day has been protected from seizure and removal from the market by a recent court decision, which held, in substance, that foods and drugs are no longer in interstate commerce after they are unloaded at the end of actual transit in interstate commerce. Since the enactment of the original Wiley Act in 1906, the public had been protected from foods and drugs that became contaminated and dangerous while stored in a warehouse to which they were shipped. The committee viewed nauseating pictures of foodstuffs infested by bugs and defiled by rats and mice. The clear legislative intent of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act of 1938 was to strengthen the worth-while provisions of the old Wiley Act, and certainly not to weaken it in any respect. We discussed this subject many times during the preparation and consideration of the bill which became the new law in 1938. There was never the slightest suggestion by anyone that the new law should or would weaken the authority of the Food and Drug Administration to protect the public. The clear intention was to strengthen that authority.

This bill makes clear the prohibition of any act with respect to foods, drugs, devices, and cosmetics that would result in the article being misbranded while held for sale after shipment in interstate commerce, whether or not that sale is the first sale. It also authorizes seizure and condemnation of foods, drugs, devices, or cosmetics that are adulterated or misbranded while in interstate commerce or while held for sale—whether or not the first sale—after shipment in interstate commerce. I would have felt that this Congress was recreant of its duty to the American people if it had adjourned without enacting this law, which makes so clear that it cannot be misinterpreted what was unquestionably the legislative intent of Congress in enacting the Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act of 1938. The language of this bill is not susceptible of misinterpretation by any court. Its enactment into law will stop a leak in the dike that was erected for the protection of American consumers by the enactment of the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act of 1938, which was an important milestone in the history of American legislation and the most advanced step ever taken for the protection of the consuming masses of the American people.

THE SUCCESSFUL EFFORT FOR A NEW FOOD AND DRUG LAW

The pure food and drug law of 1906, popularly known as the Wiley Act, in honor of the great pioneer in pure-food legislation, the late Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, was an important, progressive action by Congress for the protection of American consumers of foods and drugs. It proved of great benefit for more than 30 years and was enforced by an able and faithful group of men and women whose primary concern was the public welfare. Modern methods of manufacture, advertising, and salesmanship during that 30-year period rendered the old law ineffective in many respects, and it was apparent by the early thirties that the subject ought to be reexplored by the Congress and a new law enacted to safeguard the life and health of the American people, and to protect the market baskets of American housekeepers from innumerable economic cheats. Recognizing the need for a new law, President Franklin D. Roosevelt sent a message to the Congress on that subject. It was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which I was then and am still a member.

After I was appointed by the then chairman of that committee, Hon. SAM RAYBURN, as chairman of a subcommittee to conduct hearings on this subject, I was amazed and shocked by the revelations of abuses of consumer welfare, loss of life, or permanent disability, resulting from use of poisonous drugs and cosmetics, and the callous selfishness of an outer fringe of manufacturers seeking profits in disregard of human welfare. It was gratifying to find that a large percentage of food, drug, and cosmetic manufacturers were willing to cooperate in the enactment of a law adequate for the protection of the American people, which at the same time, protected the legitimate and honest manufacturers from the unscrupulous and reprehensible practices of the outer fringe of disreputable producers.

Some of us soon became deeply interested in this vital need for a new law to protect the 140,000,000 citizens who consume foods and drugs, and the more than half that number who use cosmetics. After more than 3 years of practically ceaseless effort we witnessed the final passage and approval of the new law, the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act of 1938, which contained about 90 percent of the consumer protection for which we had striven. I shall point out some of the abuses that were permissible under the old law that have been practically eliminated by the new law. The comparison of the two laws shows the great advance that has been made by the new law in safeguarding the life, health, and pocketbook of the American public.

COSMETICS

Under the old law there was no provision for the regulation of cosmetics in interstate commerce. The cosmetic industry operated without legal restraint. The use of cosmetics had rapidly increased since the enactment of the Wiley law, and there was manifestly a serious need for a law that would protect the women of America, the principal users of cosmetics, from the unregulated commerce in so-called aids to beauty that were injurious to the health of the users, sometimes to the point of causing death. I accumulated enough bottles, packages, samples, and other exhibits to start a little chamber of horrors in my own office. A striking example was the product known as Lash Lure—the new and improved eyebrow and lash dye—several packages of which were purchased in various stores in the principal shopping section of Washington while this hearing was taking place on Capitol Hill. I have a picture of a very accomplished and personable lady in Ohio, who was to be the guest of honor at a State-wide dinner in the Capital City in recognition of her unselfish service to her home State. This lady did what thousands of other women would have done under similar circumstances. She used cosmetics in preparing for this great event in her life. Lash Lure ruined her complexion, destroyed her beauty, seared her eyeballs, and doomed her to walk in utter darkness to her grave. The new law brought cosmetics under Federal regulation. It outlaws articles which may be injurious to health and prohibits false or misleading labeling, as well as other injurious or deceptive practices. It requires an informative label containing the warning "May cause blindness." It is our earnest hope that such a protective measure may save many other women from the tragic fate of those who have suffered from unregulated cosmetics.

POISONOUS FOOD

The old law contained no authority to stop the distribution of poisonous foods unless the poison had been added. The sale of poisonous mushrooms, which was not uncommon, did not constitute an offense. The new law corrects this deficiency. While the old law prohibited the distribution of foods containing added poisons in amounts which might be harmful to health, it did not ban the unnecessary addition of poisons. No matter how inexcusable the whim of an irresponsible manufacturer, the old law could not stop him from adding poison if the quantity did not reach the point where expert toxicologists could convince a jury that the food might thus be rendered harmful to health. Grave difficulties were met in developing the evidence required to establish a case under this wording of the law. Complications arose from the fact that traces of poison continuously consumed may produce recognizable symptoms only after a period of years; sometimes, in the case of lead, as long as a decade or more. If the particular poison was a new chemical about which little was known, time-consuming laboratory work on test animals was necessary to determine the degree of its toxicity, and then another problem arose in translating effects on test animals into effects on man.

A further difficulty lay in the necessity, under the law's wording, of showing that the quantity of poison in the particular food on trial was so high that the food, by itself, may be harmful to health. The effect of further quantities of that same poison the consumer might unavoidably get from other sources had to be ignored.

Another deficiency of the old law was that, no matter how frequently the identical issues would arise throughout the country, the Government was required to put on the same long parade of expert witnesses in every trial. The uncertainty of uniform verdicts on complex scientific questions is well recognized.

The necessity for more effective protection of the public against added poisons in food has become more and more acute, as the use of poisonous insecticidal sprays and dusts, particularly lead arsenate, has increased year by year in the production of fresh fruits and vegetables, notably apples and pears.

To correct the weaknesses of the old law the new law flatly prohibits the addition of poison to food unless the addition is required in production or cannot be avoided by good manufacturing practice. Where the use of poisons is necessary, as in the protection of growing fruits and vegetables against insects and plant diseases, the new law provided for the establishment of legal tolerances limiting the quantity to the point of safety. The capricious or unnecessary addition of poison to foods, which had occurred all too frequently under the old law, became illegal with the enactment of the new law in 1938.

POISONOUS CONTAINERS

Poisonous containers which may render the contents injurious to health are prohibited by the new law. The old law contained no such protection to the public.

DECEPTIVE PACKAGES

We found large numbers of packages designed to deceive the housewife as to the amount of food which they contained. Boxes contained air space concealed from the purchasers. Packages of nuts, cheese, spices, and many other articles were constructed with false bottoms. The new law eliminates such economic cheats from the market place.

INSANITARY CONDITIONS IN FACTORIES

A very important provision of the new law which was not contained in the old law is the prohibition of traffic in foods, drugs, and cosmetics which have been prepared or handled under insanitary conditions that may contaminate them with filth, or render them injurious to health. Unfortunately methods for detecting filth through examination of samples from interstate shipments were notoriously inadequate. Foods could be put up under the most revoltingly insanitary conditions imaginable and become thoroughly and disgustingly contaminated, and yet the Government was powerless to protect the public from food produced in such factories and packing plants. No action could be taken unless the representatives of the Government actually found the filth and detected the contamination by examination of samples from interstate shipments. Laboratory problems in the detection of filth are exceedingly difficult, and in many cases have proved insurmountable. Because of this defect much unfit food packed under indescribably sickening conditions escaped detection and found its way to American kitchens. There is a class of food manufacturers, happily only a small proportion, constituting an outer fringe of the food business, which seemed to think that because they had been selling filth with impunity for many years they had a vested right to continue to sell it to the public. I remember one miller who wrote that he had been selling flour for years that had been infested by rats and mice and that as he had heard of no one being killed by it, he could see no reason for stopping the practice. We wrote into the new law a provision that is keeping establishments that handle food, drugs, and cosmetics for interstate shipments in at least a reasonably sanitary condition.

PERMITS TO FOOD PRODUCERS

Disease epidemics are sometimes spread through contamination of food with germs in the course of preparation or handling in the factory or packing plant. Methods for detecting the germs by examination of samples from individual interstate shipments are too slow and uncertain to permit the arrest of the goods and their removal from channels of consumption through seizure action. The new law provides that in order to protect the public health in such circumstances the enforcing agency may control the affected food factories through the issuance of permits conditioned upon the adoption of sanitary and other measures which will prevent the spread of disease. If such a provision as this had been in the old law, numerous deaths that occurred several years ago from the consumption of contaminated ripe olives and several epidemics of less severity that have been spread through the distribution of contaminated crabmeat, packed under shockingly insanitary conditions, could have been avoided.

METALLIC TRINKETS

We had before the committee many X-ray pictures showing metallic trinkets lodged in the windpipes of children. I still have them. These trinkets had been imbedded in pieces of confectionery. Naturally, children would eat candy and other confections, oblivious of the danger concealed in them. Frequently only a major operation could prevent a fatal result. Children, fond of both candy and trinkets, and lacking discretion when tempted by either, needed protection which the old law did not afford them. We wrote into the new law a prohibition against traffic in confectionery containing trinkets and other inedible substances.

INFANT AND INVALID DIETS

There was nothing in the old law which required fully informative labeling of infant and invalid food. Mothers who buy special food for their babies have not always been given full information concerning the amounts and kinds of vitamins, minerals, and other nutritive substances. They could not be sure they were providing a diet for proper nutrition and growth. We had before the committee so-called special foods selling for high prices that actually were of little value. I remember one widely advertised product, then on sale in many drug stores at Washington, that was selling for $1.25 and which we found to be worth only 13 cents in food value. The new law requires that food for which special dietary properties are claimed shall be labeled with full information so that the food can be intelligently and effectively used. The result of label disclosure was that some comparatively worthless products went off the market. Some others, whose producers had already made large investments in advertisements, were able to remain in circulation by reason of having sufficient vitamins, minerals, and other nutritive properties added to them to make them reasonably worth-while food products.

DEFINITION OF STANDARDS OF FOOD PRODUCTS

One of the most important provisions of the new law authorizes the establishment of definitions and standards for food products. Under the old law, which contained no such authority, the Government was frequently defeated in its efforts to hold foods to proper standards. An interesting case was one against an oyster company on the charge of adulterating oysters with water. Shucked oysters need to be washed to remove sand, bits of shell, and other foreign substances. Oysters have an affinity for fresh water and absorb it rapidly, thereby increasing in size and weight. In the old days some packers yielded to the temptation to protract the washing process, which resulted in bloated oysters and the sale of water at oyster prices. The court, while condemning the fraudulent practice of selling water as oysters, dismissed the case because the natural water content of oysters varies under different conditions, and there was no legal standard limiting the amount of water they may contain. Cases involving many other foods which had been debased or cheapened also resulted in aquittals. Under the old law ice cream could be and was often inflated with air. The usual air content of ice cream is 31 percent. We found that some ice cream contained 56 percent. Increasing the percentage of air decreased the percentage of butter fat. We found two brands of ice cream in the same city, one of which contained 7 ounces of butterfat to the quart and the other only 1.4 ounces. Legal standards, under the new law, have eliminated that commercial cheat. I am glad to bear witness that practically all manufacturers of ice cream showed a spirit of cooperation and helpfulness in the making of the new law, which leaves inflated ice cream, like bloated oysters, only an unpleasant memory. Without legal standards there was no assurance of integrity in food products. Neither consumers nor honest manufacturers had any protection against the unscrupulous practices of those who would profit by debasing the people's food.

ALLERGY INGREDIENTS

During the course of hearings on the measure we heard much about food allergy, or the sensitiveness of some individuals to food which can be eaten by most people without ill effects. It is estimated that a rather high percentage of our population are made ill, sometimes seriously so, by some food or other. The new law provides that the labels of food bear a statement of ingredients. Thus the law establishes the right of the consumer to know what he is getting as opposed to the right the producer heretofore enjoyed of maintaining secrecy as to his compounds. Allergic people can now more easily determine what foods disagree with them and thus exercise more intelligent selection of their diet. This provision will also promote fair dealing by putting an end to the false pretenses under which compounds of well-known ingredients have been sold under fanciful names and in an aura of mysterious pseudo-scientific jargon.

DISTINCTIVE NAME FRAUD

The old law contained the "distinctive name" fraud, under which any food not injurious to health could escape control if sold under a fanciful name. Under this provision many debased foods were freely sold to the detriment of the consumer's pocketbook and to the unfair disadvantage of competing manufacturers. For example, "Bred Spred—Raspberry Flavor" looked like raspberry jam, was packaged in a typical jam jar, but contained less than half as much fruit as jam should contain. This deficiency was cleverly covered up with a little water, a little pectin, and some added acid to pep up the flavor. Such abuses are impossible under the new law. Similar frauds were perpetrated under the old law upon users of cosmetics, as illustrated in a typical product "Oyloff," a dry shampoo, a 6-ounce bottle of which sold for $1, which contained hydrant water with a little salt and a dash of cheap perfume added. That type of fraud has been eliminated by the enforcement of the new law.

STRUCTURE OF FUNCTIONS OF BODY

The old law did not apply to drugs used in the diagnosis of diseases or to drugs intended to affect the structure or functions of the body. Because of this there was no way of proceeding against such maiming and deadly drugs as dinitrophenol, which was sold as a fat reducer, but was the proximate cause of many deaths and literally scores of cases of blindness. The new law includes these drugs and applies to them the same controls that are afforded for drugs used in the treatment of disease.

DEVICES

The old law contained no provision to protect a gullible public from innumerable allegedly curative devices, such as electric belts, a tin whistle recommended as a "pocket gymnasium," for "health, strength, vitality, beauty." A "Pandiculator," advertised as "the leading health invention of the age," price $75, recommended to increase height; "Thermalaid," an electric gadget, for $25, to cure prostate trouble and improve "mental serenity." These were merely contraptions to separate people from their money. The seller preyed upon the credulity of sick people, but depleting the pocketbook was not the most serious menace of these worthless gadgets that were sold with impunity prior to the enactment of the new law. Some of them were recommended as cures for deadly diseases, even for some forms of cancer. Mistaken reliance on such fake methods of treatment often caused people to neglect consulting a physician until the dread malady progressed to an incurable stage and resulted in death. The new law contains ample authority to bar these fakes from the channels of interstate commerce, but its enactment did not stop attempts by people to invent new gadgets for sale to ill people. The new law has been invoked a number of times in the seizure of a type of machine that was placed on the market at $95, which consisted of an electric-light bulb over which various colored glasses were placed to change the color of the light. According to the labeling, a person could cure himself of any known disease by choosing a particular color of light in which to bathe himself. A green glass over the incandescent bulb would cure one disease; a yellow light another disease; a red light still another. Without the new law the Government would have had no power to protect people from such deceptions, and reliance on such a gadget would have kept sick people from securing proper medical care.

DANGEROUS UNDER PRESCRIPTION OF MANUFACTURER

Another deficiency in the old law was the absence of any prohibition against drugs which are dangerous to health under the conditions of use the manufacturer prescribes in the labeling. Our committee had before it, among many other examples, the radium-water preparation which was sold several years ago under the name "Radithor." Its use resulted in horrible casualties. People who took it according to directions suffered disintegration of their bones and suffered horrible deaths. Such products as Cinchophen when taken in doses prescribed on the label for neuralgia, rheumatism, and neuritis resulted in unconsciousness and acute yellow atrophy of the liver. Many pain-killing tablets, of which women were the principal users, contained such dangerous drugs as amidopyrin and literally destroyed the white corpuscles in the blood. Sometimes its action was so insidious that the ill effect was not recognized until too late to be cured.

Yet, since the labeling told no falsehood the Federal Government was powerless under the old law to protect the public. For instance, in the case of Elixir Sulfanilamide, which, in the fall of 1937, killed approximately 100 people for whom it was prescribed by some physicians, there was no law under which the Government could proceed against the dangerous product upon the ground that it killed people. Fortunately, the alert and capable Federal Food and Drug Administration was able to proceed upon the technicality that it was improperly labeled by being called an elixir, when in fact it was not an elixir. The new law is directed specifically at correcting this deficiency and affords the Government ample authority to proceed against murderous concoctions masquerading as medicines.

NEW DRUG PROVISION

Until the enactment of the new law there was nothing to prohibit untrammeled traffic in new drugs which had not been adequately tested to show that they were safe for use. When the Elixir Sulfanilamide tragedy occurred in 1937, while we were working on the new food, drug, and cosmetics bill in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I introduced in the House, and the late Senator Copeland introduced in the Senate a resolution calling on the Food and Drug Administration to investigate and report to the Congress on the death of the victims of Elixir Sulfanilamide. Based on the information contained in that report I drafted a new section of the pending bill, which for the first time provided for proper and adequate tests before new drugs can be placed in the channels of consumption. That amendment, in substance, became a part of the new law. While it was pending I obtained the opinion of approximately 200 of the most eminent medical men and the principal pharmaceutical manufacturers in America. I also asked for and received expressions of opinion from the unfortunate physicians who had in good faith prescribed the fatal untested Elixir Sulfanilamide. The consensus was that such a provision ought to be written into the law. I took the personal testimony of the eminent Dr. Malcolm Goodrich, of New York, one of the most outstanding leaders in the medical profession, whose testimony in favor of the new drug provision made a profound impression on our committee. The new drug section was written into the new law. Under its operation more than 6,000 applications for the recognition of new drugs have been considered; most of them have been approved. The use of penicillin and the sulfa drugs has become widespread and beneficial to society. Such new drugs as sulphapyradin, tyrothrycin, streptomycin, and many others that have effected cures bordering on the miraculous have been developed and marketed under the new drug provision with assurance against the recurrence of such a deplorable tragedy as the Elixir Sulfanilamide deaths in 1937.

DEFINITIONS OF STRENGTH, QUALITY, AND PURITY

Under the old law official drugs, that is drugs recognized in the United States Pharmacopoeia and the National Formulary, were permitted to differ in strength, quality, and purity from the standards set up by those authorities, provided the actual strength, quality; and purity of the drug was stated on the label. For example, a mother whose doctor had prescribed cod liver oil for her child to cure or prevent rickets might accept from the druggist a bottle labeled "Cod Liver Oil—40 units of vitamin D per dram" without knowing that this was less than one-half of standard strength. Under the new law the cod liver oil has to be labeled so as to show clearly the difference between the strength of the product being sold and the official standard established by the recognized authorities. The old law permitted similar variations in innumerable medicines, but the labeling required by the new law fully protects the public.

HABIT-FORMING DRUGS

The old law contained no provision to require habit-forming drugs to be labeled with appropriate warnings. Many people have innocently acquired a drug habit because of the failure of the label to give any indication of the consequences of protracted use of the drug. The new law requires narcotic habit-forming substances to be plainly labeled "Warning—may be habit-forming." The old law did not require label precautions against overdosage, too frequent dosage, or other public misuse of potent and dangerous drugs, ignoring the human tendency to apply to the taking of drugs the old theory that "if some is good, more is better." That is not unnatural, especially in the case of a person suffering intense pain. However, many so-called pain killers are exceedingly dangerous if taken in too large doses, too frequently, or over too long a period. The new law applies to drugs containing such dangerous ingredients as marihuana, a hemp product, the use of which has proved very disastrous. It requires that the labeling of all drugs, as well as therapeutic devices, must bear adequate warnings against probable misuse which may be dangerous to health.

ANTISEPTIC

It is small comfort to those who use an an antiseptic to find out later that the "antiseptic" which failed to prevent infection merely killed some of the weaker germs. This was entirely possible under the old law. There are many examples of it. The new law requires that antiseptics possess germicidal power; that is, that they kill all of the germs. If they are labeled antiseptic they must be antiseptic.

SECRET REMEDIES

One of the worst weaknesses of the old law of 1906 was its failure to prohibit secret remedies. Many cases of poisoning have resulted from the choice of the wrong bottle from the home medicine cabinet or from bottles carelessly left within reach of small children. The attending physician is able to proceed intelligently and administer the proper antidote or other treatment only where labels show the composition of the drug the patient has administered to himself. Delays in obtaining this information may often mean the difference between life and death. Before enactment of the present law physicians were handicapped in arriving at a correct diagnosis and giving proper treatment when called to treat patients who had made unsuccessful attempts at self-medication with secret remedies. Such remedies frequently caused symptoms that led to erroneous diagnosis. Even if the diagnosis was correct the kind of treatment needed often depended upon what the patient had been taking. The label declaration of the composition of the medicine might reasonably mean the difference between life and death.

The new law corrects this fatal defect in the old law and meets the danger to health and life by prohibiting secret remedies, large numbers of which took their toll of life and money every year before the enactment of the present Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act. As in the case of foods, the law recognizes the right of the consumer of drugs to know what he is buying and taking into his system.

FAKE CLAIMS OF CURATIVE EFFECT

Under the old law the Government was required to prove that false claims of curative effect on the labels of quack medicines were made with a willful intent to deceive, which made it difficult and sometimes impossible to proceed successfully against the worst class of vendors of worthless patent remedies. We had before us Mixer's Cancer and Scrofula Syrup recommended for cancer and scrofulous affections, such as erysipelas, scald head, ringworm, tumors, ulcers, boils, pimples, catarrh, laryngitis, dyspepsia, bronchitis, piles, and all diseases peculiar to the glandular or assimilative system; also a "splendid tonic" with alcoholic content of 7½ percent. The difficulty was in proving that Dr. Mixer made such recommendations with the willful intent to deceive. It was impossible to prove what was in his mind. Another product that required 10 years of enforcement effort and $75,000 to remove from interstate commerce was a horse liniment named B & M. With the advent of the age of motorization and mechanization the trade of the vendor of this horse liniment fell off to the extent that he found it necessary to recommend his liniment as a cure for various diseases, and he continued selling it for many years as a remedy for tuberculosis, pneumonia, influenza, pleurisy, bronchitis, laryngitis, coughs, colds, catarrh, blood poisoning, and other germ diseases. It was simply a counterirritant which was harmless when used externally but a dangerous reliance for a remedy by a person suffering from tuberculosis or pneumonia. Yet the manufacturer testified so plausibly of his implicit faith in this nostrum that the Government found it practically impossible to convince a jury that he actually knew the label claims were false and made such fantastic claims with the willful intent to deceive.

One of the worst offenders that came to my attention during the hearing was "Banbar," a simple brew of horsetail weeds boiled in water, and peddled at $12 per half pint by a shirt salesman as a side line, as a remedy for diabetes. There was no intrinsic harm in "Banbar." Taken in reasonable doses it would not perceptibly injure the patient, but by relying on it as a cure the diabetic would neglect to seek proper medical attention, and without the established and recognized insulin treatment would pass in ignorance to an untimely grave. The Government prosecuted the manufacturer of "Banbar" under the old law for selling this concoction to sufferers from diabetes with willful intent to deceive. A sheaf of testimonials from satisfied patients was exhibited to the jury, and then a sheaf of death certificates specifying diabetes as the cause of death of the signers of the testimonials was viewed by the jury; yet the salesman convinced the jury that he really believed in the efficacy of his product as a substitute for insulin, and the jury returned a verdict of not guilty. The new law prohibits therapeutic claims if they are false, irrespective of whether the Government is able to prove intent to deceive. This is belated but proper recognition of the obvious fact that the meaning of label statements is the same to the consumer regardless of whether those statements are made in good faith or bad faith.

As time goes on defects in the law will be revealed by the test of experience. We never cease to learn by trial and error. Schemes will be designed to circumvent the law. We must be constantly alert to prevent the weakening of this great remedial measure for the protection of all of the people in the United States. The benefits that have already accrued from the enforcement of this law during the 10 years since its enactment are incalculable. With a strong, healthy public opinion behind us, we will defend this law against the assaults of those who would weaken and break it down, and an able, courageous staff of officials will continue to enforce it.

Contested-Election Case of Wilson Against Granger

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. DAWSON

OF UTAH

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. DAWSON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following report of the Committee on House Administration in the election contest in Wilson against Granger, First Congressional District, Utah:

[H. Rept. No. 2418, 80th Cong., 2d sess.]

RELATIVE TO THE CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF WILSON AGAINST GRANGER, FIRST CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF UTAH

The Committee on House Administration, to whom was referred the resolution (H. Res. 692) relative to the contested-election case of Wilson against Granger, First Congressional District of Utah, having considered the same, report favorably thereon without amendment and recommend that the resolution do pass.

All papers and documents in the above-mentioned election case have been fully examined, including the notice of intention to contest, the answer and exhibits attached thereto, the briefs of the parties and the minutes of the hearings, and a full hearing was given to the parties in person and by counsel on April 6 and 7, 1948. Upon consideration of all proceedings, it is respectfully submitted that the afore-mentioned contest be dismissed as lacking in merit.

However, on this record there are undoubtedly numerous and widespread errors and irregularities in many parts of the district, which reveal a lack of knowledge of the law and a failure to enforce properly the registration and election statutes by those charged with that duty.

It is felt by the committee that a continuation of such practices is a serious threat to the safeguards of the election process and the conduct of legal elections, but the committee find that the true results of the election are not affected in this case.

The extensions of time heretofore granted in this contest by the Committee on House Administration are hereby authorized and approved.

MINORITY REPORT

In the case of David J. Wilson, contestant, versus WALTER K. GRANGER, contestee, for a seat in the Eightieth Congress from the First District of Utah, all of the evidence, when it is summed up, appears that since the New Deal came to power the Democratic organization which controlled the election machinery in all of the populous counties in the district was so determined to keep control politically and remain in power, that its members seemed to feel they had a vested interest in political control, and that the State law of Utah could be set aside, and was set aside at will by the party in control of the election machinery.

In the particular case in question, those in control of the election machinery gave a majority to Congressman GRANGER of 104 votes out of a total of 89,672

The printed record in this case shows overwhelmingly that the laws of Utah regulating registrations, balloting and counting of ballots, as well as in the canvassing of returns, were ignored and violated numerous times in Utah's First Congressional District in the election of 1946. In some instances acts constituting a felony, under the law, were committed.

While the law specifically prohibits, under heavy penalty, hauling any voters to points of registration, or to the polls on election day, and specifies certain days and hours for the registration of the voters, with one registrant to the precinct stationed at a definite location or office, the evidence shows, and is not disputed, that 16 extra registration agents were appointed in addition, who went out and canvassed from house to house the town of Washington Terrace, and from this registration alone brought in and caused to be put on the registration books in violation of the law nearly 700 voters, of whom over 400 voted.

This arrangement was made under the direction of the Democratic politicians with their full knowledge and cooperation, and is admitted in the sworn testimony of the printed record.

At another place, district 11 in Ogden in the same county, the red capped CIO organization hired three colored women as extra registrants in that precinct, notwithstanding, under the law, a qualified regularly appointed registrant had previously been appointed by the board of county commissioners to act as the registration agent. While the law specifically says that registration agents shall be paid out of the county fund, these three extra women registered nearly 100 voters, and were paid for their services by the CIO organization, and were not paid out of the county fund. They were supervised, as well, by the CIO in their work.

Congressman GRANGER carried Washington Terrace by a majority of 543 votes, and carried district 11 by 93 votes. Both of these districts should have been thrown out in considering this contest because the registration law was flagrantly violated, and had they been thrown out the returns would show that the contestant, David J Wilson, was entitled to the seat in Congress.

Then again in district 15, the record shows there was little or no privacy in connection with the casting or the counting of the ballots. Unsworn and unauthorized persons handled the ballots. Many of the people voted openly on tables rather than secretly in booths. More than one person went into the election booths together. Where the tally books didn't agree, the judges arbitrarily forced the balance.

While the registration law specifically says those registering must present themselves to a specified place for registration between the hours of 8 a. m. and 9 p. m. on certain days, the sworn testimony shows that women were employed by the Democratic organization in Ogden to follow the paymaster through the railroad yards, and to other places, as early as 6 o'clock in the morning soliciting and registering people before 8 as the paymaster paid them off in groups. While the registration law prevents, under penalty, the hauling of people to the polls, in fact, the Democratic organization circumvented the law by hauling the registration booths, so to speak, to the people, not only violating that provision of the statute, but violating the statute which says that people must come to certain designated places to register.

In Carbon County the general record is as bad with reference to failure to comply with the registration laws of the State of Utah as in these former instances I have discussed.

The Democratic county clerk, who is the general supervisor over elections, never did furnish registration lists or registration books containing anything except names of purported electors, and never did instruct the registration agents to fill in the information required by the law of the State.

The law says:

"Registration agents must enter upon the official register, under the proper heading, the date of registration; the names alphabetically; the age and activity of the elector, together with the location of his residence as directed in section 25–2–5, and when the person so registered is of foreign birth, the fact of exhibition of or failure to exhibit his certified copy of naturalization must be noted in the column provided for that purpose; which list, when made as in this section required, is known as the official registration of electors of their respective districts."

In other words, a list known as the official register did not carry out these provisions of the law. In all instances throughout the county, only lists of names with no identifying information were furnished. The sworn testimony and records show that quite a number of Mexicans who could not speak the English language were hauled to registration precincts in Dragerton Township in Carbon County, and that they were sworn in and registered by a person not duly qualified to take an oath, and by one who could not understand the language spoken. We are led to believe that many of these persons were migrant workers, and few, if any, were then or ever have been legal residents of Carbon County.

The entire county of Carbon, which was carried by Congressman GRANGER by a majority of 2,242 votes, should have been thrown out. Had Carbon County and Washington Terrace been excluded from the count because of these illegal actions under the direction of the Democratic officeholders in control of the election machinery, Mr. Wilson would have been elected by a majority of approximately 2,500 votes.

It is our contention that the interest of the people of that entire congressional district would have been best served if the entire vote in Washington Terrace, district 15, and Carbon County had been excluded from the count in this election.

The good law-abiding citizens want the election laws of the State obeyed. They realize that the very freedom we have in this Nation depends on the sanctity of the ballot and on honest elections. They would rather have an entire county thrown out, or districts where gross violations of the law occurred, than to see these votes counted.

They realize that sometimes a shock must occur in order to awaken the people generally to the necessity of the strict enforcement of election laws in the interest of all.

We hope the facts we have pointed out in this report may serve as a warning to election officials who have charge of the election machinery, and that in the future strict compliance with the election laws may follow.

The President's Criticism of the Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, with respect to the President's recent outbursts against Congress, the immediate impression on the part of many colleagues has been that there is not too much change to accomplish substantially anything more before the country elects a new President. However, as we are governed by our constitutional framework we must naturally continue to try to work with Mr. Truman, in spite of his attitude toward the Congress. Today I received a letter from a friend of mine, Carl Nepruo, of Coon Valley, Wis., who, in my opinion, makes some very appropriate comments on the recent spectacle of the President attempting to belittle the Congress. Nepruo draws a parallel between what President Truman has tried now and what President Franklin Roosevelt attempted on occasions—particularly the time he tried to prevail upon the Congress to accept his position with respect to one of the main provisions of the 1942 farm bill. On that occasion, a Democratic Congress led by the floor leader, Senator ALBEN BARKLEY, revolted against the President and asserted the prerogatives of Congress. As the people stood by Congress then, I am sure they will applaud Congress now in the manner it maintains its position, and, I might add, its dignity. Nepruo's letter is quoted in full below:

KARLANNA FARM,
Coon Valley, Wis., June 18, 1948.

Hon. FRED CRAWFORD,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRED: The spectacle of President Truman's attempt to ride herd on Congress and to belittle the efforts of our legislative branch reminds one of somewhat similar performances on the part of his predecessor—particularly Franklin Roosevelt's brazen attempt in 1942 to force Members of Congress to accept his wishes with respect to a percentage figure in a farm bill. Fortunately, the Democratic leaders in Congress felt that the President was going out of bounds in his attempt to dictate to Congress and Senator BARKLEY, the Democratic floor leader, led a revolt which put through the farm bill containing however a percentage figure which had been worked out by the Congress and which was quite different from the figure worked out by the President's advisers.

It may be recalled that at the time I wrote some observations which I labeled "The Issue Before the Congress and the People." As some of the remarks contained in the memorandum seem equally pertinent now, I quote a few excerpts below:

"It seems to me that if Congress abjectly meets the President's wishes against its own better judgment—based on congressional hearings—then it resigns its legislative functions and becomes a rubber stamp. Even if after a most careful study, the President should still feel that his figure is more nearly correct than the one named by Congress, it does not seem to me that the difference involved warrants a move which would compel our Congress to lose its self-respect and the respect of the Nation.

"I can think of no question of any greater importance to this Nation than that of preserving the prerogatives of Congress. This is no time for the Members of our great Congress to supinely yield to 'or else' dictums, nor, might I add, would it seem to be the time for anyone to confront them with such dictums. It would seem that if a rereading of their oath of office is not sufficient for the Members of Congress to realize their obligations to preserve the Constitution and the framework of our Government, then the instinct of self-preservation and self-respect should cause them to assert and protect their position. If Members of Congress do so with all the vigor they possess I believe that the American people, whose chosen representatives they are, will applaud them."

We recall how the American people applauded Senator BARKLEY for leading the fight against Roosevelt's attempt at dictation.

That the Members of the present Congress are equally concerned about maintaining their prerogatives is clearly shown by the many occasions which Democratic Members in both Houses have joined with Republican Members in overriding President Truman's vetoes.

One can be quite sure that the American people are following events closely and fully appreciate the concerted action taken by congressional leaders in both parties. I feel strongly that the people of the country will always support Congress in its constitutional authority because in the end it is the people and the country as a whole who stand to lose in case a President should succeed in lowering the prestige of Congress.

Yours sincerely,

CARL NEPRUD.

More Than a Decade

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OVERTON BROOKS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I am about to conclude 12 years in the House of Representatives. It has been 12 years of active, interesting, and what I believe to be very productive service, representing the people of the Fourth Congressional District. It is therefore entirely proper before the adjournment of this Congress that I should say something regarding what has transpired during the time when it has been my privilege to represent a great people of a great State.

FLOOD CONTROL

It has been during the course of this period that a great development in flood control and navigation on Red River has begun. The late Senator John Overton, now gone to his reward, laid the pattern for a marked development along the Red River Valley and Mississippi River Valley. This development has proceeded year by year, beginning with an appropriation of just a few hundred thousand dollars for Red River until now the annual appropriations for the Red River Valley alone will run between six and ten million dollars.

I introduced the original resolution calling for a study by the Army engineers on an interim flood-control plan. This resolution passed and, after a protracted study, the engineers reported the familiar $77,500,000 interim flood-control program which has already been started and is fast moving to consummation. This program provides for levees up and down both sides of Red River from Fulton, Ark., to the mouth of the river. It provides for a series of dams and reservoirs on both sides of the river built for the purpose of holding back the uncontrolled flood waters of the river when it is on a rampage and allowing an orderly release of these waters to the use of civilization. While I have been in Congress and with the great leadership of the late Senator Overton, I have been able to bring this entire program to the point where it should gradually be automatically completed during the years ahead, if given proper guidance.

I have been working with Senator Overton on plans for the Overton Red River lateral canal. The authorization for this canal has already passed Congress and I hope within a reasonable period ahead actual work will be begun. As a matter of fact, already $150,000 has been spent in planning for the canal and another $150,000 will complete the planning.

When the Overton waterway is completed, it will provide direct water transportation from Shreveport, La., connecting with the great Mississippi River and its tributaries and with all parts of the midcontinent inland waterways of America. Such a development will help the entire State of Louisiana. It will connect New Orleans, Lake Charles, Baton Rouge, Monroe, and Shreveport by water and will give another great area in Louisiana water transportation.

I have helped on flood control and rivers and harbors legislation in all parts of Louisiana and the Nation. I realize that water transportation and flood control is just as important to other people as it is to ourselves and, with this in mind, I have tried to extend my efforts to all parts of Louisiana and the Nation.

HOLC FORECLOSURES

One of the first measures which attracted my attention as a newly elected Congressman 12 years ago was the method which the Home Owners' Loan Corporation was using in Louisiana to seize possession and foreclose mortgages on the sale of hundreds of homes owned by some of our most honest and industrious citizens. I stepped into the breach during the first month that I was in Congress, and by aggressive opposition to unfair and indiscriminate foreclosures of HOLC I stopped them. In doing this, it is my belief that I saved hundreds, if not thousands, of homes for our people, who, in the course of time, paid out the loans due the Government on the property, and own them at the present time. Such action makes for useful and loyal citizens.

VETERANS' LEGISLATION

During the course of my work in Congress I have voted for every piece of veterans' legislation presented to the Congress for a vote. I have in no case opposed any legislation which has been endorsed by the three large patriotic organizations. Long before the coming of the Second World War, I supported legislation increasing the benefits for Spanish-American War veterans and liberalizing the compensation for veterans of World War I.

It was during the course of the war that I advanced the idea of terminal leave to all enlisted men and pay for this time. At first my plan was rejected, but I am very pleased with the fact that in the course of time terminal-leave pay was provided as I always advocated for enlisted men as well as officers. My bill was one of the three bills used to write up the original terminal-leave-pay measure which was finally passed by Congress. I was a member of a small subcommittee which perfected the terminal-leave-pay bill, and I actually had control of the bill in the House of Representatives as it went through Congress. This measure, which I sponsored, has resulted in the Government paying $3,000,000,000 in money to enlisted personnel of the Second World War for something which I have always believed they were entitled to.

I helped write the GI bill of rights and I consulted with high officials of some of the patriotic organizations in the original inception of this measure. I supported it at every turn in Congress and since its passage I have voted to liberalize many of its provisions.

I realize that the amount of money paid to veterans going to school under GI training has been insufficient. I supported increases in this pay.

I realize that our housing legislation has not been adequate and I have supported GI housing continuously in both Congresses since the close of the Second World War. In fact, I made a very active fight on the floor of the House of Representatives for the continuation of the policy of refinancing GI loans with the RFC and in expanding FHA so as to take care of huge volumes of housing loans. While the need for housing is extremely great at the present time, it has been a problem which has had my attention during the course of lengthy debate on the floor of the House and in committee meetings.

It has only been a short while ago that I actively supported legislation which has now become law to increase compensation paid to widows and orphans of veterans. Only this week I supported a measure to increase the benefits paid to all service-connected disabled veterans with dependents and which veterans are 60 percent or more disabled.

The plight of the wounded and disabled veteran has always claimed my sympathy and attention. I felt like the needs of this group of veterans should come first in the mind of Congress and in the desires of the Nation. I therefore fought for and voted for a bill to give an automobile to every amputee and recently I have supported similar legislation to give a car to the blinded war veteran who needs some means of transportation because of the lack of sight. It is cases such as this which appeal strongly to the hearts of the Nation, demanding that the purse strings be loosened to the needs of this group of our veterans.

In connection with my assistance to veterans, I cannot overlook the program of hospitalization and rehabilitation undertaken by the United States in Louisiana. Even before the war I became actively interested in such a program for our State. I realized that a million wounded veterans and approximately 10,000,000 living veterans of all wars meant a large additional need for veterans' hospitals. I accordingly went to work on this program. Since I represented the Fourth Congressional District, it was my obligation to work for the people of the northern part of the State; and after several years' intensive work I managed to obtain approval of a $10,500,000 veterans' hospital to be located in Shreveport, La. This hospital is now being built and will be as fine and as modern a 450-bed hospital as there is anywhere in the world.

Due to my efforts, I obtained the location of a Veterans' Administration Regional Office in north Louisiana; and it is now temporarily domiciled at Dodd College in the heart of the residential district of Shreveport, La. I have gone to work on obtaining permanent housing and I am glad to be able tc state that the Veterans' Administration has sent a committee to north Louisiana to advise as to the need for permanent quarters in a business section for this Regional Office of the Veterans' Administration. Before long, I hope to be able to give the news to the people of Louisiana that a million and a half dollar Veterans' Administration building is in the process of being constructed.

AGRICULTURE

As Louisiana is primarily an agricultural State I have felt that I should always be alert to the needs of our agricultural products such as sugar, rice, cotton, corn, lumber, and so forth. I have therefore always supported the agricultural appropriation bills. The production and marketing program, soil conservation program, and land utilization program of the United States have been programs of genuine interest to me.

The tragic conditions of our washed and eroded hillsides, especially in central and north Louisiana, have fairly shouted their need for conservation and conservation payments. It has been with much satisfaction that I watched the soil conservation program grow from a small beginning until it reached out and extended through every section of the State beginning with the original drainage program which is extremely important to Louisiana. I know of nothing which means more to our farmers than the continuation of these most beneficial programs.

One of the first measures supported by me when I came to Congress was the program to effect the cancellation of the old oat loans. About $1,000,000 had been loaned in small amounts, varying from $5 to $50. These amounts had been loaned to our farmers on chattel mortgages covering household furniture and farm equipment. Crop failures and poor advice on the part of the Government resulted in disaster to thousands of our small and hard-working farm population. I worked out a cancellation of these loans with the Agriculture Department and saved the little farmers of the State a million dollars.

As a part of the agricultural program, I helped inaugurate the original hot-lunch program. In its beginning the idea was to take farm surpluses and distribute these to the underprivileged. This finally worked into the hot lunch school program which has become a permanent fixture in our legislative establishment. Under this beneficial program the United States contributes millions of dollars yearly for the purchase of food to be distributed to our underprivileged young boys and girls in America. This is a fine program and should meet with enthusiastic response from all of our people.

Likewise on part of the agricultural program, I have supported appropriations for the construction of roads, both farm and arterial highways. Each year we are managing to increase the size of the highway and road appropriations bill, distributing the billions of dollars appropriated by the United States to the several States on a basis of matching funds to the extent of 50 percent at State level. In this way Louisiana has had a great amount of Federal help in building her highway system, which is so badly needed by our people. I do not mean this work is complete but much help has been given in this respect. Much remains to be done and I shall continue to devote my efforts to the perfecting of model highways and roads leading to every farm, village, and city in Louisiana.

REA

REA was an infant when I first came to Congress. Now it has attained the size of a program calling for the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars yearly. I have seen our farm land gradually taken out of darkness and given electricity. The farmers and their families by use of rural electricity have made REA power do the chores of other years. I have pledged myself to continue this work until the time when every farmer in America has electricity.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

My committee assignment when I came to Congress placed me on the Military Affairs Committee, which later became the Armed Services Committee. I served on this committee during the trying days which led up to the Second World War. I was an active member of the committee during all of the tragic days of this struggle; and I actually worked on and helped write all of the major military legislation which was indispensable to build up our armies and our Air Force and to bring to us victory.

I am very proud of the fact that many of these bills bore my name. I helped write three Army pay bills raising the pay of the private enlisted man from $30 to $75 per month. The last one of these bills bears my name and many parts of it were actually written in longhand by me. During the course of the war, I visited the fighting fronts in several countries in Europe. I was under fire when I talked to enlisted men to find out what they were thinking and where our legislation might need perfecting. On one of these trips the chairman of our committee took pneumonia and subsequently passed away.

Following the end of the war, I have worked studiously on a program of building up our national defenses. We must keep America strong and vigorous if we are to keep America at peace. With this in mind, I have advocated an adequate Army and an Air Force second to none. During the current session of Congress I have helped draft the legislation making our Air Force a 70-group Air Force which, when it reaches this point, will be as strong as all of the other air fleets of the world combined.

Immediately before the war, I visited the War Department with the late Senator Overton and discussed military development in our native State. During the course of the maneuvers, I repeatedly visited with our troops in the field and studied the problems of the Army in the field under batle conditions. I also visited all of our military camps and installations, including the great Army port of embarkation located in the city of New Orleans, and the camps in central Louisiana.

Now that Congress is about to enact a draft bill as a temporary expedient, I am anxious to join in an effort to locate Army camps and an additional Army post in Louisiana. We are entitled to this consideration by the Army, the Air Force and the Navy; and I shall not be satisfied until we are given additional consideration by our national defense forces.

I might add that since Barksdale Field has been in my congressional district, I have worked untiringly for this post. When I came to Congress, I was told the expenditures on Barksdale Field for permanent construction were $7,500,000. Since I have been in office, I have worked to expand this field and now I am proud to proclaim the fact that Barksdale Field represents an investment of millions of additional dollars. During the course of the war alone, I helped obtain expenditures of $30,000,000 of additional Federal money for construction on this post.

The Louisiana ordnance plant and the reconsignment depot are likewise results of my efforts; and my interest has been in military plants and arsenals all over the State.

CIVIL SERVICE AND RETIREMENT

I have supported Federal civil service. I have supported this continually by my vote and by my voice. As a result of this, during the time I have served in Congress, civil service benefits have been extended and the civil service retirement system has been expanded and strengthened and has now become an integrated part of the civil service system of the Nation. Hundreds of thousands of Government employees look forward to the time when they can enjoy the fruits of their public labor by a healthy retirement system.

In this connection I wish to say I have supported the extension and expansion of the railroad retirement legislation. I voted for several bills extending and increasing these benefits. During the current week, I supported a new bill increasing retirement benefits by 20 percent to thousands of railroad employees who have done their bit in the transportation problem of the Nation and are now entitled to an old age of comfort and leisure. This increase of 20 percent in retirement pay will not meet the needs of those who are entirely dependent upon it. This increase will, however, help to alleviate some of the hardship and suffering brought about by high prices and inflation.

STORM RELIEF

I would not be true to my record in Congress if I did not mention the strenuous efforts which I made to extend relief to those in storm areas in my congressional district. During the course of my tenure in office, two great cyclones have swept north Louisiana, doing tremendous damage to life and property where they hit. In Rodessa a number of years ago a storm destroyed a large portion of the town. Only last year, in Webster and Claiborne Parishes, a most destructive tornado swept through the towns of Cotton Valley and Haynesville, killing and maiming people and destroying property. In both instances I acted swiftly to extend every facility of the United States Government to administer relief to the suffering and financial aid to those rendered homeless and shelterless as a result of the storm. In both cases the Government expended a huge amount of money, giving blankets, cook stoves, tents, simple home equipment, and even food in some cases to take care of the storm sufferers.

Although I have worked upon larger projects, I do not know of anything which gives me as much enthusiasm as the thought of our great and powerful Government stooping down to administer comfort and succor in cases of tornado distress to those who have felt the full fury of the elements.

CONCLUSION

Mr. Speaker, I could go on at length. Twelve years is a long time and it is difficult to condense the activity of that period in one single speech. I want to say in conclusion that I have tried to be active for my people during this period of time. I have tried to answer their letters and communications and to administer to their small needs as well as to their large ones. I think I have accomplished much. I have been fortunate in representing a most cooperative citizenry which has been most understanding in its problems. This desire to cooperate on the part of my people has made my work pleasanter and much easier.

This report, of course, emphasizes the Fourth Congressional District in Louisiana. This is the area which I have been privileged to represent in Congress. I have therefore not dealt generally with those things that affected the rest of the State of Louisiana or the Nation as it is my present desire to merely render an account of my 12 years of service in Congress.

Mr. Speaker, these have been 12 very pleasant and happy years. I am most grateful to the people of my congressional district who have permitted me this opportunity of representing them for more than a decade in the Halls of this Congress and during the most critical period which this Nation and the world has ever passed through. It has been a singular honor to have this position; and with this feeling of obligation on my part, I have worked diligently, aggressively, and conscientiously to represent a people who, I think, are entitled to the best there is in the way of government and the highest type of democracy.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and Members of the House with whom I have served during this period. I leave here with most happy recollections of friendship for those Members of this body and will treasure them in the future as a part of this service.

Mr. Speaker, I bid you adieu.

John Thomas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN SANBORN

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. SANBORN. Mr. Speaker, at the time of the passing from this life of the late Senator John Thomas I was in the State of Idaho and with all Idaho citizens was shocked to learn of his death.

John Thomas and I lived in the same county of Gooding and we knew each other well. He served as State chairman of the Republican Party for several years, part of it being while I was serving in the Idaho Legislature. His successful and varied activities, ranging from farming and stock raising to banking, gave him a broad background of practical knowledge that was a great asset to him in his senatorial duties. He made a splendid record in the Senate.

Senator Thomas was a keen and able businessman and a remarkably good organizer. He demonstrated and availed himself of one of the greatest heritages of the American way of life—the opportunity for self-achievement.

His passing was regretted by all. He was a fine, honorable public servant.

Representative Justice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE MacKINNON

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. MACKINNON. Mr. Speaker, we approach the close of the Eightieth Congress. During its deliberations those of us who are serving our first term have gained valuable experience in dealing with the numerous critical problems which face our Nation in this volatile postwar period. We have been confronted with many difficult and pressing issues touching every field of human endeavor and intimately affecting the daily life of all our citizens. We have attempted to deal courageously with these problems, having in mind the best interests of all our citizens.

CONSIDER LONG RANGE EFFECTS

Frequently, Members are asked what principles guide them in arriving at their decisions. The inquiry most often heard is whether majority opinion is followed. Others ask whether long range or immediate considerations are most persuasive. Of course, it is not within my power to answer for others, but in the course of my service here as a representative of the rights of others I have felt that it would be a breach of the power confided in me if I were to ignore ultimate results and be guided by transitory considerations however bright and gaudy they may be painted.

CONSTITUTION PROTECTS ALL CITIZENS

As for representing the majority, it is true we are elected by a majority. But we are elected to serve under and uphold our Constitution which is based on the principle that all citizens have certain fundamental rights which are entitled to protection regardless of whether they find themselves in the majority or the minority after any particular election. With that principle I am in full agreement. It represents the basic difference between the American form of government and the totalitarian form. Each one of our citizens is entitled to have his legitimate and fundamental interests considered and protected by his representatives. Some say this is impossible. In my own district on three occasions I have campaigned against one individual who boasted that he would only represent a particular class if he were elected. His usual statement is, "I don't claim to represent all the people." How alien that view is to our form of government. It is extremely short-sighted and shows a lack of fundamental knowledge of our form of government and of the basic principles of morality upon which our country is founded. This line of thought holds that it is impossible for one to represent all his constituents. Persons who so state argue that there are fundamental conflicts between some segments of our people that will forever be irreconcilable and hence a representative must choose which segment to represent. I deny the truth of that premise.

EQUAL JUSTICE BEST RULE

During my service in our State legislature I observed, and that observation has been strengthened during my service here in Congress, that even on what may appear to be the most difficult problems involving the sharpest conflict, there is always a fair midground to be found between seemingly irreconcilable and conflicting interests where it is possible to draw a line of equal justice, which, once found and established, best represents the interests of all concerned.

CONSTANT EFFORT REQUIRED

In many situations this line of equal justice is very difficult to find, and once found, additional hardships may frequently arise to hamper its enactment into law or its application to the problem. But once it is established and applied the best interests of all concerned are most truly represented—and in my view, best represented. Constant striving is necessary to arrive at such beneficial results which guarantee even-handed justice for all, but so worthy an end justifies all the hardship and endeavor necessary to bring it about. However, he who at the outset denies that such equitable results are attainable, will most certainly be no material aid in bringing about fair decisions. By refusing to admit such fair results are possible one thereby forecloses his ability to contribute to anything except an unfair decision. Such views thus operate as an additional handicap to securing and establishing that equal justice under law which is the very keystone of the United States.

The Need for a National Old-Age Pension

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHET HOLIFIELD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, one of the most important problems facing the Congress and the old people of America is the desperate need for security for our senior citizens.

The fear of desperate poverty, lack of food, medicine, clothing, and shelter during the last few years of existence, is in the hearts of millions of middle-aged people today.

They face an insecure future, they have been unable, because of misfortune, sickness, unemployment, and because of the expense of raising their children, to accumulate savings for their old age.

MILLIONS OF AGED PEOPLE ARE NEEDLESSLY LIVING IN POVERTY

To those who have reached the age of 60 or more, the fear of the future has become the horrible reality of the present. They are living daily in such poverty-stricken circumstances, as to bring the blush of shame to those more fortunate. I know of hundreds of cases in my own congressional district. The cases of aged people, sick in many instances for want of medicine they cannot afford, or nutritious food which they need but cannot buy with their limited means. These people have come to me with their troubles and I long ago pledged to them that I would do all in my power to extend and improve social-security benefits.

I promised them that I would work for a national old-age pension which would be paid to them as a matter of right and justice from a grateful Nation. I firmly believe that our Nation has the natural wealth, the machinery of production, the brains and ingenuity, and, most important, the manpower to produce enough and more to pay every aged or incapacitated person in America an adequate pension. By an adequate pension, I mean a decent average standard of living for every recipient.

EFFORTS TO OBTAIN CONGRESSIONAL CONSIDERATION

In performance of my pledge, I have made innumerable speeches in the House of Representatives advocating these principles. I have tried to persuade my colleagues to join with me in passing a law which would accomplish this noble purpose.

Failing in my efforts, along with a small group of like-minded Representatives, to obtain the reporting of such a bill from the proper congressional committee, we turned to the petition-for-discharge method.

When a committee of the Congress refuses to report a bill for a vote of the membership, any Member may file a petition at the Clerk's desk which, when signed by a majority of the Members—218—will automatically force such a bill to the House floor for a vote. In my 6 years in Congress I have known of only two occasions where the discharge-petition method has been successful. One occasion was to pay the enlisted men their accumulated leave in cash and the other occasion was the revoking of the tax on oleomargarine. It is very difficult to get the Members of Congress to sign a discharge petition, because it is a reflection on the leadership of the party in power as well as all the members of the particular committee involved.

Notwithstanding this difficulty and the reflection mentioned, I have signed the two discharge petitions which have called for a national old-age pension vote. One petition was known as the General Welfare Act and the other important petition was H. R. 16—the Townsend plan.

I tried to obtain additional signatures and did obtain some, but I regret to say that the little group of Representatives who believe sincerely in the need for a national old-age pension have not as yet been able to obtain the necessary 218 signatures. Several times we have come near our goal, but each time we lacked a few signatures and another term of Congress ended without success.

We shall keep on trying, but we need the help of other Congressmen who believe as we do. Unless these pension-minded men are elected I fear that we will continue to fight a losing battle. I plead with my friends to write to their relatives and friends in other congressional districts for political action in behalf of congressional candidates pledged to vote for a national old-age pension.

WE CAN AFFORD TO TAKE CARE OF OUR AGED PEOPLE

Society owes a solemn duty to the senior citizens of America. It is a moral and spiritual obligation which we cannot escape. We are the richest nation in the world and we can afford to take care of our own aged people. We are sending billions of dollars to nations overseas for rehabilitation and reconstruction. Surely we can spare a few dollars for our needy here at home. The wealth of dollars and goods which we have squandered in war and in assistance abroad is much greater than the comparatively small sum necessary to bring happiness and security to our older citizens.

OUR NATION WAS DEVELOPED BY OUR PREDECESSORS

We must always remember that we owe the development of our Nation to our parents and our forefathers. Without their pioneering and without their sacrifices it would be impossible for us to enjoy the blessings we now have. We owe to those who made this great, rich, productive America a debt of love and gratitude which will not be fully paid until we destroy the fear and suffering of a poverty ridden old age forever from their minds.

As long as I remain in Congress I pledge to the senior citizens of my district and my Nation that I shall not falter in my fight to obtain for them an adequate nationally paid old-age pension which will bring them comfort and a decent living standard in their later years.

Is It Wicked for Farmers To Make Money?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, there are some people in this country who apparently think that it is a crime for a farmer to make money. They are strong for prosperity, but they hate to see the farmer have any part of it. A typical expression of this attitude is contained in an article appearing recently in the Washington Daily News by Peter Edson, well-known Washington columnist, entitled "The Farm Vote—Sacred Cow." This article is so biased against farmers and contains statements so far from the truth that it ought to be challenged.

Mr. Edson begins his article by calling attention to the fact that the proportion of our population engaged in farming is rapidly declining, and goes on to state that while in the past Congress might have been justified in giving some consideration to agricultural problems, that because of the decline in the number of farmers no particular attention need be paid to them now and that there is no political harm, at least, in kicking farmers around. Mr. Edson says:

By today's estimates, United States population over 21 years of age is divided, roughly, 50,000,000 in cities, 16,000,000 in small towns classified as rural nonfarm, and only 14,000,000 rural. This accounts for a possible 80,000,000 voters.

This farm vote is still important to Congressmen who come from strictly rural districts. But based on the interests of the people—percentagewise and on a national average—city population should control 62.5 percent of the votes in Congress, the rural nonfarm population should control 20 percent, the farm population only 17.5 percent.

Mr. Edson then goes on to say:

But there is no denying that today more weight is given to maintaining farm prosperity than to maintaining prosperity for the industrial worker. And there is no point in keeping the city worker broke just to maintain the country cousin in clover. The two problems should no longer be considered separately.

If the country wants industrial peace, the place to begin is on the farm front. Outlawing the Communist Party and tightening up on the labor laws won't stop today's strikes.

Some place, sometime, somehow—somebody is going to have to get at the roots of labor trouble. Right now those roots reach back to the farm and too-high food prices.

In other words, according to Mr. Edson, it is not John L. Lewis or Philip Murray, or the Communist leaders in labor who are causing our trouble today. It is the wicked farmers who have forced prices up so high that city people can no longer exist and have to strike for more money. Well, that is very interesting, if true. Mr. Edson does not cite any facts to back up his statement, and cannot do so. But I am afraid there are some as prejudiced as he who will accept his conclusions without proof.

FARM INCOMES LESS THAN ONE-HALF NONFARM INCOMES

But before blindly condemning the farmer as the villain in the piece, let us take a look at the facts. What about the incomes of farmers as compared with the incomes of nonfarmers? What about the increase in food prices as compared with the increase in wages and consumer incomes? Facts on these matters are readily available to Mr. Edson or anyone else who desires to obtain them. Let us see what they are.

Well, according to Government statistics, for 1947 the per capita income from farming for persons on the farm was $725. That is a good deal more than it was before the war and it sounds fairly good in comparison. But how does it compare with the per capita income of the nonfarm population? What was that in 1947? It was $1,480, or slightly more than double that of the average farm income.

PEOPLE ARE LEAVING FARMS BECAUSE OF HIGHER INCOMES IN CITIES

That ought to settle the question, had not it? But here is something else to back it up. We all know that if one part of our economy is more prosperous than any other, there is a drift of people into that particular activity. If farmers are so prosperous today at the expense of their city cousins, you would expect that there would be a rush of people to the farms in order to get in on some of this easy money. But here again, the hard cold facts tell just the opposite story. This year there are 2,500,000 fewer people on the farms than we had in 1941. But during the same time, our nonfarm population increased by 12,500,000 people, and that notwithstanding the fact that the birth rate on the farms is much higher than it is in the cities. The people who left the farms to work in industry, as well as many of the boys who went in the Army, have not come back to the farm because they are making more money as downtrodden workers in the city than they can make on the farm.

INCOMES AND WAGES HAVE ADVANCED FASTER THAN FOOD PRICES

Now, let us look a little further into Mr. Edson's contention that food prices are keeping city workers broke. What are the facts there? Well, the latest Government figures show that for March 1948, food costs were 102 percent above the average for the years 1935–39. That is quite a little jump, is not it? But what was happening to people's incomes during the same time? Just this: The average nonfarm income in this country from 1935–39 was $625. In 1947 it was $1,480, or an increase of 136 percent, as compared with 102 percent increase in food costs. During the same period factory weekly earnings increased 119 percent, so that the workingman in the city was still ahead of the game, compared with prewar, as far as food costs are concerned.

But here are some more figures, and I think they furnish the best test as to whether Mr. Edson is right in his contention that we are "keeping the city worker broke just to maintain the country cousin in clover." These figures show the percentage of total income in this country which is currently being spent for food, as compared with prewar. For that period 22 percent of our total income went for food. For the year 1947, 26 percent of our total income was spent that way. That looks as if the consumer might be getting pinched somewhat. But here the figures are deceiving because in 1947 the average consumer in this country was consuming 16 percent more food than he consumed in the prewar period; and what is more, this increase was mostly in the foods that the nutritionists say should be consumed in larger quantities for the maintenance of health. That is, people were eating more dairy products, more meats, more poultry, and more fruits and vegetables. So that, for this 4 percent in increased expenditures in food, the consumers of this country were getting 16 percent more food and better food than they had before the war. If people were consuming today on an average the same amount and kind of food that they consumed prewar, they would be spending only 18 percent of their income for food, which is less than they have ever spent for food as far back as we have any figures on the subject. These figures show up Mr. Edson's statements for just what they are—100 percent bunk.

PRICES OF PRACTICALLY ALL FOOD CROPS FIXED BY SUPPLY AND DEMAND

Another thing that is implied in Mr. Edson's article is that food prices today are being kept up by reason of Government support prices, which Mr. Edson infers are being applied in underhanded, tricky sorts of ways. Here is what he says:

Double parity formulas, trick conservation payments, unreasonable support prices, and all the hidden subsidy gimmicks thought up during the depression need a complete overhauling.

If Mr. Edson means by this that the general level of farm prices is being kept up through Government supports, he is wrong again. There is temporary legislation on the books, passed during the war, which provides for support prices on certain agricultural commodities. That legislation was passed for the purpose of protecting farmers who were asked to expand their operations and to go into the production of new and unfamiliar crops because they were especially needed; and also in order to enable farmers to reconvert after the war period to peacetime production. The idea was the same as contained in provisions made for business, to enable farmers to expand their production during the war and to swing back into peacetime production after the war was over. The only difference is that the provisions for business cost the taxpayers of this country a lot more than did those for agriculture.

But what are the facts as to support prices? Simply this: There is no important agricultural commodity today which is getting any benefit from support prices, and the only cases where any price supports on food crops are in effect, either wholly or partly, are those involving a few minor commodities. In those cases the support is at 90 percent of parity which, after all, means less than fair prices to the farmer. The provisions authorizing this support expire on December 31. Note also that the prices of which consumers are complaining are those of commodities on which prices are being made by supply and demand, such as grains, livestock, and meats, milk and milk products, and poultry, as well as some fruits and vegetables.

The fact is, some farm prices are declining at this time and they are declining much faster than food prices. A lot of the declines have not been reflected at all in lower prices to the consumer. For instance, wheat dropped about 70 cents per bushel in February and the price has stayed just about the same ever since. Nevertheless, the average price of bread is as high as it was before the drop, and in some places it is higher. During the recent meat strike, meat prices to consumers went up, but prices on livestock to farmers declined.

FARMERS CANNOT FIX PRICES ON THINGS THEY SELL

Now, just what is it that has brought about an increase in farm and food prices during recent years, and what is holding them up to their present levels? Is it anything that farmers are doing? Well, that question almost answers itself, because there is no way by which farmers can control the prices of their products. No individual farmer can do a thing about what he gets for his product. All he can do is take it to market, ask what the price is, and if he does not like it, he can haul it back home. Most farm products are perishable or semiperishable. They have to be sold at a certain time, so the farmer is at the mercy of the buyer and the consumer.

Unlike labor and industry, farmers do not go on strike or stop production in order to hike prices. I mentioned a while ago that food consumption in this country had gone up 16 percent per capita, but agricultural production, as compared with prewar, has gone up 35 percent. That is notwithstanding the fact that there are fewer people on the farms and that farmers are still suffering from an acute shortage of machinery and fertilizer. Now, suppose that farmers had followed the example of some of their cousins in the city and had cut their production by going on strike, or by slow-downs, or the other methods which are used as weapons by organized workers to secure higher income? Suppose, instead of increasing their production 35 percent under great difficulties, farmers had kept on producing at the same rate they did before the war. Where do you suppose farm prices would be today?

Another thing which may or may not interest Mr. Edson and those who think with him, is that production costs on the farm have advanced tremendously. The wages of farm labor are up almost 300 percent and every article which the farmer uses in production has advanced substantially. The farmer may be handling quite a bit of money nowadays, but with expenses as they are, his bank account at the end of the year is not nearly as large as outsiders might suppose.

WHY FARM AND FOOD PRICES ARE HIGH

Now, let us get back to the question of what is holding up farm prices today. There is just one answer, and that is supply and demand. Our per capita consumption of food is 16 percent above prewar. Our population has increased over 11,000,000 since that time. So demand is high and, with a greater national income than we ever dreamed of in this country, people are bidding against each other for food items. That is one part of the story.

The other part is that during and since the war, this country has sent vast quantities of food abroad. This food has not only saved the lives of millions of people, but has been an important part of our foreign policy. It is our atomic bomb as far as the cold war is concerned, and if we win that war, it will be largely because of the redoubtable efforts of American farmers in increasing production in spite of some pretty serious handicaps.

The fact is, when supply and demand are operating, farm incomes in this country move right along with industrial wages. It is almost uncanny, but over a period of many years, going back at least as far as 1920, cash receipts from farm marketings and the wage earnings of factory workers have been almost the same. The only time when there has been any great variation was during the war when we had a ceiling on farm prices and no ceiling on wages. At that time, factory wages were substantially in excess of the total receipts from farm marketings. As soon as price ceilings were removed, however, the relationship between the two figures was again restored and for 1946 and 1947 they were almost identically the same. For 1946, cash receipts from farm marketings were $24,519,000,000, and wage earnings of factory workers were $24,221,000,000. The preliminary estimate for 1947 shows cash receipts from farm marketings to be $30,000,000,000, and wage earnings of factory workers to be $29,500,000,000.

If we have another round of substantial wage increases, it is almost certain that in the end it will result in another increase in food prices.

WHAT WOULD MR. EDSON DO ABOUT FARM PRICES?

Mr. Edson makes some sweeping generalizations, but nowhere does he say what he would do about farm prices. Perhaps he is in favor of price ceilings. If so, is he in favor of ceilings on wages, on freight rates, on steel, on farm machinery, and on all the other articles that farmers buy? Or does he want to establish an OPA on farm prices while wages and other prices keep on soaring? Judging by the tenor of his article, that is probably just what he wants to do.

MR. EDSON ENCOURAGES STRIKES AND DISUNITY

Mr. Edson says, "Outlawing the Communist Party and tightening up on the labor laws will not stop today's strikes." Without agreeing or disagreeing with Mr. Edson on that, it can well be said that neither will articles like Mr. Edson's stop strikes. Indeed, if people generally swallow his unfounded, misleading statements and accept the biased conclusions which are contained in the article, it can well have the effect of encouraging strikes.

It is unfortunate that anyone should write such an article at this time when the American people are confronted with so many grave problems at home and abroad. This is a time for unity in thought and action, not for class strife and group hatred. I know of nothing which is better calculated to bring about disunity and dissension among our people than mischievous, demagogic articles such as that written by Mr. Edson.

Hon. John H. Overton, of Louisiana

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OVERTON BROOKS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I was not in this Chamber on May 14 when announcement was made of the death of Louisiana's Senator John H. Overton. I was not able to pay the tribute of love and affection which was voiced from countless lips on that occasion. I was then with the family.

John Overton was my uncle. He was likewise my godfather. During the course of his 72 years of active life, I followed his career with a filial interest which never wavered. The influence of his life on my own has been profound.

At the time of his birth 72 years ago, the Overton family, consisting of three children, lived in what was then the straggling little French village of Marksville, La. The parish of Avoyelles in which he was born was set in the angle made by the confluence of the Red, Atchafalaya, and the Mississippi Rivers. The earliest recollections of his childhood were along the banks of Bayou Jack and Bayou deGlaise in Avoyelles Parish in central Louisiana. The periodic floods of these great rivers were tragedies of his early childhood which made an enduring impression upon his mind and neither time nor the moving political events of volcanic Louisiana politics were able to erase them from his retentive mind.

A course at the Louisiana State University, followed by a law degree from Tulane University at New Orleans, completed his education. He left the scenes of his childhood to move to the nearby city of Alexandria where he built up a large law practice and a reputation as an advocate which spread to all parts of the State of Louisiana.

While John Overton actually held no political office during the years of his early life, he nonetheless maintained an active interest in those gubernatorial campaigns which every 4 years have swept our State. It is said that he was the force which more than any other brought about the election of many of our governors prior to his own entrance into the political arena.

As the dark clouds of war came to this Nation, John Overton accepted the responsibility as to the condition of our Navy. He became chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Navy; and he gave his best efforts toward placing our sea fighters in such a condition as to meet the test when the Nation called upon them. How well this goal was met is shown by the stirring and historic naval drama of the Second World War, out of which we emerged with an incomparable fleet manned by the most aggressive and intrepid personnel which this world has ever known.

With the war won, Senator Overton again turned his attention to flood control. During these years, his innate desire to provide for those who dwelled in the valleys of the Nation returned to him with renewed appeal. He worked as a member of the Appropriations Committee and as a member of the Public Works Committee in the Senate, devising plans and programs to meet the flood emergencies occurring all over America. As he saw his plan move toward fruition, the scenes of his early years began to crowd upon him—his birthplace at Marksville, La., behind the Mississippi, the Atchafalaya, and the Red Rivers; the frightened cries arising from the floods; the dirty yellow waters from far up the Mississippi Valley which flooded the homes, killed neighbors, and destroyed their property. Could any resolve be more worth while than that of giving succor, comfort, and aid and flood protection to those whose lives are spent in the valleys and in the shadow of the levees of the great rivers of the Nation? He entered into the work of organizations whose purpose is dedicated to sponsoring projects which give protection to those in the valleys.

After World War II, Senator Overton announced his decision to retire to private life. This decision was made, no doubt, upon the realization that he had done his full part in helping to win the war; and he naturally longed to retire to private life and to ease and comfort. Some 43 Senators signed a petition urging him not to retire but to stand for reelection. Pleas from the people of the State of Louisiana came to him by the thousands, and hundreds more came from all parts of the Nation, asking him to again stand for the Senate. He took all of these requests to heart and, after a careful reexamination, he announced a change in his decision, stating that he would run again. No doubt, this change may have been influenced by the lines of Tennyson's immortal poem, Ulysses, which he loved so well:

I cannot rest from travel; I will drink
Life to the lees. All time I have enjoy'd Greatly, have suffer'd greatly, both with those
That love me, and alone; * * *
How dull it is to pause, to make an end,
To rust unburnish'd, not to shine in use.

He did not care to spend the remainder of his days in idleness—he did not want to rust—to go to seed. He wanted to use his energies and his God-given talents to the utmost. At this age, when retirement was normal and to be desired, he sensed that

Tho' much is taken, much abides; and tho'
We are not now that strength which in old days
Moved earth and heaven; that which we are, we are—
One equal temper of heroic hearts,
Made weak by time and fate but strong in will
To strive, to seek, to find, and not to yield.

As a result of this decision, he literally died in his boots. It seemed to be his desire that he would fight on to the very end, serving his people and his Nation with patience and fidelity. To him, public service was a public trust; and at all times he so conducted himself that his record might bear public inspection and public criticism.

Mr. Speaker, I was called to the Bethesda Naval Center just before Senator Overton was taken to the operating room for the operation which he knew would bring the end. Along with his wife and his daughter, I maintained a vigil by his bedside throughout the long and trying hours of his critical illness. I talked with him just before death came on silent wings. His mind was on flood control. He talked of projects in south Louisiana and in north Louisiana. He talked about the Overton-Red River Lateral Canal and the New Orleans projects. He lamented that he would not be able to be present in the Senate to handle the flood-control-appropriation bill, which by tragic coincidence, was scheduled to come up for consideration in the Senate on the very day of his death. He asked who would be able to carry on his work in his absence. This question remains unanswered at the present time.

Mr. Speaker, I am not discouraged as to flood control and navigation. The vastness of these problems challenge the abilities of our leadership. Millions of people living in the valleys of the Nation want and need this help; and in the course of events someone will rise up and meet this challenge with energy and courage. But the training and experience and unselfish leadership of Senator Overton is lost; and the people of our State of Louisiana lose an outstanding public official as he goes to his reward.

I saw the telegrams which came to the widow and family. They were from all parts of the Nation. They were words of sympathy and of sorrow. But more than that, they were filled with gratitude and appreciation—gratitude and appreciation from those who had received at his hands help and protection from floods. They were from peoples who know that water can be even more devastating than fire; peoples who had fought the battles of the swirling, ugly, muddy flood waters as they sought to inundate their homes and destroy their property; people who thanked God that Louisiana had given them a leader who would battle for them in high places in Washington; humble people who heard his voice from the floors of the United States Senate and took courage. These people will not forget.

You that have faith to look with fearless eyes
Beyond the tragedy of a world at strife,
And trust that out of night and death shall rise
The dawn of ampler life;
Rejoice, whatever anguish rend your heart,
That God has given you, for a priceless dower,
To live in these great times and have your part
In freedom's crowning hour.

Address Before Amphibian Engineer Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert herein in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, an address made by me before the third annual convention of the Amphibian Engineer Association at Boston, Mass., Saturday, on June 5, 1948:

Gentlemen, it is always a good feeling to be with a great outfit. A feeling second only to being part of a great outfit.

I envy you your membership in the Amphibian Engineer Association, and all that it stands for.

I want to join in welcoming you to Massachusetts—the mother State of America's amphibian glory.

In establishing your Boston beachhead, you have moved in, I must say, by all manner and means unbecoming true amphibians—by rail, by air, and by smooth auto highway. But Boston does not begrudge you these luxuries.

Within a few hours the entire Nation will be looking back 4 years to one of the most tense moments in world history—D-day—June 6, 1944. Many of you were there as you were everywhere that the going was toughest.

At Oran, Omaha, and Okinawa. At Salerno, Samar, and Sansapor; Leyte, Luzon, and the Lingayen Gulf. At Bohol and Balikpapen. As I chant them now these names have a sort of musical ring, but you know the kind of music that was played there.

It was the same monotonous music which one engineer special brigade listened to during 82 combat landings—82 combat landings. The longest list of combat operations of any unit in the entire United States armed forces. And, as I don't have to tell you, every one of these 82 combat landings stuck. During its campaign, this same brigade brought down 42 Jap planes mainly with small-arms fire, and killed over 1,000 Japs.

On one occasion, a boat company met and repelled an attack which the enemy launched as the boat company hit the beach.

Swinging to the logistics side of the amphibian-engineer saga, it is now proud history that two amphibian engineer brigades handled a cargo tonnage across Omaha Beach which was the equivalent for a like period handled by the combined port facilities of the cities of Philadelphia and Baltimore. This was on an open beach with only a breakwater of sunken ships.

And when Patton's Third Army was coming back to the beach for its supplies—when it was slowed down due to the lack of essential supplies—these brigades responded by adding to its around-the-clock shift every man in the entire organization—clerks, cooks, colonels, and corporals. The cargo moved off the boats onto the roads, and Patton moved again with his usual speed like lightning.

The back-breaking toil on Omaha Beach went forward in the face of heavy casualties. The supplies and equipment that weren't barged ashore or DUKW'd ashore were brought ashore in small boats, or the boats were landed and unloaded by hand.

A brigade quartermaster platoon—apparently figuring that it had some time on its hands during the landing—managed to muscle its way into a Ranger Battalion and slug it out with the Germans.

Just let it be said that in the early fighting the entire rate of advance of our armies across France was entirely dependent upon the logistical support from Omaha Beach.

Yours is a very rich tradition indeed; one filled with courage, teamwork, efficiency, skill, speed; with contempt for danger, and with a tremendous capacity for sacrifice.

I cannot attempt tonight to recount the brilliant successes of each of the various engineer special brigades. Nor would it be possible for me to single out your Noces (like Close), Trudeaus (Trew-doe), Wolfes, Hoges (Hoag), Thompsons, Ogdens, Heaveys (Hee-vee), Houstons, Quinns, and Mulligans, without running the list down the line and through the ranks until I had named every last amphibian soldier.

I'll just name one amphibian soldier tonight. But in naming him I want to read again the citation which accompanied his Congressional Medal of Honor:

"Pvt. Junior N. Van Noy, Five Hundred and Thirty-second Engineer Boat and Shore Regiment: For conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity above and beyond the call of duty in action with the enemy near Finschafen, New Guinea, on 17 October 1943. When wounded late in September, Private Van Noy declined evacuation and continued on duty. On 17 October 1943, he was gunner in charge of a machinegun post only five yards from the water's edge when the alarm was given that three enemy barges loaded with troops were approaching the beach in the early morning darkness. One landing barge was sunk by Allied fire, but the other two beached 10 yards from Private Van Noy's emplacement. Despite his exposed position, he poured a withering hail of fire into the debarking enemy troops. His loader was wounded by a grenade and evacuated. Privae Van Noy, also greviously wounded, remained at his post, ignoring calls of nearby soldiers urging him to withdraw, and continued alone to fire with deadly accuracy. He expended every round and was found covered with wounds, dead beside his gun. In this action Private Van Noy killed at least half of the 39 enemy taking part in the landing. His heroic tenacity at the price of his life not only saved the lives of many of his comrades but enable them to annhilate the attacking detachment."

Your association has for its purpose the perpetuation and strengthening of the amphibian comradeship and ideals to which I pay tribute. It is to all of you that I say, "Well done." And it is to those men who never came back from their beachheads that you and I tonight silently promise that their job will remain "Well done."

In its present state of affairs, the world should be taking a lesson from the amphibian scorebook—not only from its magnificent combat pages, but also from the chapter concerned with the formative and development stages, where it would find a pattern of determination and clear-thinking for surmounting most all of the man-made obstacles to unity, cohesion and cooperation.

It is not by chance that the engineer amphibian command can claim to be the first truly unified fighting force to have pulled in and carried with it not only the American Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard and Air Force, but the British Army and Navy as well. If the amphibian engineers had had the notion that they could have made any use of them whatsoever, I'm certain they would have swept into their fold not only the Democrats but also the Republicans. I still think the Amphibian Command could have found room for the Republicans at Carabelle.

Unification on the amphibian scale was no easier upon its elements than has been overall unification of the armed services on the grand scale of total defense. There were bound to be differences of opinion, tradition and ambition. The important fact is that when these differences were encountered by the men charged with organizing our amphibian force they were analyzed intelligently—and vigorously attacked. These differences were dissolved in an air of sober understanding, not detoured or left to widen the gap between give-and-take.

In its original training the engineer amphibian command had a Coast Guard detachment administering boat training. Shore training and doctrine came under a Marine Corps officer; Coast and Geodetic Survey officers were used in their specialty. And goodness only knows the range of techniques contributed to amphibian training by the "Mississippi River Gang", and the New England fishermen and motorboat men.

The amphibian planners performed in true American character. It is the only way we really know how to behave, but we are being put to extreme ends in our efforts to go on expecting the same behavior by others.

Yours was a fighting and a logistical mission and you accomplished it exceedingly well. Now, instead of sitting back on your laurels, you are eagerly promoting the peacetime development of the wartime weapon you called your own. You are aware of the unpleasant fact that victory is slow, almost vengefully so, in producing the peace that it promised. You are self-alerted to this realization. You trained for and fought for objectives in terms of proper preparation. These are still terms which you understand full well, and that is a natural and a very fortunate development.

You now constitute a spearhead of thinking which must lead the way to national thinking about the virtues of preparedness—preparedness to join with other nations in a common front of understanding, preparedness to defend the democratic tradition against those who would bring about its downfall, and, just as important, preparedness to strengthen and improve our Nation in the ways of peace, so that American tradition and American intelligence and strength can work constructively, not only for our own good, but for that of all mankind.

Federal Aid to Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. VIRGIL CHAPMAN

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, the representatives of the American people in this Congress have many duties to their constituents that ought to be performed and many problems of vital importance to our country that ought to be solved before this Congress adjourns sine die. I appreciate the desire of the gentlemen to escape from the heat and humidity of the Capital City during the period of midsummer. I remember the story of how the flies from a neighboring livery stable near Independence Hall caused the Members of the Continental Congress to hasten their adoption of the resolution offered by Richard Henry Lee of Virginia, "that these United Colonies are and of right ought to be free and independent States," and the promulgation of the Declaration of Independence a little earlier than had been expected because of the flies biting the calves of the statesmen in knee breeches. I certainly understand and appreciate the desire of the gentlemen to get back home in a campaign year. Frankly, I have some matters to attend to myself in the State of Kentucky. However, our first duty is to our constituents and to the American people. We ought not to adjourn with so much unfinished business of great moment to the welfare of our country.

I have just learned that the conferees have failed to agree on an agricultural bill that will extend the price-support program, which for several years has insured agricultural producers against the kind of financial calamity that in former days was a constant threat to producers of farm products. I hope agreement will be reached before adjournment.

SHOULD PASS HOUSING LAW BEFORE ADJOURNMENT

The House of Representatives has failed to pass a housing bill worthy of the name. The one passed yesterday is but an empty shell and holds promise of no relief to veterans or millions of other citizens in the lower income brackets.

Another subject that ought to be dealt with intelligently and courageously before we adjourn is that of Federal aid to education. It was with reluctance that I felt constrained to sign a petition to discharge the Committee on Education and Labor from consideration of that bill as I did to discharge the Committee on Banking and Currency from consideration of the housing bill, both of which had passed the Senate in such form as I believe ought to have the approval of the House. I had never before since I became a Member of the House more than 23 years ago signed a discharge petition, but, recognizing the definite need for these laws and the existence of an emergency in both education and housing I signed those two petitions in the hope of forcing those two bills to the floor of the House for consideration.

JEFFERSON AND FEDERAL AID

For many years there has been a powerful movement in this country for appropriations by the United States Congress for the aid of schools in the States. The proposal has been presented in various forms, some good and some bad. There has been, and is now, a prevailing tendency to look to the colossal majestic dome of the Nation's Capitol for a cure for all the ills and a panacea for all the evils that afflict our country. Frequently, that tendency has gone to dangerous extremes and manifested itself in foolish innovations, but the idea of Federal aid to schools is not new. The most profound political philosopher, the wisest political seer, the greatest constructive statesman America has produced, the author of the Declaration of Independence, the father of American democracy, the leader of the strict constructionists of the Constitution in the formative period of the Republic, Thomas Jefferson, advocated Federal expenditures for education even if such a governmental activity should require amendment of the Constitution. He was the antithesis of a Federal interventionist. He inspired and collaborated in the drafting of the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions of 1798, which constitute two of the finest statements of the doctrine of State sovereignty in all political literature. Jefferson would have abhorred the idea of Federal control of schools and direction by bureaucrats at Washington in indoctrinating the plastic minds of boys and girls of school age when their minds are like wax to receive and like marble to retain. That fear has always been present in the minds of statesmen who cherish our institutions and are solicitous of the future of our country. I have always shared that fear and would oppose any bill that I thought would lead to that result.

EDUCATION BASIS OF DEMOCRACY

Nothing is more fundamental than that the permanence and the prosperity of American institutions depend on the intelligence and character of the American people. Cultivated mind is the only leadership which free people will accept and free government cannot function long or successfully unless it derives its powers from an electorate of intelligence and character. There is more of the spirit of the Declaration of Independence and the Bill of Rights in the public-school system than in any other of our cherished institutions. It is the symbol of democracy in the broadest and most vital sense in which that word can be used, including the kind of democracy that teaches every man to be his brother's keeper and to love his neighbor as himself. There is an obligation that rests upon the State to provide ample and proper educational opportunity for all of its children.

AGAINST GOVERNMENT MONOPOLY IN EDUCATION

While education is the responsibility of Government, one of the most dangerous menaces that could threaten our free institutions would be Government monopoly in education. While the State should hold open the school house door to every child within its borders, the right of every mother and father to send their children to the school of their own free, untrammeled choice, whether it be public or private, sectarian or non-sectarian, is as fundamental, as vital, and as sacred as their inherent, inalienable right to lead those children to the altar of their choice for the worship of God in their own way. I would oppose to the uttermost any bill which would interfere with that right.

THIS BILL ELIMINATES DANGERS; MEETS REQUIREMENTS

At last we have a bill to meet a crying need at a time when we are told that the school system of some of our so-called poorer States is on the verge of collapse; when because of State constitutional limitations, lack of a sufficient tax base, or for other reasons, State and local school districts are unable adequately to provide for their educational necessities. It is the most meritorious Federal education bill that has ever had a chance to become a law. It is designed to preserve State and local control; would preclude domination by the Federal Government as far as that desirable result can be accomplished by writing language into law; would provide for the grant of Federal funds to be expended in accordance with the constitutions and laws of the respective individual sovereign States. It is not the grab-bag type of bill that would give too large a proportion of the aid to the wealthier States, and contains provisions for equalization that would bring much needed benefit to the poorer States. There is nothing in it that would prevent a fair amount of aid to schools in southern States, where the need is greatest and the ability to provide sufficient funds is the least.

SIGNED DISCHARGE PETITION

An aroused public opinion demands the enactment of this bill into law. It is believed to be the answer to the cry of distress from impoverished school districts in the poorer sections of our country. It would seem to be the fulfillment of the prophetic vision of the Sage of Monticello. It has passed the United States Senate. I believe a large majority would vote for it in the House of Representatives if the titular leaders of that body would permit it to be voted on. The responsibility rests with them. Scores of Members of Congress with the sanction of American public opinion behind them have urged the titular leaders, who map the course of legislation and shape congressional programs, to bring this Federal education bill to the floor of the House of Representatives for action. Many of us resorted to the most drastic means known to House procedure—the discharge petition—to force a vote on it. President Harry S. Truman, who included an estimate of $300,000,000 for this purpose in his budget recommendation at the beginning of this session of Congress, directed an urgent appeal to Speaker JOSEPH W. MARTIN of the House of Representatives not to deny the people's representatives the opportunity to vote the will of their constituents in enacting this bill, which we hope and believe will make a stronger America.

SCHOOL SYSTEM FIRST LINE OF DEFENSE

The argument that expenditures for national defense preclude expenditures for education is fallacious. The American school system is America's first line of defense. Wellington truly said that the Battle of Waterloo was won on the playing fields of Eton. Those who have won the greatest battles of our country in both war and peace learned invaluable lessons and received exalted inspiration from consecrated, devoted teachers. It was pitiable and tragic to see the 659,392 young Americans who, because of educational deficiency, were denied the priceless privilege of wearing their country's uniform and following their country's flag wherever it flaunted its folds of red, white, and blue amid the shock and din of battle in the recent Armageddon for the preservation of civilization. As a consistent, constant advocate of adequate national defense as the best insurance against war, a doctrine I have proclaimed in a thousand speeches during the past 30 years, I have joined with a host of my colleagues in urging the small group of titular leaders in Congress, who hold in their hands the fate of this great beneficent measure, to give us the opportunity before this Congress adjourns to enact it into law as a vital factor in the program of national defense. Let us not adjourn until we pass this bill for which the boys and girls of America are calling.

Peace—The Greatest Issue of All

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, the varied and complex problems we have considered in this Eightieth Congress have been many and I know we have all of us tried to consider only those matters which would be most beneficial to the welfare of the people we represent and our Nation. We have succeeded in large measure, but we have scarcely considered the greatest issue of all—peace.

Without peace, all our expenditures for dams and highways only afford greater destruction. There was a time when broad oceans and friendly neighbors protected us. That time has passed. No part of the world can be in flames without this country becoming involved. We may as well recognize that. Every thoughtful man knows that we all must somehow learn to live together in peace, or we all must perish together in mortal combat. Always remember: Victories on the battlefield do not bring peace. We need a moral and religious crusade to bring unity and understanding to the people. You can order a man around at the point of a gun in war, but you cannot win the peace that way. Peace is not the absence of something; it is the presence of something. The Good Book says—and I sometimes think men need to hear and heed it more—"Blessed are the peacemakers." Peace is not the product of wishful thinking; it is the result of intelligent effort and devout work.

UNITED STATES ASSUMES WORLD LEADERSHIP FOR PEACE

The leadership for peace and stability has now passed to the United States. It is a great challenge. I think we have the power and means either to make this era a great and peaceful one, or to allow the mighty forces of war to destroy civilization. When the war was over we hoped that we could live peacefully with all people. We found that it could not be that way. We ran head-on into communistic aggression which was about to take over all of Europe and most of Asia, leaving only a little island of democracy. There came a time when we had to stand up to the Communists. I think we should have made a stand sooner. We realized that we had to have friends who saw things our way, if it was to be possible to have any real chance toward peace. The Greek-Turkish program was a "stop, look, and listen" sign to the Communists. The European recovery program was a policy adopted in keeping with our position of world leadership. It convinced the Communists that we were going to cooperate with the 16 democracies of Europe in the interest of stability; that we were determined to stop their program of dangerous and unlawful expansion. It was the only course that we could take.

Up to this point I think it has been successful. I think the Communists now understand that we mean business—that we are not going to be pushed around. Their dictatorship is just as dark as any the world has ever seen, and we cannot afford to take a chance of our country or of any of our real friends being destroyed by the Communists.

THE NEXT STEP TOWARD PEACE

Now that we have inaugurated the European recovery program I think it is time to take further steps in the interest of peace. The United Nations is doing some good work, but as long as Russia blocks every move and has the right of veto, we cannot expect the United Nations to bring peace to the world or to settle major disputes that may arise. I think we should make every effort to strengthen the United Nations, and we should look forward to the day when the Russian people and the satellite nations under new leadership may cooperate in the United Nations.

But we need more than the United Nations. We need a close and formalized working arrangement with the high producing democracies of the world—those included in the ECA and others. History is quite clear in showing that World War I could have been avoided if the democratic countries had stood and acted together. Hitler would never have gone on his warpath if he had known that the freedom-loving people of the world would unite to strike him down. Stalin and his despicable group would back away and not bring the world into another conflict if he knew that the democracies of the world would be united against him. I have studied the matter very closely. I am convinced that the one real way that we can have peace in the world is to join in a kind of federation with the other freedom-loving peoples. This would be a federation not for war but for peace. It should include common political and military aims. Restrictive trade barriers should be removed and a system assuring a stabilized currency should be adopted. I feel that the statesmen of these democracies should work toward this program, just as the statesmen of our Nation worked toward building Thirteen States into the federation which grew into the great United States of America. The democracies associated should hope other nations would join in this quest for stability and peace. The door should always be left open for other nations when they become free, because liberty-loving people never cause war. It is going to take work, a lot of prayerful thinking, and moral and religious regeneration. But it is not only possible. It must be done.

HULL TRADE PROGRAM A CORNERSTONE FOR PEACE

Last week I visited that great Tennessean and world statesman, Cordell Hull. In spite of advanced years he is alert, active, and inspiring. He has made the greatest contribution to the cause of world peace of any of our time. He recognizes that wars result from economic warfare between nations. Trade is necessary if people are to live in unity. Mr. Hull deplores the trend back to isolationism as evidenced by the recent sabotage of the trade-agreements program in the House. We must fight for this program with all our might. We must do our utmost to prevent our foreign policy from becoming a political issue.

Yes, friends, it is a challenging day—but we can grow strong in the effort. We can accomplish peace if we will hold the torch high.

Joseph Jefferson Mansfield

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. CLARK W. THOMPSON
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 17, 1948

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. JOSEPH JEFFERSON MANSFIELD, late a Representative from the State of Texas

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, almost a year ago the long, useful, and distinguished career of Judge JOSEPH JEFFERSON MANSFIELD as a Member of Congress was terminated by his death. His character and achievements have already been extolled on the floor of this House by voices more eloquent than mine. It is fitting that those who paid the most sincere honor to his memory at the time of his death were those who had served here longest as his colleagues and who, accordingly, knew him best. But I do not feel that I can see the close of this session without contributing my equally sincere and heartfelt tribute to the nobility of his character.

I, too, knew him long and well. More than 12 years ago, when I first entered these Halls as a young and willing but untutored Member of this body, it was he who became my friend and mentor and helped me over the rough places with his kindly counsel. I knew him also at home, during the periods when Congress was not in session. There he moved about, loved and respected, among his friends and neighbors, explaining and interpreting for them the significance of the issues of national scope and seeking to draw out their attitudes, opinions, and convictions so that he could truly represent them.

There could be no more convincing proof of the practical workability of our democratic system than the life and achievements of Judge MANSFIELD. Under no system other than ours would the opportunities be available for such a career as his. He was born in Virginia at the very beginning of the tragic strife that, for a time, sundered the Nation, and permanently wrested the region of his birthplace from the mother State. He was not willing, however, to remain in that war-torn border section lamenting the passing of the old regime. Before he had attained voting age his venturous spirit led him to undertake what were in those days the genuine hardships and hazards of travel, to join his brother in the newer and more forward-looking State of Texas. There, within a few miles of his present home, he established himself, first as a fruit-tree nurseryman, then, successively, railroad station agent, mayor, county attorney. For 20 years he occupied the county judgeship of Colorado County, where his well-known courageous sense of fairness earned for him the confidence, affection, and esteem of his neighbors that made him their chosen Representative in Congress for the remainder of his life.

We like to think of his record and his accomplishments as typically American. But, although most of us are, we hope, capable of rising on stressful occasions to the demands and tests of patriotism and good citizenship, unfortunately, there are only too few of us who can maintain ourselves serenely on that high level throughout the years as did Judge MANSFIELD.

Mr. Speaker, the almost insurmountable difficulties of trying to walk in his footsteps and adequately represent the district that he honored for so many years makes me recognize, perhaps more clearly than most, how rare and outstanding were his attributes and achievements in this democratic body of ours. There is a time-honored custom at the United States Military Academy, an institution almost equally democratic in its organization, of according to a new cadet some of the prestige of his predecessor from the same congressional district, until he can establish himself on his own merits. I am proud to have had Judge MANSFIELD as my predecessor, and I could wish for no greater good fortune than to be accorded some of the prestige he has earned, while I truly endeavor to measure up to the splendid precedent that he has set.

Address by Hon. Alfred Schindler, Former Under Secretary of Commerce, Before National Conference on Community Improvement, Presidential Ballroom, Hotel Statler, Washington, D. C., May 24, 1948

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE CANNON
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I wish to insert in the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. Alfred Schindler, former Under Secretary of Commerce, before the National Conference on Community Improvement, Hotel Statler, Washington, D. C., on May 24, 1948.

Mr. Schindler with his long and successful business experience brought to the Department of Commerce a practical approach to many of the problems of both large and small business. His personal knowledge of community organizations and activities gives him a comprehensive insight into the needs and requirements of community life in America.

For many years there has been a growing tendency in American communities to shift their responsibilities to others and especially to the shoulders of the Federal Government. It is highly encouraging to find that we have a Nation-wide organization which is endeavoring to correct this tendency and to develop interest within our communities in undertaking their own improvement and development activities on a self-reliant, self-sufficient basis.

The National Council for Community Improvement is made up of representatives from the many national organizations who are interested in the various phases of community improvement. Its officers, board of trustees, and advisory committee include many of the outstanding citizens of the country. These men and women recognize the great need for united action on a coordinated and voluntary basis in the community. At the recent National Conference on Community Improvement held in Washington outstanding authorities on community affairs presented an epic-making program that may well become the turning point in arousing communities to meet and solve the many problems now confronting them.

The activities of this national group include:

Public interest: To use the press, radio, motion pictures, and other means for developing public support of voluntary, coordinated community improvement activities; for encouraging flexible procedures in fully expanding and developing local resources and facilities; for increasing community self-reliance and self-sufficiency in solving local problems.

Information clearinghouse: To engage in the collection and dissemination of information pertaining to planning and community improvement activities which have been undertaken, are now under way, or are contemplated by urban or rural units. To serve as the national clearinghouse for experiences and examples of successful developments and encourage all communities to send us records of accomplishments. Thus each community will benefit by having this combined information readily available.

Local and State councils: To encourage the formation of State and local improvement councils. To inspire and help establish community improvement groups to unite all interests so that the most widespread benefits will be derived.

Participation and membership: To encourage business, industry, labor, the professions, organizations, and individuals to be members and actively cooperate with their local and State councils, as well as our national council.

The importance of this program is widely recognized as affecting the economic welfare of the Nation, better relations between industry and labor, juvenile delinquency, recreational facilities, and various other urgent problems.

It has demonstrated already that home-town attention to such problems can produce more effective answers than can be secured by any shifting of responsibility to others. The people of America live in these hundreds of cities, towns, and villages of the Nation, rather than here in Washington. It is in these home communities that many of our most pressing problems can and should be settled.

When neighbors in a community or fellow residents of a larger area get together to plan and work for better places in which to live and do business, there is little opportunity for communism or other undesirable activities to divert attention.

May I commend the careful reading of the following excerpts from Mr. Schindler's remarks:

Mr. Chairman, members of the conference, may I first of all extend double congratulations—first to the officers and directors of the National Council for Community Improvement for their outstanding accomplishments to date, and for their preparations for this most important meeting. Secondly, to you members of the conference for taking time out of your busy lives to come and share this program with us and give us your counsel, your best suggestions and recommendations, so that when the meeting is over, we may give further and more rapid action to the all-important problem facing our Nation today—that of community improvement.

The subject of community improvement is not a simple nor an easy one to discuss. It is difficult because it is tremendously complex inasmuch as it touches practically every phase of human conduct. There may momentarily be problems that seem more urgent and more important, but their ultimate solution lies in the hands of individuals and the communities of which they are a part.

This council is very wise in attacking the problem of community improvement at its source. Unless it is attacked there and solved there, as Mr. Shanks and Mr. Beck have so well brought out, we had better not be too optimistic in hoping that the problem will be solved correctly or in time.

Fortunately much work on community improvement has already been done. There is no one in this audience who has a more profound respect and admiration than I have for those who have contributed so much to some of the fine plans for community improvement that we have in many communities throughout the Nation. It is good to know that we may draw on their rich talents because there is much additional work that remains to be done.

One cannot travel up and down and across this land without seeing community after community that has done little if anything along the lines of community improvement. Unless we have improvement on a national scale—unless we can interlink our communities in a broad program of improvement, we are not going to make the national progress which is imperative.

The work of community planning and improvement must be better coordinated to give it greater acceptance, strength, and action. There is need for the organization of local councils or reorganization of existing community units for improvement. Under their guidance activities can be better coordinated and can achieve better acceptance on the part of those whom they are designed to help.

We need to develop certain avenues of approach, certain pegs on which to hang programs of community improvement in order to speed their development and in order to hasten their acceptance by our citizens if the programs are to be successful. May I suggest three pegs on which to start: One, the protective phase; two, the social phase; and, third, the economic phase. I do not believe that community improvement can succeed without these three phases being taken fully into consideration.

First let us discuss briefly the protective phase. I mean such forces as the police force, the fire force, the public utilities, etc.—those protective forces that protect our home, our community and our country.

We have just recently organized a new Civilian Defense Commission. It reminds me that I had the great privilege and opportunity to be appointed to the first National Civilian Defense Commission in the summer of 1941, 6 months before Pearl Harbor. Our task was to arouse community interest in civilian defense and prepare for it in the event of war.

Two great shocks came to me. One was the wholly inadequate protection available in the average community in America, but more than that, the very rude shock caused by the absolute lack of interest in that most important aspect of our life. May I give as an illustration the city of St. Louis. If we had had five big fires simultaneously, our city might well have been destroyed. God was kind to our city because we didn't have five big fires at one time. Because of that situation and others similar to it in other communities, one of the first things that the late Mayor LaGuardia, who was the first Director of the National Civilian Defense Council, did was to demand of Congress and the President that we immediately have more adequate funds to take care of ordinary protection of our homes and our communities.

Now, when I speak of emergencies, I do not speak solely of the emergencies of war. There are other emergencies that arise for which we must be prepared with adequate facilities in our areas if we are to protect our homes and our families. Many communities realize this, as I learned when it devolved upon me to close up Civilian Defense after the war and dispose of some $28,000,000 worth of equipment that had remained after hostilities ceased. I am happy to tell you that we had no problem at all in readily disposing of the protective equipment that remained. Communities bought the equipment because they realized that they must be protected against all emergencies whether from a military standpoint or other contingencies.

Now we have another National Civilian Defense Commission set up endeavoring to organize our communities so that they will be ready for any emergency of any kind. Like Mr. Shanks, I believe that this council is one of the most important being developed in the Nation today. I believe that without local councils for community improvement, the civilian-defense program is going to have a difficult time to succeed. After all, it is not military preparation alone we're talking about. We do not have enough military people to provide protective forces and other needs throughout our country and still fight whatever battles they may be called upon to enter in the future. We need an aroused civilian citizenship to help take care of all needed requirements.

It was very difficult at first to set up the final civilian defense committee in my own city and elsewhere in the country, but later when we had 125,000 people enrolled we knew that we had an adequate human force to protect our city against all emergencies. One of the great regrets that I have is that that force has dissipated, that it has broken up, and members are no longer interested in the adequate protective forces of which I speak. I hope that we can rearouse them and reorganize them into a virile, aggressive force, because if we overlook the protective aspects of community improvement we may well vitiate many other aspects that are just as important.

Secondly, the social phase of community improvement is another peg upon which we may hang much important planning and improvement. I have reference to such forces as the educational forces, recreational forces, better homes, beautification and physical improvement of the community, and religious forces. Many of the social problems that we have today—and, friends, they're growing—are due to a lack of community improvement when you analyze them and carry them right down to the final point.

Inroads by communism, disrupting labor disputes, juvenile delinquency—none of those things thrive where you have active and intensified community improvement supported by your citizens. If we hope to build better citizens in the future, then we must sow the seeds upon which that citizenship can thrive. I have no great fear of the spread of communism in the average community in America, but I do have fear of that slow moral deterioration in the average community when it passes the buck to someone else and refuses to do that which is the task of honorable citizens to accomplish.

These evil trends of a social nature, lack of education, lack of recreation, juvenile delinquency, lack of religious activity in a town, generally come from a lack of facilities in which these forces can grow and thrive. Is there anything more important in this Nation today, aside from protecting our homes and our families against all emergencies, than to protect our generation and those to come against negative social trends which may become increasingly evil?

This council has a tremendous responsibility and a tremendous opportunity in this field of social improvement. I have had the pleasure of doing a great deal of work with boys. I have not found very many (unless they were organically delinquent, and then they became medical cases) that you could not generally build into wonderful citizens. But you cannot do it in a slum environment. You cannot do it where your words are idle and unsupported by the things into which you would like to develop boys.

The hearts and souls of the American kids are basically right and sound, yet we see juvenile delinquency on the increase. We are spending millions of dollars to try to correct it. Do away with the causes of juvenile delinquency and interest ourselves in correcting the problem before it becomes critical. Let us be more interested in seeing that the problem doesn't arise in the first place. That is the duty and the responsibility of your local council for community improvement as well as the national council. Let us solve these problems at their source lest they become pyramided and become too costly and too difficult to solve after they have developed.

Finally, another peg on which we can hang our community-improvement program is the economic one. The expansion of our areas industrially is important. It means bringing in new industries and expanding commercial activity. This means an increased source of employment, and an increased source of producing the higher incomes that produce the higher standards of living, at the same time helping to produce better relations between labor and management.

As one who has spent his entire lifetime in the selling end of business, I, for one, do not like to go into cities where economic opportunities do not exist—where incomes are low. I know that I can only sell when there is money to pay for items I may have for sale.

When you have income on the increase due to increased production, due to expansion of opportunity, then you have a thriving community in which evil social forces can gain little foothold, and we can't go on demanding higher and higher incomes for less and less production. It simply isn't done that way. We can't go on raiding the Federal Treasury and adopting the slogan that is, unfortunately, popular in many quarters today—"more money for less work." There's only one way we can raise our incomes, and that is by increasing our productivity, not only as individuals but also collectively in the areas from which we come.

It is high time that America realizes this and it is high time that we are implementing this fact. We have a tremendous opportunity to do this on a local level. It cannot be done on a national level alone, for, if it is done there, then I think we shall see two forces implemented. We shall be controlled locally and we shall be deprived of the fullest fruit of our activity because we will have shunted to others the responsibility that is ours.

Let us proceed with this program of community improvement along protective lines, along social lines, and along economic lines. Many fine plans exist already—many more will have to be developed. With the proper and complete development of these plans, we face our biggest problem of all. Suppose we have the plans all made and there is little opportunity to improve them. We have the package ready to sell and it has to be sold properly to those for whom it is designated. There we face the biggest problem of all, and that is how to get action of the right kind on our plans.

We must get our forces coordinated so that we will avoid duplication and have greater strength and with it greater clarity to sell the program to the people and secure their acceptance and action on it. It is much more difficult to secure the acceptance of people when you have a confused and complex program, many segments of which are not tied together. It is an impossible job of selling in many cases, and so our package—our plans—must fit the people themselves. They must be acceptable to those whom we ask to accept them.

We can sit in Washington and plan; we can sit in New York or any other big center and plan for others, but as a St. Louisian, I want St. Louis people to make the play for my town. I don't want Washington to do it—I don't want New York or any other area to do it. I merely want that supreme court of helping—the National Council—available to counsel with us as we need their help. But the responsibility of my home town is that of the people themselves, because they know their area best, and those outside of it do not know it as we who live and have our homes and our families in it.

That is why we are laying stress in this conference on the local council, and on plans that fit the people locally, and on plans that fit the community locally. They must be right in order to be acceptable to those who are asked to accept them. We must then do the best job of selling that we have ever done in our lives, because it is not going to be easy to get the average citizen to accept our plan, and work with us on its development, regardless of how good it is.

Let me give you an illustration of a big city. It had an ambitious program, designed to be put over by 1951. It was needed in that area. It was perhaps the boldest undertaking that area had ever contemplated, and for months upon end leaders of that community got together and developed their program. I'm sorry to say it died aborning because the people refused to accept it, and they refused to accept it because they didn't know very much about it. Those who created the plan were unable to make clear to those who were expected to accept it that their support was needed.

Let us not overlook two very important factors: We must have our master planners and outstanding planning talents to create the plan, but we must likewise bring in that other talent needed that can sell in order to secure the acceptance and action of the people on it. Finally, we get right down to our third peg upon which to hang our efforts of action—to the most important one of all—and that is to line up the men, women, and children to help put the program over. We must have the right number of people and the right kind of people—not too many; not too few.

Some areas—again, if I may use the illustration of Civilian Defense back in the summer of 1941—lined up far too many people, with the result that they did not have enough to do. They quickly lost interest and faded out of the picture. Many areas did not line up enough people, and the big job could not be done. So the right number of people and the right kind of people to line up in order to help put your program over is very important.

Aptitude for the various aspects of community improvement is particularly important. Be sure that people are put at the right tasks. In every community there are hundreds; and in the bigger ones, thousands; and in the still bigger ones there are millions of people ready to work heart and soul on programs of community improvement if they know what is being undertaken and what is expected of them. If you can convince them that it is for their good, and if you can give them a job to do that fits their talents, they will help tremendously. They want to belong to something constructive and worth while and help to put it over and make it successful.

Just look around your community and you'll find many good boys and girls, many fine men and women who have time on their hands, only too eager to help you in your program; but they've got to be sold on what you're trying to do. They've got to be properly selected. You've got to give them a task that fits their talents. You will be amazed, as we were in Civilian Defense, to find that you have right in your own community a tremendous power of men and women who can and will contribute a tremendous lot in their own individual way to help you make your program successful.

With the right plans, along protective lines—along social lines—along economic lines; with the right methods of promotion, of finance, of selling and advertising of your plans; with the right number and kind of people organized into a well-coordinated and powerful local council, a new, vital, and powerful force can be built that can only result in tremendous forward advances in community improvement.

We can have stronger and better individual citizens, stronger and better communities, more powerful in all the ways of life—physical, mental, social, and spiritual; we can have a stronger and more powerful Nation that will ever remain a beacon light of hope to free men the world over. Finally, we shall build together a stronger and better world in which free men can live and give fullest expression to their individual and God-given talents and constantly evolve into a better way of life.

We can only do it by starting at the grass roots, starting with the individual, building up through the community, and then merging the community endeavor into a State, then a national one, and through our continued outstanding contribution as a Nation, help make the world a better place in which to live.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. GEORGE D. AIKEN
OF VERMONT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 21 (legislative day of Monday, March 29), 1948

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. JOHN BANKHEAD, late a Senator from the State of Alabama

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, the name of JOHN BANKHEAD will forever be engraved in the hearts of American farmers. No man ever took to himself the problems of our farm people more than did JOHN BANKHEAD.

He particularly was interested in the farm tenant and share cropper, those farmers who were too poor to own farms and homes of their own, and the legislation in their behalf which bears his name has provided a long step forward in bringing to them independence and happiness.

When I first came to the Senate, Senator BANKHEAD was one of the first men I became acquainted with. He showed a kindly interest in me as a newcomer, and from the time I became a member of the Agriculture Committee until he died he was always helpful and considerate in my behalf. The fact that we belonged to opposite political parties made no difference, for he could not have been more kindly to me had I belonged to his own party.

His overwhelming thoughts were in the interest of the American farm people, and in the passing of Senator JOHN H. BANKHEAD American farmers lost one of their best friends.

Warning From a Great Farm Journal on Reciprocal Trade Agreements

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. LUCAS. I ask consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very timely and discerning editorial from the June 19, 1948, issue of the Prairie Farmer, on the reciprocal trade agreements program.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WARNING

Did Republicans in Congress tip their hand on future intentions by their refusal to come through on a clean-cut extension of the reciprocal trade agreements? If so, people of the Midwest need to do some plain talking to their representatives in Washington before next fall's election.

After the First World War Republicans returning to power passed the outrageous Smoot-Hawley tariff which helped set the stage for the great depression of the thirties. The road back from this economic isolation has been a long one, but slowly people, especially farm people, are beginning to realize that we cannot build a wall against the world we live in.

Isolation has been a dead duck since our experiment with it back in the twenties. There is no safety in burying our head in the sand and pretending that we have no responsibility for the rest of the world. There is no lasting prosperity in burying our talents in the sand, keeping them out of the normal trade channels. Trade is after all the free flow of goods from where they are in surplus to where they are most needed. The faster and freer the flow the more everyone will have of what he needs.

As this country grows older we need world trade more rather than less. As our own store of natural resources goes down hill we need to exchange our skills and efficiency for more raw materials and save our own.

Successful world trade means buying and selling in appproximately equal amounts, not trying to get by with selling only, or giving other countries the money with which to buy our stuff.

In recent years farm organizations have backed the idea of a growing and healthy foreign trade. Farm people in general are accepting this view. If a Congressman can't grow up to the idea, he should be retired.

Work Restrictions Are Being Relaxed in Building Unions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH A. GAMBLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 18 (legislative day of Thursday, June 17), 1948

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me by the House I present for insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL REC-

ORD an article which appeared in the New York Times, Sunday, May 9, 1948, entitled "Work Restrictions Are Being Relaxed in Building Unions."

In this article the Construction Industry Information Committee confirms the improvement that has been brought about in home construction. Increased productivity in the entire building industry was one of the principal objectives of the Joint Committee on Housing. Shortly after organizing, our committee invited both labor and industry to appoint cooperating groups. The effect of such cooperation is seen in the fact that 25 percent more new homes were started in the first 4 months of this year than in the similar period last year and 28 percent in the first 5 months of this year. The building trades labor committee with which we are cooperating is headed by Richard J. Gray, president of the building trades department, American Federation of Labor. I feel that a great deal of the improvement in the rate of home building is due to the helpful spirit shown by organized labor.

WORK RESTRICTIONS ARE BEING RELAXED IN BUILDING UNIONS—INDUSTRY HEADS CITE PROGRESS IN HANDLING PROBLEMS OF JURISDICTIONAL NATURE—POWER TOOLS ACCEPTED—NEW DEVICES HELP TO INCREASE PRODUCTIVITY—MORE WORKERS IN APPRENTICE TRAINING

Important steps to increase productivity in the building industry by bringing labor practices in closer accord with modern building techniques recently have been taken by labor organizations, according to a study by economists of the Construction Industry Information Committee.

Melvin H. Baker, chairman of the committee, reported yesterday that reduction in the number of jurisdictional strikes should result in a more efficient handling of new methods in construction and reduce the number of work stoppages. This improvement should tend to increase the productivity of labor and reduce the cost of building, he pointed out.

Many international unions have moved to eliminate ingrained industrial practices that have retarded technical progress, restrictions on the numbers of apprentices have been greatly relaxed, and cooperative machinery has been set up to settle jurisdictional disputes, Mr. Baker said.

TO USE MODERN DEVICES

Noting changes that have been made, he cited the fact that the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers had stated its approval of the use of power tools and labor-saving devices. The carpenters' union now imposes no restrictions on the use of power tools by its members, provided they are used under conditions safeguarding the worker.

The plumbers' and pipefitters' union has emphasized its consent to the cutting and threading of pipe by its members at the contractor's shop and to their use of power tools for cutting and threading pipe of any size.

The International Brotherhood of Painters permits the use of spray guns where adequate provision is made for protecting the health of workers, and has removed objections to the installation of window sashes which have been glazed in the factory, Mr. Baker added.

He pointed out that labor unions in almost all crafts are cooperating with management in increasing the number of apprentices and in providing for their training, with the result that the number of trainees in the building trades now is three times greater than it was 2 years ago. About 115,000 apprentices now are in training, he said, and efforts to expand the program are continuing.

The survey cited the announcement that the head of the Bricklayers, Masons, and Plasterers International Union had urged all local unions to permit as many new apprentices as are needed to meet future building demands.

MORE WORKERS IN TRAINING

"The results of the apprentice program," Mr. Baker declared, "will be a larger and better trained labor force than was available in former years and a labor force which is more productive because of a lower average age."

Recent developments, the committee reported, should reduce costly delays in construction arising from disputes between various unions as to which should handle various parts of a building job.

A new plan devised by the building and construction trades department of the American Federation of Labor and the employer associations for settling these jurisdictional disputes promises to be acceptable both to management and labor and to have an effectiveness never achieved in earlier attempts to solve the problem, the report explained.

A basic attack on the causes of jurisdictional disputes has been made in the pipe trades where a combination of the crafts of plumbers and steamfitters has been undertaken by the international union, and in some localities is already in effect.

Inflation and Tax Reduction

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT HALE
OF MAINE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me on June 18 to extend my remarks, I wish again to direct attention to the letter from E. W. Axe relative to inflation and tax reduction which appears on page A3204 of the RECORD.

On receipt of this letter I inquired of Mr. Axe whether he would advocate further reduction of taxes even if it meant unbalancing the budget, and whether he thought we should attempt to make any payments on the principal of the national debt. Mr. Axe replied to my inquiries under date of June 15 in a letter which certainly makes provocative reading for any Member of Congress. Whether or not we agree with the views expressed, the handling of our debt is certainly a major problem for the statesmanship of the next generation. We have only begun to reckon with the economic trifling of the New Deal.

I append the text of this letter to these remarks:

E. W. AXE & CO., INC.,
New York, N. Y., June 15, 1948.

Hon. ROBERT HALE,
Member of Congress,
Congress of the United States, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HALE: I must apologize for my delay in replying to the questions contained in your letter of May 15. Questions concerning taxation bring up so many different ideas that it is difficult to write a short letter concerning them.

Your first question was "Would you advocate further reduction of taxes even if by so doing we cannot balance the budget?" I should certainly advocate further reduction in taxes even if that meant an unbalanced budget. It seems to me that the present level of taxes, together with the mass of bureaucratic regulations which are such an impediment to any type of activity connected with the production of goods and services are the main part of the problem and whether the debt is fifty billions higher or fifty billions lower is relatively much less important. This, of course, answers your second question also.

Bad as inflation is, it seems to me that in the long run there can be no choice between a lower value for the dollar on the one hand and state ownership of business on the other. A substantially higher price level would, of course, constitute a tax on the possessors of fixed income and on many other people as well. (I have no doubt that I would be much better off myself on a lower price level than on the high.) But the system of money, credit, prices, and profits can function at any price level, while it cannot function if taxes continue at such a high level. It would seem to me therefore that a moderate amount of inflation is much the lesser of the two evils.

To take this position is of course to abandon the idea of hard money, at least at the present level of the dollar. But it would seem to me better to abandon hard money for a time and to save the rest of the system than to let the whole system go—when hard money will not be any good either. Furthermore, if we continue to move in the direction of state control of business it is highly probable that the dollar will sooner or later be debased greatly and perhaps finally destroyed. The time to have thought about hard money was in 1933. Since that time we have had what is in effect an inconvertible paper currency, so we cannot at this late date say too much about the integrity of the currency.

It has seemed to me that any discussion of balancing the budget has in the past several years been confused by concentrating attention on the items that are hardest to reduce—so as to distract attention from those that could be cut. Even though expenditures are cut only a few billion dollars it would be a step in the right direction. In any plan the points of attack should be the soft spots and not the difficult ones. Undeniably there exists a tremendous amount of waste. Many of the things that the Government Bureaus do are useless and should be eliminated. For example I have always found the work of the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics very useful. In the last 10 or 20 years they have made their reports appreciably more elaborate, but the additional material which they compile and publish is largely useless and in fact makes it more difficult to use what is of value. If the Bureau would return to what it was publishing in 1928, it would be at least as useful to me and the material would be more convenient than it is today. Yet I imagine that the Bureau's expenditures are many times what they were in 1928. There undoubtedly is a lot of publicity material and propaganda and also a tremendous amount of sheer nonsense that could be eliminated to the advantage of everybody with the possible exception of the Government employees who would be discharged and would have to seek a more honest way of making a living.

I have often wondered whether the quickest way of setting things on the right course would not be the drastic one of devaluing the dollar considerably, paying off part of the public debt with the gold, and simultaneously returning to the gold standard.

Faithfully yours,

E. W. AXE,
President, E. W. Axe & Co., Inc.

Soybeans and the Oleomargarine Tax

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. LUCAS. I ask consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the June 1948 issue of the Soybean Digest.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STOOD UP TO BE COUNTED

In a legislative activity such as the margarine repeal battle there are always men who come to the foreground because of their foresight, their zeal, their willingness to assume responsibility for leadership. This battle was no exception.

From the Midwest area, where soybeans reign as the second largest cash grain crop, two men have distinguished themselves as true friends of the soybean producer. In the House of Representatives the amendment to place the Rivers bill on a domestic fats basis was introduced by Congressman RALPH HARVEY, of Indiana. A newcomer to the Halls of Congress, Congressman HARVEY is a farmer, maintains a dairy herd, and grows soybeans. He has been close enough to agriculture during recent years to know the true situation, and to recognize trends. He was not led blindly by dairy interests, but chose to make his own decisions. He is a man to watch during coming sessions.

In the Senate SCOTT LUCAS, of Illinois, distinguished himself as a true friend of the soybean producer. A member of the Finance Committee of the Senate, LUCAS consistently championed the cause of the grower of soybeans who needs the margarine market on a tax-free basis. He was the one man from the Midwest territory who had the courage of his convictions and was willing to stand up and be counted for what he knew was right. He, too, is to be commended.

The soybean producers of the Midwest area will not forget these two men.

Arthur Capper, of Kansas—Harlan Bushfield, of South Dakota

OF
HON. GEORGE D. AIKEN
OF VERMONT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement I have prepared on Senator ARTHUR CAPPER, of Kansas, and Senator HARLAN BUSHFIELD, of South Dakota, who are retiring from the Senate.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, when the new Congress convenes next January two valuable and highly respected members of the Committee on Agriculture will not be with us. I refer to Senator ARTHUR CAPPER, of Kansas, and Senator HARLAN BUSHFIELD, of South Dakota. Both Senators CAPPER and BUSHFIELD have announced that they are not candidates for reelection.

I cannot let this session close without paying a well deserved tribute to both these men.

Senator CAPPER came to the Senate in 1918 and has been a highly influential Member of this body ever since. His work in behalf of farm cooperatives and other legislation which tends to make farm life more attractive has been outstanding. That this work has been appreciated is shown by the fact that the great agricultural State of Kansas has elected him to this body five times in succession.

In January 1947 be became chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture. It has been a pleasure to serve under him in that capacity during the 2 years he has been chairman. His efforts as usual have been toward making farm family life in America better. He has been a lifelong friend of farm people, and I know that farmers everywhere appreciate the work of this great agricultural statesman, and the debt which they owe to him.

Senator HARLAN BUSHFIELD became a member of the Committee on Agriculture 6 years ago. During this period he has been a diligent and earnest worker on agricultural problems. A year ago he made one of the great speeches of recent years in behalf of American agriculture. Last year he was named a member of the subcommittee to study the trends and needs of American agriculture and to develop a long-range program. This work has finally culminated in the passage of a bill providing long-range farm price support, a badly needed piece of legislation. Senator BUSHFIELD has shown great interest in this legislation and has given it his wholehearted support.

It is pleasing to me that this legislation has been adopted by the Congress while he is still a Member of this body.

We shall miss the able and genial Senator from South Dakota very much, but the creditable record on farm legislation which he has established will remain as a permanent monument to his efforts.

I know that I speak the sentiments of all the members of the Committee on Agriculture when I state that we shall miss the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from South Dakota very greatly, and our best wishes and appreciation go with them as they leave their work in this body.

The Housing Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HORACE SEELY-BROWN, JR.
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. SEELY-BROWN. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to say very candidly and honestly that I am disappointed at the inability of the House and the Senate to agree on a comprehensive housing program. Let me further add that I consider it necessary and proper for the Congress to return to Washington immediately following the party conventions in order to tackle this important problem once again. It is my considered opinion that a proper housing program must be initiated immediately.

In order that the record may be completely clear, let me review certain facts with you.

On July 24, 1947, I supported House Concurrent Resolution 104, creating a Joint Committee on Housing, with Instructions to conduct a thorough study and investigation of the entire field of housing.

This committee, composed of seven Members of the House and seven Members of the Senate, conducted open hearings in nearly all the principal cities of the United States. On March 15, 1948, the Honorable RALPH GAMBLE, Republican Congressman from the Twenty-eighth District of New York, chairman of the Joint Committee on Housing, submitted to the Congress a final majority report. This report is a matter of record. It contains certain conclusions and recommendations.

Having studied this report in detail; having studied its recommendations with particular reference to slum clearance and public housing; having observed from personal observation and study the critical housing shortage in the congressional district which I have the honor to represent; I signed on April 1, 1948, discharge petition No. 6.

By doing so, I hoped to use this means to bring out on the floor of the House for debate the much-discussed Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill, with its public housing, slum clearance, urban redevelopment and rural housing provisions. It was my opinion at that time—and still is for that matter—that the matter under discussion was too important a one to be locked up in committee.

I must say in all honesty that I did not then—and I do not now—approve of all of the provisions of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill as it is presently written. I was prepared to support an amendment to that bill providing for the greater sharing of the financial responsibility of public housing and slum clearance by the Federal, State, and local governments. It was my hope that this sharing of responsibility—that this bringing of responsibility more directly to the people in the community—would do much to eliminate the graft so ever present in so many federally sponsored projects.

Parliamentary procedures, unfortunately, were used to prevent this bill from being brought out on the floor for open debate and for a final vote. Instead, a substitute bill—the Wolcott bill, H. R. 6959—which contained aids and incentives to private builders, was presented.

On June 18, 1948, I voted in favor of the Wolcott bill. Many of its provisions met with my approval. However, I must register at this time the fact that I did not approve of the provision in this bill for disposing of so-called Government-owned permanent war housing. The very critical situation in New London, Conn., at College Heights, as regards this matter, convinced me that a more flexible disposition clause would be desirable. However, rather than risk having no housing bill, I did support H. R. 6959. This measure passed the House by a vote of 318 to 90.

Unfortunately, the House and the Senate were unable to agree on either the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill or the Wolcott bill. They did agree on a compromise measure which authorizes the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to provide a secondary market for GI home-loan mortgages up to the amount of $840,000,000 and to permit banks to sell up to 25 percent of their GI mortgages to the Federal National Mortgage Association.

This compromise measure is fine as far as it goes. It provides definite and very real help to the veteran. It is my firm conviction, however, that we must do more than just this if we are to meet properly our responsibility to the people as regards the question of housing.

Let me again go on record as favoring the convening of Congress as soon as possible in order to initiate promptly a proper housing program.

Local Public Health Units, a Vital Need—Review of Public Health Activities of Federal Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. VIRGIL CHAPMAN
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is regrettable that H. R. 5644, to assist the States in the development of local public-health units could not be enacted during this session of Congress. The subcommittee, of which I was a member, reported it to the full committee, and the full committee reported it to the House. I am sorry it is not on the legislative program for passage now. This bill was inspired by the National Congress of Parents and Teachers, one of the greatest organizations for unselfish service to the childhood of this country. The purpose of the bill is through Federal grants-in-aid to the States to provide basic public-health service all over the country. The ultimate result would be a full-time local health unit in every county in the United States. Testimony before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce revealed that only about 10,000,000 Americans are now living in communities that have well-equipped full-time health units; that 40,000,000 other people have practically no public-health service available, and that the remaining 90,000,000 citizens have the benefit of very inadequate public-health service. While much progress has been made in the prevention of disease and life expectancy has greatly increased since the turn of the century, much remains undone that ought to be done in the field of public-health service.

These local health units would not undertake to cure the sick or to take the place of the physician, but they would perform important service in the prevention of disease, and in doing the things for the public that properly belong in the field of public-health service. They would gather information that would help the physicians in determining the general health needs of the county. In the field of communicable diseases and their prevention, the health center is practically a necessity. Its public-relations activities in informing the general public about health needs and conducting local clinics in cooperation with the schools is of incalculable public benefit. This program has the approval of the spokesman for the American Medical Association, Dr. James R. Miller, who filed an informative statement before the committee. It was also endorsed by Dr. Chester D. Swope, of Washington, D. C., representing the American Osteopathic Association. The bill was drafted so as to operate according to the generally accepted system of Federal aid for public-health purposes so that it would be administered according to a State plan and the money would be spent at the local level. Such local needs as supervising food establishments, assuring a pure water supply, bringing technical knowledge to the problems of sanitation and health, vaccination and quarantine enforcement, would be well taken care of under this plan. Localities that have enjoyed the benefits of full-time local health units, staffed by competent personnel and equipped for useful health work, have recognized the importance of the public-health units and have contributed local funds for public-health purposes. It is shocking to learn how many counties in the United States have either no public-health service or are very inadequately equipped to deal with such problems.

The experience of the recent World War, when hundreds of thousands of young men were rejected because of physical disqualification, was an impressive object lesson of the seriousness of this problem. Every citizen of the country ought to have such service available in the locality of his residence. We have a great shortage of physicians. Many counties in the United States are without a doctor. Not only would these local public-health units be of inestimable benefit to such communities, but they would also be of great help to doctors in the practice of their profession. The enactment of this bill would be very helpful in the prevention of illness and the improvement of the health of the people. It would not take the place of medical care, but would be a source of help to every doctor in every rural county in America. It is my earnest hope that when the next Congress convenes in January, this bill, sponsored originally by the Congress of Parents and Teachers, and supported generally by members of the medical profession and all who are conversant with public-health needs, will be near the top of the list for consideration and passage. Such outstanding Kentuckians as Dr. P. E. Blackerby, State health commissioner, and Dr. C. C. Howard, of Glasgow, have written to me strong endorsements of this measure.

The enactment of this bill would be another step in the great public-health program that has been undertaken by the Congress during recent years. Since I have been a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which has jurisdiction of all legislation pertaining to public health, we have reported and sponsored to passage a number of important health measures. One of the most constructive was enacted during the closing days of the Seventy-ninth Congress, and became a law August 13, 1946. It is the Hospital Construction Act providing for Federal aid in the establishment of hospitals in communities throughout the land in which there is a crying need for hospital facilities. I took an active interest in the consideration and enactment of this law, as I have in all other public-health measures that have come before my committee, and it has been gratifying to observe in the brief period of 2 years how many local communities have found incentive in the law we passed to raise local funds for the construction of hospitals that are badly needed. On July 28, 1946, when I was asked by the chairman of the Public Health Subcommittee, at that time the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE], to close the debate in the House on the hospital bill, I said:

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Iowa is right in saying that the people in these small towns and rural communities are neighborly and generous, and are actuated by humanitarian impulses. But the fact remains that they are unable to provide these hospitals for themselves. As the distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts said 40 percent of the more than 3,000 counties in the United States have no hospital facilities at all. We know that the scarcity of physicians is in almost direct ratio to the scarcity of hospital beds. For example, up to the time of the World War, when so many of our doctors answered the call to the colors and put on the uniform of the Army and the Navy, in communities having 4.6 hospital beds per 1,000 population, there was one doctor for every 600 people. In communities—and there are many of them—where there was less than one hospital bed per 1,000 population there was one doctor for every 1,350 people.

Infant mortality, because of medical progress and sanitary improvement, has been reduced in this country until there are about 40 deaths to every 1,000 births, but in communities that do not have adequate hospitals the infant mortality rate is appalling. We must not permit this condition to continue anywhere in the United States.

There are three kinds of hospitals: Proprietary, which are privately owned and operated for profit; public, which are supported at public expense; and the voluntary, nonprofit hospitals, which include most of the hospitals operated by churches of various denominations, fraternal organizations, and local nonprofit hospital associations, in which classification probably the major portion of hospitals belong. This bill would grant aid to the public hospitals and to all of these nonprofit voluntary hospitals, the ones that serve most of our country. For rural communities unable to support a hospital this bill makes provision for grants-in-aid for the establishment of local health centers, which would be of incalculable benefit to millions of our fellow citizens "far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife."

The old-fashioned country doctor, who visited alike the hovels of the poor and the mansions of the rich, ministered to all classes and conditions of society, and alleviated the pains of suffering humanity, with or without hope of remuneration, was more than a great personality. He was a great and beloved American institution. Now, with rare exceptions, he has become a part of the history and folklore of America, and is a tender memory of this generation of American people. Yes, Mr. Speaker, but the doctor of the future is going to practice his profession where he has laboratory and hospital facilities, and can make the best of modern equipment and well-trained nurses available for the treatment of his patients.

Many great hospitals have been endowed by the possessors of large personal fortunes, but our present and prospective economic system and tax structure indicate that there will be fewer such fortunes in the future than in the past. This measure would induce endowments, and would be an incentive to communities to wage subscription campaigns and issue bonds for 66⅔ percent of the hospital cost in order to make available the 33⅓-percent Federal grant. It is expressly and explicitly written in this bill that there shall be no Federal control when this grant is made to a local organization to build a hospital. That local hospital organization will have control of that hospital and will operate it without Federal supervision or Federal dictation. It is provided that if within a period of 20 years the hospital should pass into the hands of an agency not authorized to accept this grant, such as a hospital company operating for profit, a refund would have to be made to the Government of the money that had been advanced for the construction of the hospital.

In passing this bill we are answering the call of humanity.

Years ago in France a referendum was held to determine which was the greatest name in French history. The people of France in that referendum did not select the name of one of the literary geniuses whose names illumine the pages of French literature. They did not go into the field of French statesmanship. They did not even select that renowned soldier "who born no king made monarchs draw his car," whose stakes were empires, whose dice were human bones, the first Napoleon. Rather, by a majority of millions the people of the French Republic selected as the greatest name in the annals of France the name of the man of science, the man who labored through long hours, day and night, in the laboratories, evolving formulas, not to kill people but to save lives, the father of modern medicine, Louis Pasteur.

Mr. Speaker, let us find our just reward in serving humanity, in answering suffering humanity's crying need. Let us pass this bill by the necessary two-thirds majority, to relieve suffering and save lives.

The benefits of that law are already being realized in many counties in my own State of Kentucky, as they are in all sections of the United States.

CANCER INSTITUTE

Our committee conducted hearings, reported and passed the National Cancer Institute Act of August 5, 1937. Cancer, this insidious killer, has taken its toll of millions of lives through the centuries, and official statistics show that the death rate from cancer is actually increasing; has risen recently from 171,000 in 1944 to 182,000 in 1946. Progress has been made by the National Cancer Institute of the United States Public Health Service, as it has been also by privately endowed foundations that have performed great service in cancer research, but cancer remains in second place among the causes of death today.

Representatives of the National Advisory Cancer Council and other agencies that are working in this field and are trying to learn something about the causes and cure of this deadly disease have told us that research is badly needed and that we have annually as much money for cancer research as there are qualified experts to use that money properly and effectively. The Congress has made moderate appropriations for the National Cancer Institute, and public subscriptions to private institutions have been sufficient from year to year to carry on this work. We cannot expect very rapid progress, and cannot hope to blot out in a few years a disease that has been killing people for centuries. Medical authorities tell us that nearly one-half of all cancers affect the internal organs, and that the victims in most such cases are near death before the symptoms are discovered. It is then too late to have much hope of cure. The National Cancer Institute has accomplished much during the decade of its activities in this almost unexplored field. Private agencies, great foundations, capable physicians, and the United States Public Health Service, working together can continue to strive to learn more about this terrible scourge and to improve diagnostic methods which will result in discovering cancerous conditions before it is too late to save lives, and when there is still a hope of permanent arrest or cure.

INSTITUTE OF MENTAL HEALTH

In 1946 we took up in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce a bill to provide for research into psychiatric disorders, and to aid in developing more effective methods of prevention, diagnosis, and treatment of mental and nervous diseases. Organized society has spent countless millions of dollars on its mentally ill people without much knowledge of the disease with which they have been afflicted through the ages. The various American States have established hospitals or asylums, as they have often been called, and have called people "crazy" and practically incarcerated them in those institutions with little, and sometimes with no knowledge of the disorders that needed treatment. There are comparatively few trained and qualified psychiatrists in the medical profession. Even a majority of those generally referred to as psychiatrists are in reality little more than custodial physicians.

I have long had hope that proper study by capable physicians with an aptitude for psychiatry would lead to greater knowledge of the causes of mental disorders, and their diagnosis and proper treatment. Having great hope for the success of this undertaking, I naturally took deep interest in the study and enactment of this bill which became a law July 3, 1946. Incidentally, I learned during the hearing that my own State of Kentucky, which was one of the first States in the Union to establish an institution for the treatment of mental disorders, made the lowest per capita expenditure of any State in the Union for the treatment of its mentally ill citizens. The functions of this "National Mental Health Act" are research, investigation, experiment, and demonstration relating to the cause, diagnosis, and treatment of nervous disorders. The Federal Government affords assistance to research activities by other agencies, public and private, and aids in the training of doctors through grants-in-aid to universities, hospitals, laboratories, and other agencies. There is a comparatively small number of highly qualified psychiatrists in this country, but there is a vital need for many more. Through the operation of this law, the Federal Government will have a hand in training others who will be equipped to perform great service to humanity in the battle for the prevention, diagnosis, and cure of mental disorders.

NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF DENTAL RESEARCH

During the present Congress two very important bills in the interest of the public health were reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and have passed both Houses. One of those bills was sponsored by the dental profession of the United States for the improvement of the dental health of the people generally. The American Dental Association gave it united support. It provides for research, investigation, experiments, and studies into the cause, diagnosis, and methods of treatment of dental diseases. We learned that tooth decay afflicts approximately 90 percent of the children in this country by the time they enter school, and that by the time they finish high school, if they do, most of them have lost permanent teeth. From that time on through life pyorrhea and kindred diseases afflict nearly all of the population of the United States. Malocclusion is found among people of all ages and the testimony before our committee showed that 25 percent to 40 percent of the people suffer from that trouble. Frequently diseases of the teeth and gums, either cause or contribute to painful and deadly diseases.

This new activity in the Public Health Service is expected to contribute greatly to research that will lead to prevention of much of these diseases that bring so much discomfort and suffering to the human race. Its work will be according to a similar pattern to that of the National Cancer Institute and the Mental Health Institute, and will conduct not only basic and applied research but also will make grants-in-aid to private and and public institutions that are striving for more knowledge and skill that will aid in the prevention and cure of disease that throughout the years has been generally and casually accepted as one of the afflictions that flesh is heir to.

NATIONAL HEART INSTITUTE

We had an interesting and informative hearing this year on heart disease. Heart disease is so common that it has been generally accepted as something that a large proportion of human beings must suffer. We were told at the hearing that one out of every three people now alive is destined to die of heart disease unless something is done to repel the constant attack of the No. 1 destroyer of the human race. Five hundred and eighty-seven thousand deaths in the United States were chargeable directly to heart disease in 1945. It is feared that diseases of the heart and circulatory system will exact an even higher toll as the average age of people increases, largely due to other advances which medical science and public-health measures have made. The reason for that is that cardiovascular diseases, while killing people of all ages except infants, concentrate on killing people in the middle- and old-age groups. We had witnesses from the American Heart Association, the National Research Council, the American Medical Association, the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Columbia University, Dr. Leonard Scheele, Surgeon General of the United States, and many others qualified to speak, who urged impressively that we pass this bill to create the National Heart Institute in the Public Health Service. These witnesses emphasized that the most necessary thing is research into causes, treatment, and methods of prevention. We learned that research facilities are pitifully inadequate. There are less than 200 hospital beds in the United States that have been set aside for clinical research in heart and circulatory diseases. Only about 900 hospital beds in the United States are reserved for convalescent cardiac patients, and of these 344 are in New York State alone, all of the remainder being in only 7 other States. Only 199 physicians in the United States limit their practice to heart disease, and only 439 others devote special study to cardiology. The hearing impressed upon us that there is a desperate need for trained doctors and technicians to engage in research and to use the knowledge thus gained in striving to solve the problem of heart-disease mortality. This institute will work along lines comparable to the functioning of the cancer, mental-health, and dental institutes. The Government will use public and private agencies, and will provide research fellowships and training for those who give promise of performing great and much-needed service in this field in which research and knowledge are necessary, if we hope to stem the tide of death being caused annually by heart disease.

In 1938 I served as chairman of a subcommittee that conducted a hearing on venereal diseases. The revelations of the prevalence of these diseases were shocking enough to stir any committee to action. We reported and secured enactment of the Venereal Disease Control Act of 1938. Definite and splendid results have been accomplished during the intervening decade. The death rate of syphilis has diminished from 16.2 to 9.3 per 100,000 population. The decrease of the infant mortality rate from seventy-three hundredths to twenty-five hundredths during that period is, I believe, largely attributable to the venereal-disease-control program. Attack on diseases that cause blindness, insanity, and death, diseases which have so weakened America's human resources as to impair seriously the strength of our national defense. More recently this service has expanded and improved by the establishment of rapid-treatment centers, jointly operated by State and Federal health authorities. State and local health departments throughout the land are matching Federal funds in the operation of out-patient clinics. Tangible results have been accomplished. Progress is being made every day in the conquest of these diseases whose ravages have left an indelible mark on the human race for centuries.

I shall not go into much further discussion of this work of the committee of which I long have been a member. I could recite the valiant efforts being made to control and eventually to eradicate tuberculosis. That also is a great program worthy of the support of Congress and the people we represent. The authorities estimate that there are approximately 500,000 cases of tuberculosis in the United States, only about half of which have been diagnosed, and that the annual death rate from that terrible plague is 50,000. The Public Health Service is undertaking to see that every adult in America is given X-ray examination during the next 5 years. Six million are being X-rayed this year. Experimentation with the BCG vaccine has practically established its efficacy as a preventive agent. This battle must be waged to completion.

The whole public-health program is sound, worth while, and of indescribable benefit to society. By carrying on these activities in cooperation with the State and local governments, the United States is not only recognizing its obligation to its citizens, from whom all its power is derived, but these laudable and beneficent Federal activities constitute the surest and most impregnable defense against the threatening advances of the undesirable ideology commonly called socialized medicine, which we in America do not want.

Overtime on Overtime

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. MURRAY
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter signed by William R. McComb, Administrator, Wage and Hour and Public Contracts Division, United States Department of Labor, appearing in the Washington Post of June 17, 1948, on the subject Overtime on Overtime. I also ask that there be printed with Mr. McComb's letter the comments of the Washington Post which follow the letter. The letter was written in answer to an editorial appearing in the Washington Post of June 14 which commented on a recent decision of the Supreme Court affecting the longshore industry.

There being no objection, the letter and comments were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OVERTIME ON OVERTIME

Your June 14 editorial, Overtime on Overtime, has omitted reference to a most important fact. The Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division in November 1940 issued an interpretative bulletin in which he said that extra compensation for hours worked outside the normal or regular working hours or for work on Sundays and holidays may be credited against the overtime pay required by the Fair Labor Standards Act. Later the same opinion was expressed regarding extra compensation for work on Saturdays.

In its decision the Supreme Court overruled the Administrator's opinion regarding extra compensation for Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays and for work outside of normal or regular working hours; however, and this is a point I want to emphasize, employers who relied upon the Administrator's opinion are protected by the Portal Act from liability for the past.

With respect to night work in the stevedoring industry, the Court ruled that these hours were not outside the normal or regular working hours and that the higher rates were simply the regular rates for undesirable hours. A former Administrator told the stevedoring industry this same thing as long ago as 1943, and the industry elected to ignore his opinion. My predecessors and I have felt it to be our duty to give employers our best judgment regarding the requirements of the act and to advise them to change practices which did not satisfy the statute. Opinions so expressed usually have been upheld by the courts. In this particular instance the stevedoring industry certainly had ample and timely warning.

Various estimates have been made of the potential liabilities. Most of them are completely fantastic. The Supreme Court commented on these estimates on page 6 of its decision and in footnote 7 pointed out "the basis for such figures does not appear." Even the $43,000,000 mentioned in your editorial as the potential liability of one firm touches the realm of fantasy.

This industry has the good faith defense available as to Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays; it possibly may be relieved of the double damages liability by section 11 of the Portal Act; longshoremen frequently work for more than one employer in a single week without working more than 40 hours for any one of them; suits not already filed will be subject to a 2-year period of limitation. When all of these considerations are weighed in the final determination of the suits, I am confident the ultimate recovery will be only a small fraction of the vast amounts which have been mentioned.

I agree completely that legislative action to define the regular rate of pay is needed. I have said so to the Congress in my last annual report and have testified to this effect before subcommittees of both the House and Senate within the past few months.

WILLIAM R. MCCOMB,
Administrator, Wage and Hour Public Contracts Division, Department of Labor.

WASHINGTON.

The Washington Post was aware of these defenses to payment of damages but space did not permit of comment on this question at the time. Moreover, Mr. McComb's statement indicates that in case of the stevedoring industry damage claims may be quite large, for the industry had been told by a former Administrator that, in his opinion, higher rates for night work were not outside regular working hours. Consequently the stevedoring industry and any other industry similarly advised having the same type of wage schedules will be deprived of the good-faith defense as regards night work. And the Administrator himself is by no means sure that the stevedoring industry will escape double-damage liability under the Portal Act. Meantime, a west coast longshoremen's union is preparing to file an additional 2,000 suits for back pay on the basis of the Supreme Court decision.

Outlook for GI Home Loans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following talk by T. B. King, director, Loan

Guaranty Service, in connection with panel discussion on mortgage terms and interest rates at the Institute of Housing Studies, New York, June 3, 1948:

It is a pleasure to take part in this afternoon's panel discussion. As my contribution, I have elected to discuss the outlook for 4-percent GI home loans in the home-finance picture.

As you gentlemen all know, the GI loan has played a major role in mortgage finance during the postwar period. Today almost 1,200,000 veterans and their families are living in homes financed with a GI loan.

The importance of VA guaranteed and insured loans in the mortgage portfolios of private lending institutions is clearly seen in the proportion of total mortgage recordings which GI loans have represented. During many of the months of 1946 and 1947, about one out of every four small-home mortgages recorded in the United States was a GI loan. In terms of dollar amount, the ratio has been even higher, accounting for 25 to 35 percent during much of the 1946-47 period.

As a result of this high level of GI lending, most of which has been telescoped into a period of two short years, the composition of outstanding small-home mortgage debt has been altered substantially. We estimate that currently almost 20 percent of the total mortgage debt outstanding on the Nation's small homes carry VA guaranty or insurance.

The loan-guaranty program has thus furnished an interesting chapter to the history of home finance. I am convinced, moreover, that the GI loan has provided the greatest single governmental aid toward the solution of the veteran's housing problem. And, although I am naturally open to the charge of being prejudiced, I am also convinced that this aid has been accomplished with a minimum of administrative delay and Government expense, both present and potential.

Some observers, instead of regarding the tremendous volume of GI loans as a desirable accomplishment, have expressed the view that GI loans, at least a good share of them, are unsound. These critics have stressed the high percentage of loan amount to value as an unwholesome characteristic of GI loans. They have also said that GI loans have not been subject to strict underwriting control, that too much responsibility in judging loan quality has been left in the hands of local lending institutions.

Let me cite some of the reasons why I do not agree with these observers.

One of the strongest proofs of the soundness of GI loans is the superlative manner in which these loans are being repaid by our former GI's. Out of the total of home loans reported closed by lenders to date, only about 31,000 have been reported in default, and 16,000 of these defaults, or 53 percent, have been cured by proper servicing. Currently, only about one GI loan in a hundred is experiencing default trouble. The success of the other 99 veteran mortagors reflects the integrity and responsibility of our veterans, and also attests to the sound credit standards by which lending institutions have guided themselves.

Another healthy characteristic of GI loans is the concentration of the homes which they finance in the moderately priced home field. Although the average price of the new homes bought with the GI loans has been rising apace with mounting construction costs, the fact remains that the bulk of the homes financed under the GI bill are in the low and medium-priced field in terms of today's market. For example, even during the recent 9-month period May 1947 through January 1948, the average purchase price of all homes bought under the GI bill was $7,500. Well over 40 percent of these homes were purchased at prices below $7,000. And it must be remembered that these figures are national averages which reflect the influence of the highest cost urban areas.

This concentration of GI homes in moderate-price brackets enhances the security strength of GI-loan portfolios in the event that real-estate values decline. In the past the market for low- and medium-priced homes has been least affected by falling realty prices.

Also remember that homes which qualify for GI loans must meet the test of reasonable value. Admittedly the reasonable value restraint is not a rigid price control. But it must also be admitted that, at a time when home prices are generally being set upon the basis of what the traffic will bear, the GI loan is unique in that it alone imposes a restraint upon the home price which the veteran may be required to pay.

I want to emphasize one other aspect of GI home loans about which there is wide misunderstanding. Too often I hear loose statements which imply that all, or at least the bulk, of GI loans, are 100 percent loans above which the veteran has no equity interest. These statements are just not true. In several recent months for which data are available, over 70 percent of the veterans who made first mortgage loans invested equity money of their own. These cash payments averaged 16 percent of purchase price. The will to protect those savings by avoiding default is another element adding to the strength of GI loan portfolios.

These are some of the factors on which I base my belief in the healthy outlook for the GI loans which lenders have originated during the past several years. Barring the onset of a severe economic depression, which would threaten the most gilt-edged investments, I am confident that GI loans will continue to prove their soundness.

Turning now to the problem facing those veterans who hope to obtain GI loans during the coming months, I must say that the outlook at the present moment is not so promising.

The volume of GI home loans has been declining steadily since last September. Home-loan applications in April 1948 numbered slightly less than 29,000. This is 45 percent below April a year ago. The steady decline in GI home loans is especially significant when it is contrasted with the fact that home-building activity and mortgage recordings have not experienced a similar decline, but are running well above last year's levels.

Undoubtedly, one of the primary causes for this decline is the disparity between rising home prices and the average veteran family's ability to pay for housing. According to our best estimates the average veteran family can afford a home priced in the neighborhood of $5,000 to $6,000. And yet, the prices of new homes which veterans are buying with GI loans are now averaging over $9,000. It is not difficult to see that the price problem is barring the door to home ownership for more and more veteran families.

The other cause for the decline is of course the growing unattractiveness to lenders of mortgage investments at the 4-percent maximum interest rate permissible under the GI bill. There is no need for me to review the developments which have contributed to this situation, such as the elimination of the RFC secondary market for GI loans on June 30, 1947, the upward movement in bond yields which took place during the latter half of 1947, and the progressive saturation of many lender portfolios with 4-percent loans. These influences have made it increasingly difficult for veterans to obtain the favorable financing terms of GI 4-percent loans.

Even in the face of these developments threatening the 4-percent loan, I must confess that I had hoped that the 4-percent GI loan could be maintained. This hope was based upon several factors. One was the stabilization of bond yields which took place early in 1948. As a matter of fact, in April the yields on high-grade corporate bonds fell back almost to the level prevailing in November 1947, although they are still above the yields of the summer of 1947. Another factor was the possibility that the opportunity to make conventional loans will become progressively more restricted. Conventional loans require the borrower to pay higher interest rates and to be able to supply a large equity payment. To the extent that the number of prospective home buyers able to meet these stiffer requirements is diminishing, there would be greater incentive for lenders to make GI loans to veterans.

Let me emphasize, however, that this hope of maintaining the 4-percent GI loan was promised upon the assumption that there would be no increase in the maximum interest rates on home loans insured under other Government programs. It now appears, however, that this assumption is no longer valid. Whether or not FHA's title VI is extended with a higher interest rate, the recent discontinuance of stabilized cost as a basis for FHA cost estimates under title II indicates that the 4½ percent interest rate applicable under title II will tend more and more to become established as the competitive minimum for Government guaranty and insurance programs. The recent pick-up in applications under section 203 reflects this trend. Lenders will not be inclined to make 4-percent loans which are 50-percent guaranteed when they have equal opportunity to make 4½ percent loans which are 100 percent insured by the Federal Government and which are also supported by a Government secondary market. This will mean that veterans who need mortgage loans will have to pay 5 percent on FHA loans (4½ percent plus the one-half of 1 percent insurance premium), or perhaps even higher on conventional loans. This will raise the ultimate cost of home ownership to veterans by 10 percent and higher.

These developments in their practical effect mean that for the first time since 1944, when the Servicemen's Readjustment Act became law, veterans will no longer have an advantage over nonveterans in their ability to obtain home-financing credit on favorable terms.

The implications of this situation for 4-percent home financing for veterans are clear. If the status quo is maintained, the supply of 4-percent money will rapidly approach the vanishing point.

One of the possible solutions, which is contemplated in various bills now before Congress, would involve the continuance of the GI bill in its present form, but with a permissive interest rate increase to 4½ percent. Such a permissive amendment to the GI bill would present the choice of maintaining the 4-percent ceiling for a handful of veterans fortunate enough to find a loan at that rate or making GI loans generally available once more by hiking the rate to 4½ percent. While an amendment along these lines would raise financing costs to the veteran to 4½ percent, he would still benefit by a rate lower than the 5-percent rate which an FHA or a conventional loan would cost him. Moreover, there are other advantages of a GI loan which would continue to benefit the veteran, such as the 4-percent gratuity payment, the privilege of prepayment without penalty, and the scaling down of other penalties and closing costs to the veteran which present regulations require.

Let me conclude by saying that the outlook for the continued availability of low-cost mortgage loans to veterans depends upon the action of Congress. Without some new form of legislation, it appears very probable that veterans will be forced to pay interest rates of 5 percent or higher for their home-financing loans in the months to come.

The People Need Steel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by me entitled "The People Need Steel."

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PEOPLE NEED STEEL

(By JAMES E. MURRAY, Senator from Montana)

Mr. President, the continuing shortage of steel is the greatest single threat to a stable domestic economy in the United States and to the success of our foreign recovery program. Witnesses have come to Washington from all parts of the country complaining about the effect of this steel shortage on independent and small businesses, steel fabricators, construction, oil- and gas-well development, and automobile and farm-machinery production.

My own State of Montana is seriously affected. Mr. J. N. Thelen, president of the Montana Stripper Well Producers' Association of Great Falls, so testified before us in hearings on steel supply and distribution held by the Senate Small Business Committee the end of May. Mr. Thelen represents several hundred independent Montana oilmen, each adding to our total supply of preciously needed oil by stripping wells that still have oil in them. He pointed out that the abandonment of these wells is a loss of oil for all time, that such wells are being abandoned at an alarming rate because of the steel shortage which makes casing so scarce and costly that it is pulled out to be used elsewhere, and that new wells are not being developed as they should be because of lack of steel. When it is known that there are some 300,000 stripper wells producing about one-fifth of all oil in the United States, what Mr. Thelen is referring to as determining the life or death of much of Montana's oil industry becomes a matter of serious national concern as well.

This condition of great demand for steel and short supply arose at the close of the war, when the floodgates of pent-up demand for goods again opened and deluged American business with customers' orders. Anticipating it, as the then chairman of the Senate Small Business Committee, I called a series of conferences in Washington with the head of the War Production Board, Julius Krug. My intention was to devise a workable plan whereby the small and independent businesses of this country would be assured of a fair share and continuing flow of steel when the floods of orders swept over the land. Promises were made, and a method of dealing with distress cases was worked out that did much to accomplish my purpose.

But, Mr. President, still the steel shortage continued while business expanded, causing ever-increasing hardship to businessmen, farmers, workers, and consumers.

Not content with taking testimony in Washington alone, the Senate Small Business Committee has gone out into the States where the people could lay their problems directly before us. During the past 2 months we have conducted hearings of both our steel and oil subcommittees, in an area covering 10 States remote from Washington. In city after city, the story has unfolded of people being unable to get steel products, and of businessmen failing or cutting down their production and employment for lack of this basic raw material—steel. The distribution of steel to small producers is even worse than it was a year ago. This is an indisputable fact established by the hearings. An Associated Press dispatch from Detroit on June 10 carries the disturbing news that 200,000 workers in the General Motors plants were being laid off for a period of 10 days for lack of steel to make into automobiles and trucks, still another and recent proof of the widespread effects of the long-continued steel shortage.

The chairman of the committee, Senator KENNETH WHERRY, was so alarmed at the disclosures made before the committee that he issued a statement declaring, "Since controls on steel were lifted in the fall of 1945, distribution of steel to these areas has been shrinking * * * Where is the steel going? It must be going in larger quantities to larger users of steel. * * * It boils down to the simple facts of whether the steel industry wants a free, competitive economy—in which all segments may have a chance for survival—or whether you want a regimented economy. * * * Quite frankly, unless industry does take on the responsibility—Congress will legislate to make that responsibility mandatory. I have very little doubt of that, as distasteful as the idea of Government controls of industry is to most of us."

Mr. President, when we stop to think we all appreciate that steel is the basic raw material of our economy today. Some 95 percent of our manufacturing depends on steel. No new mining operation can start without steel; no mines or oil wells can be opened or continue without new steel tools and equipment coming in regularly. Much of farming is mechanized and depends on steel farm implements. Oil drilling is at a standstill in many localities today for lack of steel casing. Water, gas, and sewage systems all need large quantities of steel. It's surprising how much steel is required to build even the smallest house, and a factory or store building has a steel skeleton. Hard roads and bridges are reenforced with steel. Our whole transportation system is made of steel. We could not communicate with each other by telephone without steel. No housewife could work in her kitchen today without using essential equipment made of steel.

It is because this is an "age of steel" that the economic welfare of our people depends on an ample supply of steel. This shortage has gone on now for more than two peacetime years, and indications are that it will continue for some years more. In fact, as amply shown in the testimony before the Senate Small Business Committee, the shortages are growing worse, the costly gray market is growing bigger, and independent businessmen who are located far from steel-producing centers find their sources of supply closing. Yet when the chairman of the committee, Senator WHERRY, asked this question of Mr. David F. Austin, vice president of the United States Steel Corp., "Then you have no program as a group (for insuring steel to small business)?" this representative of the steel producers replied, "As an industry, I have not."

So the prospect of any early change in conditions is slight, and the chances are that small business will continue to suffer shortages of steel and the American people will be compelled to go without needed steel products.

The steel shortage affects my own State of Montana in a cruel way, for with the close of the war there was a long-planned program of industrial expansion and renovation. A representative of the Governor of our neighboring State of North Dakota pointed out in the recent hearings that lack of steel was responsible in considerable part for the reduction in the size of our cattle herds, for cattlemen and farmers cannot get enough steel pipe, well equipment, and construction steel for silos and barns. I have already referred to the testimony of Mr. J. N. Thelen, who told the committee that steel pipe for oil and gas wells and transportation was impossible to get, except at such exorbitant gray-market prices that it was unprofitable to open new wells or continue operation of low-producing wells in our State. Thus, the promising prospects of our industrial future are blighted at the start by lack of one thing—steel. How can we have enough steel for all our needs? The answer is not simple, but there is a satisfactory answer. It has been found in the long-continued studies which we have made in the Senate Small Business Committee. I have just reported my view of these studies and recommendations in a published Senate document, Steel Supply and Distribution Problems, which is now available for everyone interested to read.

The answer to the problem includes action along the following lines: An impartial body, probably the President's Council of Economic Advisers, set up under the Full Employment Act of 1946, of which I had the honor to be the author, should ascertain the amount of steel production required to meet the needs of our economy. This would then become the minimum goal at which private business could reasonably direct its efforts.

If the leaders in the steel industry are too timid, or have too little faith in our future to risk such investment in plant capacity, then there are smaller independent steel companies which are anxious to grow. They do not lack for courage or business optimism, but they are throttled by the monopoly power of the steel giants. They cannot get capital from the Wall Street financial partners of these steel monopolists. The RFC was established in part to make sure that this country would not lack for basic materials such as steel because enterprising businessmen were denied access to capital markets. Now, its facilities should be made available under such conditions as will insure increased expansion and guarantee a fair return to the Government. The arrangements should provide for the widest possible participation of local bankers in any loans made, and thus provide for a sufficient expansion of production which will result in an adequate steel supply and increased competition in this tightly organized industry so that the American people can get the benefits of lower competitive pricing.

For us in the West such a program offers the only hope of an adequate supply of steel and the development of a western steel industry which will use our great bodies of ores, coal, potential hydroelectric power, and hold our young people at home by providing them with steady, well-paying jobs.

Mr. President, one of the most serious failures of the Republican-controlled Congress which has just ended is the failure to meet this problem of safeguarding our economy by providing a program for an adequate expansion of steel production. As a result of this failure, thousands of businessmen will be forced out of business during the year, and the American people will come more and more to realize that they can't always depend on these large combinations that exercise arbitrary control over our basic industries.

All this goes to show that we must have men in the Congress with the courage and the stamina to grapple with this problem and provide a program along the lines I have suggested. This is the road to a balanced economy and true prosperity.

Revolving Fund for Purchase of Natural Fibers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR WINSTEAD
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 18 (legislative day of Thursday, June 17), 1948

Mr. WINSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I consider S. 2376, a bill to provide a revolving fund for the purchase of agricutural commodities and raw materials, to be processed in occupied areas and sold, one of the soundest pieces of legislation that has come before this Congress for the purpose of helping to rehabilitate foreign countries.

This measure does not constitute a gift and the American taxpayer should not lose one single dime in the enactment of it. Instead, this should save millions of dollars on occupation cost alone. It has been estimated that had this act passed 2 years ago that $300,000,000 in operating costs would have been saved in Japan alone. It is expected that a substantial profit will be realized from proceeds of sales beyond what amount will be needed to repay the fund.

In this program we not only provide employment, which lessens the occupation cost, but we also provide a market for our surplus fibers produced in this country, such as cotton, wool, mohair, and flax fibers.

As a member of the House Committee on Armed Services, which committee handled this measure, I have been pleased to find that the membership in both the subcommittee and full committee voted unanimously to report this bill. There was no opposition in the Senate and there should be none here. The House should, and I believe it will, give full and unanimous support to this measure.

Veterans' Homestead Housing Bill, H. R. 4488

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, in all of our discussions on the question of housing legislation, there is one fundamental fact which too many of us overlook. We tend to forget the fact that the housing problem is primarily a veterans' housing problem. We are forgetting the pledges we made to our demobilized veterans that we would do something about their housing problem. The suffering caused by the present housing shortage is not equally distributed—our former GI's are bearing the brunt of it.

There is ample evidence that the average veteran family is already priced far out of the market for new homes. The high rate of home-building is an excellent achievement, but let us not delude ourselves that these homes are going to our veteran constituents. They simply cannot afford them.

The general housing legislation we have considered will not improve this situation. The general housing bill will merely continue a status quo in which the veteran has no real preference.

It is time for us to live up to our pledges and to pass a housing bill which will really help our veterans. I am convinced that H. R. 4488, the Veterans' Homestead Act of 1948, is that bill. The veterans' homestead bill has the sponsorship of the American Legion and was reported out unanimously by the Committee on Veterans' Affairs. It is the only legislation I know of which will really give the veteran a break in the housing market.

It will give them homes at much lower cost. Through FWA grants and other features, the bill will reduce housing costs to veterans by as much as 20 percent. Unlike the general housing bill, which would give aid to the bottom 10 percent of our income groups through public housing, and to the top 10 percent through its other provisions, the veterans' homestead bill is aimed squarely at the home-seeking veterans in the middle 80 percent.

It will give veterans the tools to master their housing problem through their own initiative. Through homestead associations chartered by the Veterans' Administration, veterans can go ahead in their own communities and build their homes without having to rely on the efforts of others.

It assures veterans of the necessary financing. Through loans from the Veterans' Administration and through provisions which assure the availability of an adequate supply of capital for GI loans, home-seeking veterans can be certain of low-cost financing.

It will solve the rental-housing problem which is plaguing our veterans in urban centers. Homestead associations can begin immediately to build apartment houses which will feature greatly reduced monthly rentals.

It provides the very necessary aid to GI's who need farms. By making low-cost credit available to veterans through the Federal land banks and the Farmers Home Administration, the bill will answer a crying need in our farm communities where veterans are now unable to get the necessary financing to buy a farm.

These are the compelling advantages offered to veterans by the homestead bill. Now, as to legislative cost, I have heard opponents of the bill say, "The bill is all well and good, but won't its cost to the taxpayers be prohibitive?" The answer is an emphatic "No."

The great bulk of the funds made available under the homtsead bill will not be expenditures at all, but will be self-liquidating loans which will be repaid to the Government with interest. The only direct cost involved is the $200,000,000 for FWA grants for land development and public utilities, and even this cost will be spread over a number of years. I think that all of us who have helped to develop the homestead bill can well be proud that it will accomplish so much at so little cost. It certainly seems the least we can do to help our deserving veterans solve their housing problem.

GENERAL PROCEDURE

I know that every Member of Congress is gravely concerned about veterans housing. I shall never be able to forget some of the individual cases which have been presented to me. I have studied the veterans' homestead association bill to see how it would apply to those cases. I wanted to find out if it can actually help the individual veteran who wants to own his own home—a home that is soundly planned, soundly built, and within his ability to pay. I believe the Veterans' Homestead Act will help that veteran. I should like to explain how.

In the first place he is eligible to become a member of a veterans' homestead association made up of other veterans in the same situation he is in and organized for the express purpose of aiding each other, without financial gain to themselves, to obtain a home. The fact alone that the individual veteran can discuss his problem and get advice through his association from sources that are familiar with and sympathetic to his needs is a real help in itself. This availability of experienced counsel will present many individual veterans from going off the deep end—from acting too hastily, of buying beyond his needs, or encumbering himself beyond his means. It must not be forgotten that the average person does not buy but one home in his lifetime. Buying or building a home is a serious step. More often than not it is the largest single financial transaction the average individual ever enters into. It involves the longest continuing debt he will ever assume. In the case of our veterans this is especially so—he commits himself to pay over the next 20, 30, or 40 years of his life. When a veteran engages to build or buy a home it is essential that he get sound advice. The elements involved in home building or in home purchasing you and I know are technical. There are many things to know—many things to consider. Let us look at a few of them. Take the matter of location: The type of neighborhood, its proximity to schools, to work, to shopping, to church, the availability of utilities, the existence of municipal facilities, and many other factors which affect value and should be considered when making a decision is but one phase of the building operation—that of where to build. But there are many other factors which must be considered and which bear upon the cost and the ultimate value of the end product. Take for example the size of the lot; the size, design, and type of structure; the comparative costs of different materials; the different methods and cost of financing; and the legal aspects—just to mention a few. These matters are not readily understood by the average veteran and I say it will be a real help for him to be a member of an association that can get him over the first hurdles in acquiring his home.

It must be borne in mind that these associations are nonprofit organizations of veterans organized for a single purpose—that of helping their fellow veteran members obtain a home. It is contemplated by the American Legion in sponsoring this bill that the association can command their experienced advice of public-spirited leaders in the community. But, important as sound advice and help of this sort is, that is not all the help these associations will give the individual veteran. Not a dime will be spent for materials or for labor except as there is value received. Moreover, these associations solve the veteran's problem of obtaining construction-loan money. This has been a troublesome problem for many veterans. In many communities it has been impossible for a veteran—primarily because he has limited means—to obtain a construction loan; in other communities such money is not available, and in still other communities available but at high costs. These associations will pay for work as it progresses and the need for a construction loan is obviated. Furthermore, these associations will have the benefit of supervision, inspection, and the services of the technical staff of the Veterans' Administration. The many services and facilities which this bill makes available to the individual veteran through his homestead association adds up to this: He will get a home that is soundly constructed, that has good design, good planning, is well located, meets the veteran's needs, and be one he more probably will be able to pay for.

PRIVATE ENTERPRISE

I would like to make it clear to my colleagues in support of the addition of the veterans' homestead association bill that whatever housing is built under the veterans' bill must be built by private enterprise. The Federal Government does not obligate itself nor undertake to build houses for veterans under the veterans' bill. All the Government does is to lend money to approved homestead associations upon the security of real property in order that the veteran members of approved homestead associations can get a decent place to live in. Our veterans do not want something for nothing. The homestead association bill does not give them something for nothing. What the veterans want and what this bill gives them is an opportunity to demonstrate that they can help themselves out of this deplorable housing situation—a situation not of their making. To say to our veterans that they are incapable of contributing to the solution of their own housing problems would be absurd. To them was entrusted our very existence at a time of our Nation's greatest peril. Is there any reason to believe that our veterans cannot now be trusted to conduct in a businesslike fashion the affairs of associations which they themselves have organized and which they themselves will manage? Have our veterans ever defaulted in the trusts our Government has reposed in them?

As I said at the outset this bill is entirely compatible with the precepts of the private enterprise system. It requires—and it rewards—private initiative. The mere passage of this bill does not mean that thereupon the housing problems of veterans are automatically solved. From the very moment the bill becomes law—whether housing will be produced under it will largely depend upon the private initiative of veterans. To produce housing under this bill the veterans must act as would any group of prudent businessmen were they to engage upon a similar housing undertaking. All construction undertaken under the bill will have to be built by private contractors on a normal profit basis. All construction will be approved in advance and inspected during the building process by the Federal Government. Ample provision is made to assure economic soundness. Veterans homestead associations will not spring into existence by themselves; veterans must take the initiative and themselves proceed to organize an association. To obtain a charter such veterans must show that there is a need in their locality for veterans housing; that such need is not being met and that they have a plan that will meet that need. Only if the plan is approved as sound and feasible, only if it will produce housing for sale or rent at prices veterans can afford, will a charter be issued, advances made or loan given to carry out the plan. The rest depends upon private enterprise and private initiative. Is there anything basically wrong with that idea? Our Government time and again aided private industry—aided it by credit, by direct loans—yes, even by direct subsidy itself. In a matter as vital to the welfare of our nation as homes are today can it be said that our Government will do less for its veterans in their need than it has in the past for private industry in its need? I am satisfied our veterans will get these housing enterprises going, and get them going quickly, economically, and with credit to themselves. I know too that our veterans will be grateful for the opportunity to help themselves. But the opportunity the passage of this bill will afford veterans is even less than the opportunity it affords our Government to demonstrate that our political and economic system in times of emergency can accommodate itself to meet the needs of private industry and private citizen alike. I believe the initiative, the purpose, and the good sense of our veterans justify the confidence and trust this bill places in them. In time of need you and I know our veterans will never let our country down. The question this bill poses is whether our Government is going to let the veteran down.

FARM LOANS AND RURAL HOUSING

When the call to colors sounded for World War II, hundreds of thousands of young men left our farms to join with those from towns and cities, for service in the country's Army and Navy. Following demobilization, most of these young men have returned to work with the soil, along with thousands of others who have planned and dreamed of life on a farm. But with every passing month since war's end, the actual ownership of a farm through purchase has become progressively more difficult. Rising commodity prices have been reflected in rising farm-land prices, and with every increase, lenders have become more cautious. As a consequence, those of our veterans who have sought financial help for farming purposes have found it more difficult to obtain. Since most of our veterans are young, it is not to be expected that they would have saved enough for the substantial down payment required by conventional mortgage financing.

It is true that the Federal Government has extended aid to prospective veteran farm owners through the GI bill, the Farmers Home Administration, and the Federal land banks. But the record shows that only a pitifully small number of veterans have been accommodated by these agencies. While high farm-land prices have deterred some, many others have been restrained from purchasing the farm of their choice only by their failure to obtain mortgage financing. The Farmers Home Administration is quite limited in the amount of funds available for loans to veterans, while the absence of an adequate secondary market for farm loans has made lenders cautious to proceed under title III of the GI bill.

Recognizing these legislative and fiscal deficiencies, the veterans' homestead bill of 1948, H. R. 4488, proposes to come to grips with the financial problems confronting veterans in several ways. First, it provides for the investment by the Secretary of Agriculture of $100,000,000 a year in a manner assured to help veterans seeking farm ownership or improvement. The Secretary may lend part of this money to the various Federal land banks for their relending to veterans on favorable terms, and he may also make part of this money available to the Farmers Home Administration for loans to veterans in the event that conventional loans become unavailable.

The homestead bill provides a secondary market for farm loans guaranteed or insured under the GI bill, by authorizing the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to purchase them from lenders under the same terms provided for the VA purchase of home loans. This assurance of a certain future liquidity should go far toward overcoming the reluctance of some private lenders to extending to veterans the credit so necessary to enable them to buy or improve a farm.

Finally, the homestead bill removes certain limitations of law placed on the Federal land banks and the Farmers Home Administration in the making of farm loans guaranteed under title III of present GI bill.

In concert, these aids will go far toward relieving the mounting farm credit stringencies now beleaguering those of our veterans seeking to purchase farms for themselves. It should be particularly noted that all of the farm aids proposed by the homestead bill will require no expenditure by the Federal Government. The loans will be self-liquidating and the money invested will be returned with a yield to compensate the cost of Treasury borrowing. Adequate security will be held to protect the lender by taking a first mortgage on the real estate in an amount within its reasonable value. The net effect of this extension of Government credit will make it possible for thousands of veterans to get started on their own farm instead of working as a tenant or a farm hand, or remaining tied to a city job not to their liking, training, or ability.

The homestead bill will enable the veteran who owns his farm to borrow money from a homestead association to cover the cost of building or improving his farmhouse. He need only join the association formed in his county or community to be eligible for such a construction loan on terms that will be highly favorable. When the house is completed, it will automatically be eligible for a 40-year guaranteed GI loan from a private lender, the Federal land banks, or the Farmers Home Administration, so that the construction loan from the homestead association may be repaid.

Is extending this aid too much for us to do for our farm boys who went to war against the Japs and the Nazis? Since it is hard to visualize how this type of aid can be an expense, we will be remiss in our duty if we fail to act now.

RENTAL HOUSING

For many veteran families the big problem is rental housing. Many of our veterans have only recently become family heads and are not yet prepared to become home owners. Many others dwell in the large urban centers where apartments are the accepted means of shelter. For these veterans the problem is to find a decent apartment at rentals which they can afford.

The rental housing provisions of the legislation we are now considering are definitely now the answer. They merely continue unchanged the present Government aids to rental housing which have been proved almost totally ineffective. The number of apartment units which have been built in the postwar period is a mere trickle, wholly insufficient in the face of the crying need for rental housing in today's market. Moreover, the few new apartment units which have come on the market have been priced completely beyond the reach of the income of the average veteran family.

I confess I am ashamed when I read the "apartments for veterans" ads in our newspapers today. You have all seen these ads. They run something like this: "Newly completed apartment units. Veterans given preference. One-bedroom apartments, $85; two-bedroom apartments, $100." One hundred dollars for a small two-bedroom apartment. Think how the average GI with a $50 weekly income must feel when he reads an ad like that. Can you blame him for feeling outraged at the emptiness of the legal preference with which a grateful Government has rewarded him?

What we need is plenty of apartments at rents which veterans can afford. The only legislation I know of which will meet this need is H. R. 4488, the Veterans' Homestead Act of 1948.

When we drew up the veterans' homestead bill we had this rental problem clearly in mind. I am confident that the veterans' homestead associations which would be chartered under the bill can really launch a frontal attack on the rental-housing shortage.

In the first place, homestead associations will not be hampered by the big deterrent to rental housing today, namely, the reluctance of investors to put their money into long-term rental projects. Assured of their financing through loans from the Veterans' Administration, homestead associations can go right ahead and build the apartments which many association members will want.

And, in the second place, homestead associations will be able to offer their members good-quality apartments at rentals far below present levels. Through FWA grants and other features of the homestead bill, associations will be able to build apartments at a reduced initial cost. This is one big saving. Another substantial saving is the reduced financing costs which associations would enjoy under the bill. They will receive long-term 40-year loans from the Veterans' Administration at only about 2½ percent interest, and, of course, there will be no question of landlord profit. Taking all these savings together, the veterans' homestead bill should enable associations to offer apartments to their veteran members at rents 25 percent below prevailing levels.

Let us do away with the humiliation our veteran apartment seekers are now experiencing. Instead of forcing them to follow countless futile leads in their search for an apartment which finally turns out to be hopelessly overpriced or to involve a furniture tie-in sale or some other joker, let us give the GI's a break.

COSTS OF H. R. 4488

Over the course of the last decade and a half, the Federal Government has pursued several methods in attempting to provide housing, to stimulate construction activity, and to relieve mortgage distress. Some of these devices have proved to be quite expensive to the Government and often ineffective while others have been very successful with little or no drain on the Federal Treasury. Accordingly, I would like to examine the provisions of the veterans homestead bill, H. R. 4488, in the light of their probable ultimate cost to the Government.

Generally speaking, plans involving the making of loans to home owners or the guaranty of loans to aid home ownership have been self-liquidating, and have cost the Federal Government little, if anything, even for administrative expenses. The provisions of section 511 of the veterans homestead bill which permit loans to be made to groups of veterans for the construction of single or multiunit dwellings, call for self-liquidating advances adequately secured by realty appraised to assure protection for the Government. The interest return on such loans would not only cover the cost of money to the Treasury, but would allow a small margin to offset the administrative expenses. There is no reason to believe that homestead loans would not be as successfully liquidated as the Home Owners' Loan Corporation portfolio, for none of the loans to veterans would be similar to the distress loans made by HOLC. As a group, our veterans have their period of higher income ahead of them, and barring a national calamity, they should prove to be excellent risks for mortgage loans.

The investment of Government funds in established lending institutions as provided in section 513 of the homestead bill for home loans and in section 514 for farm loans, has ample precedent that has proven most successful in combatting monetary stringencies. RFC has invested Government funds in banks, HOLC has invested funds in the building and loan industry, and constantly the Treasury has Government funds on deposit with banks throughout the Nation. Some of this money has been invested on a short-term basis and some of it on a long-term basis, but ultimate return without loss to the Government has been the rule rather than the exception.

Section 515 of the homestead bill provides for the purchase by the Government of mortgages made to veterans by private lenders, provided they are guaranteed under the GI bill and are secured by first liens on real estate, for amounts within the reasonable value of the security. The history of veterans' repayments under the GI loan program thus far has proven more successful than even the most optimistic had dared to hope. In fact, the purchase of guaranteed GI loans by the Government should provide a margin of return to pay the administrative expenses of doing so, as the differential between the cost of money and the yield will provide a spread of about 1 percent.

The only foreseeable cost of the homestead bill to the Government is the 50 percent matching grant provided in section 512 for the development of land sites and the construction of community facilities. To reduce the cost of site preparation and to facilitate the construction of well-planned subdivisions, an amount not exceeding a total of $200,000,000 over a 9-year period is provided by the bill. This expenditure by the Federal Government will reap a dual benefit in the years to come, not only by helping our young veterans on their way toward achieving the stability of home ownership, but also by building our new communities in conformance with good planning and sound design that will stand the test of time without the early depreciation that has plagued so many American cities in the past. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that this proposed expenditure is far less than the amount of Government aid that is contemplated by the other housing bills under consideration.

In summary let me again emphasize that the homestead bill follows formulas that have been tried and tested, and have proven successful without cost to the Government. The comparatively small grant involved is of little cost in relation to the immediate and long-term benefits it will yield. The provisions of this bill are a minimum that the Federal Government can grant in discharging its debt to those whose housing plans were disrupted by the war.

John Hollis Bankhead 2d

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. LISTER HILL
OF ALABAMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 21 (legislative day of Monday, March 29), 1948

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. JOHN HOLLIS BANKHEAD 2D, late a Senator from the State of Alabama

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, when JOHN H. BANKHEAD slipped out of the company of living men on the 12th day of June 1946, there was sadness in every farm home in the land. The outstanding champion of the cause of the farmer, the great leader for agriculture in the Congress of the United States was gone.

There was sadness in the hearts of the people of Alabama, for they were proud of JOHN BANKHEAD. They were proud of his notable services to the State and the Nation, proud of the honor and the distinction he had brought to Alabama. They held him in warm affection and highest esteem.

When JOHN BANKHEAD died, there was sadness in this body. A friend, a congenial associate, a faithful fellow worker, an informed and tireless leader in so many important matters had left us. No Member of the Senate had more friends in this body among Democrats or Republicans. JOHN BANKHEAD'S fairness, his forthrightness, his loyalty to those about him, his sympathetic understanding and willingness at all times to see the other fellow's problems, his generous impulse to be helpful, his indefatigable labors won and bound his colleagues to him in ties of lasting friendship. With this friendship went a confidence in the man, inspired by his integrity, his infinite pains, his zeal for his cause, and his devotion to the common weal.

No Member of the Senate possessed a rarer genius for reconciling differences, composing conflicting views and bringing forth consummate action. No Member commanded more influence in the Senate. He was indeed the successful legislator.

Senator BANKHEAD came of a family eminent in the political life of Alabama and the Nation for more than three-quarters of a century. Three successive generations of the Bankhead family have served in the Congress of the United States. It is almost without precedent for a father who has served in both Houses of Congress to have two sons and a grandson serve in either or both branches of Congress. And yet this is the story of the Bankheads.

Senator BANKHEAD'S father, John H. Bankhead, Sr., came to the House of Representatives in 1886 and was elected to the United States Senate to succeed Gen. John T. Morgan in 1907. The last Confederate soldier to serve in the United States Senate, the elder Bankhead began his political career in the Reconstruction Legislature of Alabama in 1865. In the House and the Senate he pioneered for rural-free delivery, was the father of good roads for our country and the indefatigable champion of inland waterway development. The Bankhead Highway, crossing the continent from Washington, D. C., to San Diego, Calif., is a memorial to him.

William B. Bankhead, brother of the late Senator JOHN H. BANKHEAD, served for nearly a quarter of a century in the House of Representatives, and was the only man ever to be unanimously chosen as Speaker of the House. He filled the position with a fairness, an ability, an eloquence and a distinction that set him apart as one of the great Speakers in the history of the House.

Senator BANKHEAD'S son, Walter Will Bankhead, served in the House of Representatives for a short while after the death of his uncle, Speaker Bankhead.

The Bankhead family has not only given to both Houses of Congress men who had long, successful and distinguished tenure of office, but it has given outstanding names to the fields of history, of art, of literature, and of the stage.

Senator BANKHEAD was well equipped for his career in the Senate. Born in Lamar County, Ala., in 1872, he attended the public schools of Alabama and was graduated from the University of Alabama when only 19 years of age. He was a member of Phi Beta Kappa. He received his law degree from Georgetown Law School and practiced law with his brother until Speaker Bankhead was elected to Congress in 1916. Senator BANKHEAD continued the practice of law until his election to the Senate in 1930, where he represented the people of Alabama until his untimely death.

Senator BANKHEAD'S interests were broad. He served on the Banking and Currency Committee, and played a leading role in fashioning and passing the many important measures which restored the Nation's financial strength and stability and that did so much to lead us out of the depression. His wisdom with his counsel went into the writing and the passage of the financial legislation so necessary for the winning of the last World War through which we have so recently passed. He was an effective and influential member of the Appropriations Committee, and chairman of the Irrigation and Reclamation Committee. He served on the Agriculture Committee, and it was here and on the floor of the Senate that he gave himself to the cause of the farmer.

Throughout his long service in the United States Senate, JOHN H. BANKHEAD stood dedicated to one supreme task—to build a sound and enduring foundation for American agriculture and to assure the farmer of a stable, long-range, profitable agriculture, free of drastic price fluctuations and disastrous surpluses. He fought that the American farmer might enjoy his rightful place in the Nation's household and that American agriculture might at long last receive parity in the Nation's prosperity.

The United States was nearing the depths of the depression when Senator BANKHEAD came to Washington in 1930. The farmers of the Nation were desperate, pressed down by taxes, interest, and debt. Many farmers were losing their farms through mortgage foreclosures. Crops were rotting in the fields because rock-bottom prices did not justify harvesting. The first ominous clouds of the dust storms were gathering in the Midwest. Cotton was soon to drop below 6 cents a pound. For years agriculture had been denied its fair share in the Nation's economy and the farmer's plight was desperate.

With the election of Franklin D. Roosevelt and a Democratic administration in 1932, the farmer took heart. The executive and the legislative branches of the Federal Government joined hands to meet with dynamic action his problems.

As a member of the Senate Agriculture Committee, Senator BANKHEAD took over chief responsibility for guiding the much-needed farm legislation through the Senate. His interest and activity covered the whole field of agriculture. He labored with the problems of wheat and corn, as well as with those of cotton and peanuts. He labored for fair and adequate prices for all farmers in all sections of our country. He was the author of many major pieces of legislation for the benefit of the farmer and of agriculture. These statutes are part and parcel of the epochal program that has brought fair prices to the farmer for his products, soil conservation for the preservation and building of the soil, fair and adequate farm credit, rehabilitation of the small farmer, elimination of farm tenancy and restoration of home ownership, better rural housing, crop insurance, reforestation, strengthening of the Farm Extension Service and the land-grant colleges, and many other benefits to the men, women, and children of the farm.

These statutes constitute an enduring monument to JOHN BANKHEAD'S life and work. The list of statutes which bear his name is too long to discuss in detail. I should like to mention only a few which stand as milestones in the development of basic, progressive agricultural programs in America.

The Bankhead Cotton Control Act of 1934 fostered and protected interstate and foreign commerce in cotton and was the forerunner of the present marketing quota law. The act helped the South to free itself from the shackles of the one-crop cotton system, to diversify farming practices, and conserve the soil from the exhaustive demands of cotton production.

The Bankhead-Jones Act of 1935 provided for additional research into farm production, distribution, and conservation. Special research laboratories were established and Federal and State activities closely integrated. The research work of the laboratories has justified itself manyfold. Among the accomplishments of the laboratories are new methods for production of penicillin, findings in the production of synthetic rubber, and development of motor fuel and synthetic fibers from agricultural products. For example, a new artificial fiber has been produced from peanut protein.

Senator BANKHEAD helped to draft the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act of 1936. Our soil was fast being depleted by farming practices. Under this act, improved farming practices were encouraged and we were started on the road which has led to the restoration of the productivity of millions of acres of land and to diversified farm practices and land uses.

In the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act of 1937, Senator BANKHEAD moved to help the farm tenant, the laborer, and the share-cropper to realize the dream of owning his own land, of becoming the master of his own acres.

In 1945 he was co-author of the Bankhead-Flannagan Act which authorized additional appropriations for cooperative extension work in agriculture and home economics. This measure did much to aid the farm people in improving their standard of living, their marketing, their methods of farm and home management, their youth-clubs, and their programs for correcting nutritional deficiencies.

No mere enumeration of the wise legislation Senator BANKHEAD sponsored and guided can do justice to his services. His great work will live in the improved standard of living the farmers enjoy, in the expanded markets for their products, in the increased share of the national income the farmers receive, and in the new strength and dignity he helped to give American agriculture.

And let us not forget that when war came and its impending danger threatened our Nation American agriculture was able to produce undreamed-of harvests—to supply the demand for vast quantities of food and agricultural commodities for our civilian population, our armed forces, and our Allies—because of the wise program sponsored by JOHN H. BANKHEAD and those who worked shoulder to shoulder with him for American agriculture.

One of the last agricultural measures advocated by Senator BANKHEAD was the national soil fertility bill, jointly introduced by him and myself and sponsored by the American Farm Bureau Federation. This bill would give our Nation a national soil policy, provide an adequate supply of high-grade fertilizers at reasonable prices for the farmer and insure the restoration and preservation of the Nation's most vital material asset, the soil.

Busy as Senator BANKHEAD always was with agricultural legislation, he was never too busy to give me, his colleague from Alabama, a helpful hand. Today I wish to acknowledge my debt to him and my appreciation for the splendid support he gave me in my sponsorship of measures such as those for TVA, for rural electrification, for vocational education, for the building of hospitals and health centers, for the removal of unjust discriminations in freight rates, for the development of Alabama's waterways, for veterans' benefits, and for the national defense. Senator BANKHEAD and I worked together for Alabama and her people.

As one who was privileged to stand by Senator BANKHEAD's side and to sustain and support him in his battles for the farmer, I know how great was the loss to Alabama and to the Nation when he fell. He left behind him a rich heritage. We must guard that heritage and go forward with new works that will strengthen our agriculture, conserve and rebuild our precious soil, and insure a prosperous, happy, and secure life for the people he loved and served so well—the farm people of America. In his spirit and following his example, we must carry on that America may be strong, that she may continue free, and that she may play her full part in the building of the peace of the world.

Members Retiring From Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I have been informed that up to this hour it is known that, due to voluntary retirements and the misfortunes of politics, we shall not have with us in the Eighty-first Congress about 30 of our present colleagues. How many more will be absent as a result of the forthcoming election is problematical.

Among those who will not be Members of the next House I regret to find the name of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], who has been with us more than a decade doing a splendid and outstanding service for his State and the Nation. On every question affecting the best interests of the whole country he has been found on the right side.

My regret for the retirement of Mr. KEFAUVER is somewhat softened by the prophecy of those well informed that the country and the State of Tennessee are not to lose his services but are to retain them in a position of great responsibility here in Washington that is considered by some as a deserved promotion for important work well done.

In the retirement of Mr. CLARK and Mr. FOLGER of the House, the Nation and the State of North Carolina, which has contributed generously to the statesmanship of the country, suffer a real loss. They carry back to private life the deserved well wishes of every Member of this House who appreciates unselfish and constructive work for the public weal.

In the loss of Mr. FLANNAGAN, by voluntary retirement, the cause of American agriculture loses one of its most intelligent and stanch advocates. No Member of this House during my day has had a better and clearer understanding of agriculture than has this sound and constructive legislator.

Capitol Hill will not be the same when Mr. LUDLOW voluntarily retires after about 47 years as Washington publicist and Member of this House. His outstanding contribution to the important and far-reaching legislation of the disturbed era in which he served so faithfully will be his indelible monument.

I join my colleagues in wishing for these retiring faithful public servants long life, health, prosperity, and happiness, wherever they may be.

Hon. Fred Hartley, of New Jersey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES C. AUCHINCLOSS
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to express in the RECORD my sincere regret that my dear friend and colleague, FRED HARTLEY, will not return to Congress next year because of his decision to retire. He has served his country and the Tenth District of New Jersey, which he represented, faithfully and well since he was elected to the Seventy-first Congress.

FRED HARTLEY always had a real contest at election time but that was natural for a fearless fighter and one who enjoyed the battle. He always won, not only because of his indomitable spirit but because the people he represented admired his strength of character and his determination.

It took courage to take over the chairmanship of the Education and Labor Committee of the House at the beginning of the Eightieth Congress and to guide through a long period of hearings the labor legislation which bears his name and is now on the statute books, in spite of a veto by the President of the United States. During the course of these hearings he exhibited a fine sense of justice, patience, and resourcefulness, and showed qualities of leadership which aroused the admiration of all who worked with him.

There is nothing of a counterfeit about FRED HARTLEY, and no one could ever call him a sham. He is honest in his convictions and he is not afraid to stand up for them. People cannot help but admire a character of this kind and although such a one is often apt to make enemies yet that did not bother FRED HARTLEY when he knew he was right.

The Congress of the United States will miss FRED HARTLEY. His many friends know that he is irreplaceable and his constituents are bound to regret that he will no longer represent them. I am proud to know him and to call him my friend, and I trust that the days to come will be happy ones and bring rich blessings to him and his family.

Columbia River Flood Proves Need of Over-All Valley Development Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. MURRAY
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 15), 1948

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, for many years now, I, with other Members of the Congress, have consistently sponsored and spoken in behalf of legislation for the purpose of protecting and developing our priceless natural resources. I am wholly convinced that the most effective solution of our growing power shortage, the depletion of our agricultural resources, retardation of industrial development in underdeveloped sections of our country, and the prevention of periodic disasters such as the recent Columbia River flood lies in the creation of regional resources authorities.

Such authorities, operating in the great river valley areas of this Nation, with local representation attuned to the needs and aspirations of their people, would provide the type of integrated planning and development of our resources which would alleviate substantially the problems confronting us today.

In this connection I ask permission to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the following article on the recent Columbia River flood by Dr. Dewey Anderson, executive director of the Public Affairs Institute, which appears in the Trainman News of June 19.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COLUMBIA RIVER FLOOD PROVES NEED OF OVER-ALL VALLEY DEVELOPMENT PLAN

(A report by the Public Affairs Institute (founded by the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen), Dr. Dewey Anderson, director)

Flood waters in the Pacific Northwest have already destroyed Vanport, a city of 19,000. Damage to smaller communities and thousands of inundated acres of fertile farmlands along the path of the swollen Columbia is yet to be calculated.

Current estimates indicate a flood toll of 30 dead; property damage amounting to $140,000,000; 48,000 persons homeless; 6,000 homes destroyed; 414,000 acres in the Columbia River Basin flooded, soil damage tremendous; and undetermined damage to State and county roads, city streets, dike and drainage districts, city sewer and water systems, and power and telephone lines.

The principal cause of the flood, the worst since 1894, appears to have been the unusually hot weather in the upper Columbia with consequent heavy snow and glacial melting. Heavy rains on the lower tributaries aggravated the situation and resulted in convergence, backing up and overflow at vulnerable points, of the flood waters.

Between the upper reaches of the Columbia and the heavily populated Portland area, the sole major facility capable of controlling the level of the Columbia is the Grand Coulee Dam.

It is said that by controlling the height of the water in the Coulee Reservoir the level of the Columbia River can ordinarily be reduced about 4 feet between Coulee and Bonneville. At best, however, this could have reduced the damage but slightly. Moreover, this would require having been able to forecast the flood flow. In addition it would have meant curtailing substantially the amount of power generated by Coulee Dam.

POWER SHORTAGE

It is generally known that the Pacific Northwest has been suffering from an acute power shortage with the result that many industries have been forced to operate below capacity levels.

Coulee Dam is today carrying the backbone of the electric power load of the entire Pacific Northwest.

The 1947 Department of the Interior Report on the Columbia River Power System states:

"The year served to emphasize further the seriousness of the power supply situation in the region. The rapid return to operation of aluminum plants, the growing demand of new and expanded industries, and the rising requirements for commercial and domestic power on the systems of the region's distributors, together with the fact that for the most part generating capacity in the area has remained static since the war, combined to present a problem of considerable magnitude."

This is the perspective of the facilities available to deal with the problems of the Columbia River Valley.

What may not be generally realized is that Coulee Dam was not designed, planned, financed, or operated for normal flood-control purposes. The allocation to incidental flood control benefits of the dam amounts to less than 1 percent of the cost of the dam.

What we have in the Columbia River Valley today—and the same is true of the Missouri River Valley—is a system of overlapping efforts, competition between agencies, and noncoordinated activities, with the Bureau of Reclamation planning and executing projects to store water for land reclamation and power; the Army's Corps of Engineers operating similarly on problems of flood control and navigation; the several agencies of the Department of Agriculture engaged in soil conservation, reforestation, and other activities.

These independent activities represent a relatively ineffective and expensive piecemeal hacking-away operation at a gigantic interrelated problem. The Vanport disaster illustrates that years of Corps of Engineers flood-control efforts, and the independent efforts of Reclamation's Grand Coulee and Bonneville, are not the way to handle the problem.

TVA SUCCESS

In contrast is the Tennessee Valley which had long been subject to periodic flood disasters. Since completion of the TVA system it has functioned sucessfully on numerous occasions to prevent damage from flood waters. Moreover, TVA has demonstrated that it can prevent devastating floods, and at the same time produce low-cost power to benefit a vast region, engaged in resources development, increase employment and incomes, provide wonderful recreation areas, and substantially raise the agricultural and industrial standards of the region.

On June 2, 1948, an editorial in the Washington Post, entitled "Disaster In the West," dealing with the Columbia River flood, suggests that a consequence of the tragedy may be an intensified demand for a Columbia Valley Authority to place the problem of flood control on a regional rather than local basis." And the editorial states further:

"The one great point which TVA has driven home convincingly is that no little plan will do. If conservation of the country's resources now imperiled by floods is to be effective, then it must be accomplished on a broad basis, resolving interagency conflicts through a single authority with decentralized operations. The best form of sympathy for the Oregon victims, aside from immediate relief, is to hasten meaningful steps to see that this appalling waste is not repeated."

Proposals in the form of bills introduced in Congress for the establishment of a CVA and a MVA have been widely discussed. The need has been widely recognized and the vast majority of the residents in the areas favor the proposals. Congress on the other hand has displayed little awareness of the problem and no disposition to deal effectively with it. The bills were not passed.

Senator GLEN TAYLOR (Democrat, Idaho) in discussing S. 1647, a bill for the establishment of a Columbia Valley Authority, which he had introduced during the first session of the Eightieth Congress asked:

"Must Congress always act in an atmosphere of crisis? Must we always avoid taking action in the calm atmosphere of affirmative planning for the future? I admit it is much less dramatic that way—the creation of opportunity for happy families and national development does not offer the drama which comes from running to the rescue of flood victims. But surely it is a better way to build a great nation."

FUNDS CUT

Just recently the House, immediately prior to the Vanport disaster, had voted to impose crippling amendments upon the operations of the Department of the Interior's Bureau of Reclamation. One of the amendments wiped out completely funds ($80,000) for a small program staff in the Secretary of the Interior's Office whose duties were to assist in defining the problems of resources development and develop improved integration of national resources policy.

Another action of the House was to cut almost $2,000,000 from the Budget Bureau's request for next year's work on the Hungry Horse Dam construction project in Montana.

And as Senator TAYLOR had prophesied, it was only a few days later, responding to the drama and tragedy of the Vanport disaster that bills were offered in Congress authorizing the appropriations of millions of dollars to repair the damage that had been wrought.

The piecemeal approach which Congress has elected to follow in dealing with the problems of our great river valleys, and the consequent disasters that inevitably follow, will only be corrected when Congress recognizes as did the father of TVA, the late Senator Norris, when he said shortly before his death:

"When God made the Missouri Basin He paid no attention to State lines. He made it as a whole, and as a whole it must be approached. * * * Only by approaching the basin as a whole will human beings living in it be able to develop to the full its magnificent resources."

ONLY ONE WAY

Of course, the same thing applies to the Columbia Basin, the Central Valley in California, and scores of other river valleys. Coupling the latent resources of these regions to the potentially enormous and cheap electric power supply by means of an overall unified plan and program for the development of the water, land, and mineral resources of these regions can prevent the recurrence of disastrous floods, depletion of natural resources and at the same time provide a much more realistic approach to the maintenance of national production, income, employment, security, and living standards. Such regional developments will strengthen our national economy. For a strong national economy depends upon prosperous and well-balanced regional economies.

Appropriations, Eighteth Congress, Second Session

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN TABER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I submit herewith tables showing:

First. The appropriations for the first session of the Eightieth Congress made in 1947.

Second. The budget estimates submitted by the President this year.

Third. The appropriations made by the Congress in the second session of the Eightieth Congress.

The Congress reduced the requests submitted by the President this year from a total of $35,425,245,222.79 to $32,683,763,930.87—a saving of $2,741,481,291.92.

This saving was made only as a result of long hearings which gave the Appropriations Committee a complete grasp of the demoralized condition of the executive branch of the Government.

Everywhere there is complete confusion and inefficiency.

Never has there been more complete proof of the total incapacity of the Democratic Party to govern.

This year President Truman—evidently to prove to the country the total incompetence of his administration—failed to present to the Congress the major budget requests at the opening of the Congress in January as the law requires and as has been the practice for the past 28 years.

The final budget estimates for Government corporations did not come to us until April 6; for the Interior Department until May 10; for the Army and the Air Force until May 26; for independent offices, including Veterans' Administration, the Atomic Energy Commission, and the Maritime Commission, until May 27; and for the Navy until June 1.

This made it almost impossible to hold proper hearings and get the appropriation bills through Congress in time for adjournment.

But tremendous effort and the hardest kind of work on the part of the committee has enable us to do a thorough and good job.

It shows that even the incompetence of a Democratic administration could not prevent the Republican Congress from doing a good job.

The tables showing details follow:

The Housing Program

OF

HON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, it will be interesting to see what kind of a platform the Republican Party adopts in Philadelphia next week in connection with the vital subject of housing. In view of the ridiculously inadequate housing bill being jammed through the House and Senate a few hours before adjournment of this Eightieth Congress, the Republican Party will find this a most embarrassing situation to explain to the American public. The housing bill proposed and being railroaded through this House and the Senate by the Republican leadership contains no provisions for slum clearance and none for low-cost rental public housing. The legislative machinery of the majority is well oiled in pushing through a bill which has the unqualified endorsement of the greedy real-estate lobby. The wishes of the selfish interests are paramount and consequently thousands of families will have to continue to live in sordid disease-ridden slums and many thousands of veterans and others will have to continue to live with their relatives in impossibly crowded quarters. This is a sad commentary on modern civilization. One of the principle factors in juvenile delinquency which is so prevalent today is the lack of proper housing.

The widely known Wagner-Ellender-Taft general housing bill which I have consistently supported, would have established a permanent and comprehensive solution for the housing problem of people at nearly all income levels. It is a long-range program designed to meet the needs of all classes and types of people and has been endorsed by an impressive group of civic and church organizations as well as the labor organizations, the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, and the American Legion, of Kings County, N. Y.

We desperately need more housing in the city of New York, particularly low-cost rental housing. We could have met this crying need through the adoption of the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill, but the Republican Party is too indifferent to realize that the future welfare of our country is dependent upon healthy living conditions and a happy environment for our people.

The record of the Republican Eightieth Congress with respect to housing is a total blank. Social justice must and shall be attained for our people and the country should not permit continuation of such unwholesome conditions. This will have to be answered by the Republican leadership as they are completely responsible for their negative attitude in dealing with the foremost economic and social problem facing this country today. I firmly believe that the people will answer it for them in the November elections when the people also answer them for their failure to do a single thing about the cost of living.

How About That Supreme Court Trial Which California Demands?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 16, 1948

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, in regard to the fierce contest between Arizona and California over the disputed waters of the lower Colorado River, the second most frequently asked question is: "Why shouldn't this dispute be settled by a case in the Supreme Court of the United States?" Prior to last year the question most frequently asked concerning the settling of this dispute was:

"Why don't Arizona and California compromise their controversy and reach a settlement by agreement and compromise?" I do not regard either of these two as the best of the three possible solutions of this problem. However, within the last year, officials and witnesses representing water agencies in southern California have attempted to carry out one of their former suggestions and to stop all developments on the river by throwing the whole matter into litigation before the High Court. Congress would not legislate on it if it were in litigation.

Now, Arizona attempted several times during the past quarter century to launch a suit in the Supreme Court of the United States, to bring this matter squarely before that tribunal, but was unsuccessful in doing so, not from lack of merit in the case but for reasons which every lawyer well understands. For those same reasons, Arizona lawyers do not believe today there is a justiciable controversy within the meaning of the Constitution over which the High Court will take jurisdiction. Whatever may be the motive prompting the demand for this trial in the Supreme Court, Arizona lawyers are of the opinion that it will have the effect of further interminable delay and in the end will be unavailing under the present set of circumstances.

Twice within recent months the case has been fully argued before a Committee of the House and also before a committee of the Senate, without favorable action on the resolutions considered. The lawyers handled the intricate legal questions, but on May 26 this year, I appeared before the House Judiciary Committee and made the following statement:

STATEMENT OF HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK, OF ARIZONA, BEFORE THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 26, 1948

Mr. Chairman, I appear in opposition to this resolution and ask that your committee take no favorable action upon it.

What is the purpose of this pending resolution? It has Congress directing the Attorney General to bring action before the Supreme Court of the United States to render a judicial decision in a water controversy between certain States in the Colorado River Basin over the dividing of the waters of the Colorado River. I have sat in these and earlier hearings for hours listening to voluminous testimony. I have heard practically all that the California witnesses have presented, and I feel that much of it, if not most of their testimony, has no bearing whatsoever on this resolution. Of course, it would require many hours on the part of the opposition to answer all of their arguments, and it would be a waste of time all around for us to do so. While some of the arguments which the proponents have presented are fallacious, some of them are admissible facts.

They have pointed to the growing population of southern California and have laid great stress upon water needs. This is true, and readily admitted. They call attention to the military installations in southern California and the need of water for living purposes for the Navy at San Diego. This is true, but it must also be recognized that San Diego is now getting what water she needs from the Colorado River, and nobody appearing here in opposition to this resolution would withhold or take away from her one drop of that water needed for such national defense. Such has never been our thought, but it is our contention and our firm belief that none of the present supply of water, or any augmented supply which may be needed in the future for San Diego and for the Navy, need be taken out of any other State's supply from the Colorado River. We think that justice requires that such supply be taken as a part of California's allotment. When they claim that the increasing population in southern California has exceeded that of any other part of the country, they are on doubtful grounds if the claim is that California has made greater percentage gains than Arizona, for Arizona's population since 1940 has increased approximately 50 percent. I must not take time to touch upon all of these irrelevant matters, although they are mighty important, but I merely point out that they have little or no bearing upon this resolution and the committee's attitude toward it.

Why is this resolution before you demanding this very unusual thing and laying this very unusual requirement upon the Supreme Court of the United States? The proponents point out that there is a water dispute between Arizona and California, and that is a fact, but it is broader than a dispute between two States, as it involves seven States in the Colorado Basin as well as the United States of America. Yes, there is a dispute, but the question before this committee for tentative decision is whether or not it is a justiciable controversy within the meaning of the Constitution, giving the Supreme Court original jurisdiction in controversies between States, and whether or not it is a justiciable controversy within the recognized practice of the Supreme Court. Able lawyers are here in opposition, and they will handle that matter. As a Member of Congress, I want to touch on something else.

I keep being reminded of a small town wag—a clever "fellow about town"—who argued with a Baptist preacher about the well-known story of Philip and the Eunuch and proved to the satisfaction of an uncritical audience, by slightly misquoting the thirty-eighth verse of the eighth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, that the Eunuch baptized Philip by sprinkling him. It is easily seen that his argument is based on an arrangement of words, and he totally ignored all that goes before or after it. Strange arguments may arise out of the meaning of words, and unbelievable things may be proven, even from the Bible, by taking words out of their context, or by taking parts of sentences and paying no heed to their common-sense meaning.

These able attorneys who represent the water interests in southern California have laid great stress upon certain words and terms in what they call the "Law of the River." Some of their definitions of expressions used in the basic law are marvelous, but I wonder how they would sound to the men who wrote the Santa Fe Compact. Most of the authors of that famous compact have passed on. We cannot ask them just what they meant by certain words; and very unfortunately there is no complete verbatum journal of their debates and proceedings. I have often wished there had been a James Madison at Santa Fe in 1922 to keep notes on the drafting of that basic instrument, as there was in 1787, to help us understand our basic Constitution. It seems to me that these able attorneys have given a questionable interpretation of the meaning of the language in a number of instances throughout these hearings. It seems to me that an ordinary layman acquainted with the subject matter should be able to read this basic compact and understand what they meant by it.

I have read the Santa Fe Compact and the basic legislation passed by Congress in 1928, as well as the other documents which make up the "law of the river." I have spent a third of a century thinking about this subject matter. I have listened to these same witnesses many hours, not alone in this hearing, but in previous hearings to even a greater extent. After all this, I am convinced that these witnesses are, by a unique construction of language crossing the plain highway of speech, reading meaning into the law that just simply isn't there. If anyone really wants to know what the Santa Fe Compact and the Boulder Canyon Project Act provide, he must read those documents in the ordinary sense of the English language, and he must also know the historical background in order to have a full understanding of the intent of the lawmakers. I am thoroughly convinced that no such reading of the law in the light of the historical background will substantiate the contentions of the witnesses from Southern California who have already appeared before your committee. Mind you, I am not suggesting nor admitting that only the Supreme Court can read this body of law correctly. I do affirm that it is the duty of Congress to do so as further legislation is necessary in order to carry out the original intent.

It has all along been my conviction that the question of the division of the waters of the Colorado River was virtually settled, not in detail, but in broad outline, by existing law. Let it be understood that while this existing law is made up of more than 35 acts of Congress, it does include basically the Santa Fe Compact of 1922 and the basic legislation by Congress known as the Boulder Canyon Project Act of 1928. Also included in this "law of the river," as required by the Boulder Canyon Project Act, is the California Limitation Act of 1929, whereby the State of California in meeting the requirements of Congress limited herself to 4,400,000 acre-feet of water annually in firm supply, out of the Colorado River. One point I want to emphasize is that more than 35 acts of Congress have been passed having to do with the division and disposition of the waters of the Colorado River.

Of course, chief among these was the Boulder Canyon Project Act of 1928. Now this act was so greatly desired by California that she was willing to meet its requirements by a statutory limitation as to the amount of water she might receive or take from the Colorado River. If a mathematician were to estimate all of these more than 35 acts of Congress pertaining to this water problem, I can say without any fear of contradiction that the mathematician would find that the great majority of benefits under these various acts of Congress accrue to California. There is no doubt about it but that California received by far the greater share of benefits from this legislation.

Now, today California comes before you and says we must have a Supreme Court decision before anything else is done and that there is no other way of settlement. Let me remind you that this dispute has been going on for many years. This dispute between Arizona and California was a hot issue when I went to Arizona in 1914. The dispute has been getting hotter and hotter, especially since 1922, and it was a raging issue in 1928. Did California ask for a Supreme Court decision in 1928? Did this committee have any such resolution as this one before you in 1927, or in 1928, or at any time prior to the present Eightieth Congress? No, they made no such demand then.

California witnesses speak of several hundred million dollars of their implied investment in the lower Colorado River in Hoover Dam, in the All-American Canal, and in many other appurtenances. They say now this investment must have the protection of judicial determination. Whose money is that? Most of it is Uncle Sam's money. Don't you let anyone tell you that anybody in California, or in Arizona for that matter, put up a hundred million dollars to build Hoover Dam. Supposing Hoover Dam should go out within the next hour? Would the remaining unpaid part of the cost be guaranteed by anybody in California or in Arizona? Certainly not. The money was put up by Uncle Sam, and the risk is his, though of course, it is a mighty good business risk, and it is being paid back out of the revenue that is paid by the users of the power it furnishes. It is erroneous to conclude that California has underwritten the cost of Hoover Dam in the insurance sense of the term.

However, Los Angeles and her neighboring cities did make a great investment, and they do have moneys and capital at stake. They say now that this investment should be guarded by a judicial decision. I do not believe that it is jeopardized by anything outside of California's own water arrangement. Did they come in 1928, or anytime prior to the Eightieth Congress, and say to this committee something like this: "Now, we want to invest $200,000,000 in construction to get water out of the Colorado River, but we do not think we ought to take such a great risk with our money, and we do not think the American taxpayers should take such a great risk until the highest judicial authority in America has determined how much water California may have?" Did California ever present such a demand for a judicial determination? They did not. Instead they put the matter up to Congress.

Exactly what did they do? They came to Congress, and Congressman Phil Swing and Senator Hiram Johnson, of California, introduced one bill after another until the fourth one, which is known to us as the Boulder Canyon Project Act of 1928, passed and became law. Congress thought at the time—20 years ago—that it was certainly carrying out the provisions of the seven-State treaty known as the Santa Fe Compact which was unanimously signed in 1922, and that the logical development of the river could be begun under the Boulder Canyon Project Act and continuously carried forward under its provisions. Thus California got her water. Most of the benefits contemplated in the Boulder Canyon Project Act were for California, but some of the benefits were intended for all of the other six basin States, the chief one being to safeguard their interests in the river so that California would be limited and unable to take all of the advantages and benefits immediately in water and power as she expanded, and that a proper and just share should be reserved for each of the other States as they needed it.

Congress evidently thought the other States were safeguarded in the act of 1928. I verily believe that if the California interpretations of existing law should prevail, California would escape her limitation by these very clever definitions and interpretations. Those future interests of all the other Basin States which Congress wrote into the Boulder Canyon Project Act would be ineffective if her contention before this committee should prevail. Oh yes, I know they have been loud in their protestations that they intend to abide by the solemn covenant which California made in her act of limitation with the United States and with the six other Basin States. They say emphatically that they recognize that binding, solemn obligation, and propose to abide by it, and yet in my opinion they very cleverly evade, or try to evade, by their definitions and explanations and their interpretations, the effect of that provision. Twenty years have elapsed and Arizona needs some water, and yet if California's contentions prevail, there is none for Arizona.

Gentlemen of the committee, up to this time California has relied upon an act of Congress, and, as I have said, more than 35 acts of Congress, during a quarter of a century, have made possible the water which she is now getting. But these witnesses are protesting against a measure now pending in Congress which is designed to give Arizona some water out of the Colorado River. I will not say that the introduction of this resolution calling for a Supreme Court trial and decision was deliberately aimed to stymie consideration of such legislation as S. 1175 and also a bill introduced by myself on this side of the Capitol, but it certainly seems that such was the case. At least this resolution before you was introduced in the midst of hearings on the bill, S. 1175. While we are speaking of intent and results, I am not saying that the intent of the proponents of this resoluton is to cause interminable delay, but I am convinced that the effects of favorable action on the resolution by this committee and by Congress will mean interminable delay in litigation. Meanwhile, California is getting her water and none of her water rights are jeopardized, while the other basin States tragically in need of water must wait.

Gentlemen of the committee, the proponents of this resolution have talked about what they call the judicial character of the controversy, saying that terms used need judicial determination and definition. Your chairman the other day, with keen insight, inquired of one witness testifying in favor of this resolution, "How will the matter be settled if it goes to the Court? Will not further legislation be needed, and possibly further Court decisions?" Mr. Chairman, you were exactly right in raising those questions. Certainly, there must be much future legislation. There have already been more than 35 acts of Congress pertaining to the Colorado River, and the river is now only half developed. We may logically assume that there will be many subsequent acts of Congress necessary.

Does it not occur to the committee that it is rather ridiculous for the Congress of the United States to direct the Supreme Court of the United States to tell this Congress what the Congress in 1928 intended to do, and ask how later Congresses are to do it? This whole Colorado River development started out under congressional legislation based on the seven-State treaty, and it was plainly intended that it should be carried through by subsequent legislation. What has necessitated a change in procedure? Do you gentlemen, now Members of Congress, feel that you must ask the Supreme Court what Congress in 1928 intended, or do you feel competent to read the laws already enacted and to extend them as needed? Congress was competent in 1928 to start this great and beneficial program; surely Congress is competent in 1948 to carry it on. Therefore, I ask that you table this resolution.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say that the House Judiciary Committee took no action upon the resolutions which would have called for a Supreme Court decision in this water controversy. Nor was any action taken by a Senate committee on an identical resolution. It seems to me that at the present time there is no justiciable issue which would enable the Supreme Court to take jurisdiction. In view of the fact that it is apparent that these resolutions were filed in an effort to stymie legislation which was pending at the time in Congress to furnish Arizona a million acre-feet of water annually for the central Arizona project, the way ought to be cleared now for Congress to consider such legislation on its merit. Obviously, there is little chance of agreement and no chance of a reasonable further compromise in regard to the dispute between Arizona and California, and obviously it is not considered now to be a matter for judicial determination. Therefore, there ought not to be any further obstruction of the needed legislation to supplement the Boulder Canyon Project Act of 1928, which would merely give to Arizona the same consideration as has been given to California during the past 20 years.

Before and After the New Labor Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE MacKINNON
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 18 (legislative day of Thursday, June 17), 1948

Mr. MACKINNON. Mr. Speaker, the proof of the pudding is in the eating. The proof of a law is to be found in the changed conditions it brings about—what it does to the evils it seeks to remedy. The true standard by which to test the 1947 amendment to the Labor Relations Act is to note their actual effect on workers, management and the public. We should inquire whether strikes have increased or decreased since the new labor relations law became effective, whether workers' wages have increased or decreased under the law, whether workers are better off, or worse off, or just about the same.

The answers to these and associated questions set forth below are based on the regular reports of the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics. In this discussion the entire postwar period since VJ-day—August 15, 1945—is considered as that represents the whole of the present era. Obviously the conditions existing in the two prior periods, that is, the World War II period, and the prewar period, are not comparable, because conditions during those periods differed materially from present-day conditions.

STRIKES HAVE DECREASED

Strikes have decreased materially since the Labor-Management Relations Act became effective on August 22, 1947. Under the old law work stoppages averaged 395 per month. Under the new law they have been cut to an average of 201 per month. This represents a reduction in strikes of 49 percent.

From VJ-day until the new labor act the average number of workers involved in new strikes each month was 337,000. Since the act the average number of workers so involved is 131,000. This represents a cut of 61 percent under the new law.

From VJ-day until the new act the average number of man-days of idleness caused by work stoppages was 7,213,000 per month. Under the new law this figure has been cut to 2,613,000 days per month. This is the most important fact because it represents a great improvement in cutting actual pay-roll losses suffered by workers because of strikes. The reduction in this item is 64 percent. Conversely stated time lost through strikes before the act was more than two and a half times the time lost since passage of the act.

Supporting data is set forth in the following tables:

WAGES HAVE INCREASED

Accurate statistics on wages for this same period are also available in the official published reports of the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics. The key dates in any such comparison are, first, the starting period at VJ-day, August 15, 1945; second, the date the new labor relations law became effective, August 22, 1947; and third, the latest available date.

Comparative figures for these three vital dates are set forth below for the industries that are the most highly organized by labor unions and hence would be the quickest to feel the effect of legislation detrimental to labor unions. These industries are the manufacturing industry, the soft-coal industry, and the private building industry. Data on these three industries is set forth separately in table III and then added and averaged with equal basis being given to each industry in table IV. This analysis shows that under the new law wages have continued to rise, more leisure time has been made available through a shorter workweek, and the average hourly earnings have also increased.

During the 2-year period from VJ-day to the effective date of the Labor Act average hourly earnings increased 27 percent. From the passage of the act to the present date, a period of 7 months, average hourly earnings increased from 27 percent to 35 percent over the wages paid on VJ-day. Thus 8 percent of this increase was reflected during the 7 months from the passage of the act until March 1948.

For the same dates the increase in average weekly earnings was 26.6 percent and 30.7 percent, respectively. These figures reflect the shortened workweek.

PRICES AND COST OF LIVING

Now let us examine the relationship between prices and the cost of living during this same period. First, what were prices and the cost of living on VJ-day; second, what was the situation on the day the Labor Act became effective, August 22, 1947; and third, what is the situation today?

Here are the figures as reported by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics for prices and the cost of living for all items on the three dates in question:

TABLE V.—Prices and cost of living since VJ-day

	All items [1]	Increase since VJ-day
		Percent
VJ-day (Aug. 15, 1945)	129.3	----
When Labor Act became effective (Aug. 15, 1947)	160.3	24
Present time (latest available date, Mar. 15, 1948)	166.9	29

[1] As reported by U. S. Department of Labor in Monthly Labor Review, May 1948, p. 586.

WAGE INCREASES HAVE MORE THAN KEPT PACE WITH PRICE INCREASES

Next, to determine whether wages have kept pace with the cost of living, we should compare the percentage increase in the cost of living with the percentage increase in wages which occurred in the heavily unionized industries covered by table IV. Such comparison shows that hourly wages paid on VJ-day in these industries had increased 27 percent by the effective date of the new labor law and the increase in the cost of living during the same period was 24 percent. It also shows that under the new law hourly wages rose 35 percent and weekly earnings increased 30.7 percent over wages paid on VJ-day. For the same period the cost of living increased 29 percent. These statistics are compared in table VI:

TABLE VI.—Comparison of hourly wages paid in all manufacturing industries, bituminous-coal mining, and private building construction with the percentage increase in prices and the cost of living and monthly average of man-days lost through strikes

LABOR ACT WILL SAVE WORKERS ESTIMATED $1,000,000,000 IN FIRST YEAR

Thus the actual proof shows that labor has not been hurt by the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, but instead has been helped. Labor under the new law is continuing to improve their wages and hours of work and to keep abreast of the cost of living just as well, and in some respects a little better, than they did before the act was passed.

But the vital point is that these gains which labor is now making under the new law are being made much more frequently through peaceful collective bargaining, while before the new Labor Act these same gains more frequently required costly strikes. The ability to obtain wage increases peacefully without suffering severe losses in wages through time-consuming strikes is of incalculable benefit to wage earners. It means a better annual wage. Obviously increases in wage rates are of little benefit if the increases are lost to workers by costly strikes.

In the calendar year 1946, under the old law, workers lost 116,000,000 man-days because of strikes. Under the new law this figure has dropped to an average of 213,000 days per month lost through strikes. At the same rate for a year that would mean a loss of 31,356,000 man-days. This would mean a net saving under the new law of 84,644,000 man-days in 1 year over the 1946 experience.

At the present time the average hourly earnings in the three industries reported in table III is $1.649 per hour and workmen in these industries work an average 39-hour week, or 7.8 hours a day. Average earnings of this group is thus $12.86 a day. If the 84,644,000 man-days, which it is estimated will be saved in the first year under the new law, applied to this group of workers, or those with similar wages, it would mean that $1,088,521,840 would be saved for the workers' family budget to meet living expenses, instead of being lost to the workers through strikes as it was in the year 1946 before the new law. That $1,000,000,000 is just as much a wage increase as though it had been added to the hourly rate because it represents take-home pay that the worker will get and take home rather than lose through costly and time-consuming strikes.

That is a real benefit to all workers. It shows that the new labor law is providing real benefits to workers. Management and the public also benefit through continuing production of vital articles and commodities. In short, the new labor law is proving beneficial to labor, management, and the public.

No claim is made that this is an exhaustive analysis, but all statistics I have seen support the conclusion that this fairly represents in a general way the actual experience under the old law and under the new law.

Sol Bloom: Public Servant and Benefactor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 16, 1948

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the text of an address I delivered at a testimonial dinner at the Commodore Hotel in New York on Thursday, June 10, 1948, in honor of our dear colleague, SOL BLOOM, on the occasion of his completion of 25 years of distinguished service to the American people as a Member of this House. I also wish to include addresses delivered at this dinner by Attorney General Tom C. Clark, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, former Ambassador James W. Gerard, the noted news analyst Dr. Frank Kingdon, and the response by the Honorable SOL BLOOM, as well as some letters, telegrams, and newspaper clippings.

The text of my address follows:

SPEECH OF THE HONORABLE JOHN W. M'CORMACK

There comes a time in the life of every man who has lived a full, an active, a purposeful life, when he sits back and reflects upon man and the world, when he philosophizes on life—the meaning of life and its intricate and devious ways.

Recently a little book came to my attention, a book containing some thought-provoking reflections written by just such a person. In it I found the following views and ideas expressed in very clear and cogent language:

"All the woe of nations and men can be traced to failure or refusal to follow the truth that binds the universe together. Truth is right, justice, concord, fidelity, order, or any other word that fitly describes the universal harmony ordained by the Creator."

And a few pages further on I found another very timely and meaningful passage which I should like to quote:

"Where love abounds, there can be no hate or war. Hatred is evil, originating not in the loving God, but in ignorant, perverse man."

These quotations are taken from a little book of only 16 small pages, published a few months ago under the truest and most appropriate title that has ever come to my attention. The title of that book is "One With God Is a Majority," and its author is our dear friend, the Honorable SOL BLOOM, to whom we are paying such well-deserving tribute this evening.

SOL BLOOM is himself a characteristic example of a man who walks humbly with God, who forever seeks the ways of truth and love. He is the epitome of the well-rounded harmony in life to which we all aspire. He fears no man or any group of men, because he knows that being one with God is—a majority.

Tonight we are paying homage to him in recognition of his 25 years of service in the Congress of the United States. In any man's language, 25 years of public service is a great accomplishment, an experience to look back upon with great pride and joy.

And SOL BLOOM has much to be proud of. His patriotism to this country is proverbial. His faith in humanity and in the ultimate good of humanity is unshakable. His devotion to his own coreligionists is beyond any reproach. Never a pessimist at heart, he continues to dream of and work for a happier world, a world truly at peace.

He is the kind of a dreamer who perhaps should be classified as somewhat more in the nature of a philosopher—a philosopher of the people and for the people. By his very nature, his accomplishments over these many years, the position and the prestige he retains in the fabric of American life and leadership, BLOOM is in recent years emerging in the role of an elder statesman.

But far from looking back upon his many active years, SOL BLOOM prefers to look forward. Perhaps that is the secret of his youthful zeal and appearance, his clarity of mind, and his energy.

For some time now he has given much thought to the question of Palestine. Many of us, whether Jew or non-Jew, find ourselves thinking very often on this most perplexing problem. With BLOOM, however, it is not a new problem. He is reputed to be one of the first and earliest Zionists in the United States—and I know that he is personally very proud of that fact.

Surely you will agree with my contention that Palestine today is not only the overshadowing problem in Jewish life, but that it is also of vast importance in world affairs. The creation of the new state of Israel marks the culmination of the hopes and the aspirations of the Jewish people, who have suffered untold misery and persecution for many hundreds of years—much of it in our own twentieth century.

Despite these sufferings, Jews have never despaired of fighting for justice and righteousness, for liberty and democracy. Nor have they ever despaired of the hope of reestablishing their ancient homeland where they once made such magnificent and lasting contributions to the great religions of our day, and to western culture and civilization.

Now we are all witness to the historical fact that, by their own strength and their own zeal and resourcefulness and devotion and hard work and superhuman effort, the Jewish people have within the space of a single generation succeeded in revitalizing the state of Israel. I am happy in the knowledge that the new Jewish state will be a republic, very much in the image of our own Republic of the United States.

To my mind the recognition of Israel by the Government of the United States was a reasonable and natural step. When President Truman announced our recognition of Israel—and I rejoice in the fact that history will record that we were the first to extend such recognition—I felt that he had acted wisely and judiciously, that the course he had chosen was in the spirit of our own Declaration of Independence and of the Biblical command: "Proclaim liberty throughout the land and to all the inhabitants thereof."

That forthright action of the President has received the warm support of the overwhelming majority of the American people. There is not the slightest doubt in my mind today where the American people stand on the question of Palestine.

Our hearts and our prayers now turn to the problem of peace in that unhappy and war-torn country, which of late has forsaken the plow for the sword. We all hope and pray that peace will soon reign again in the Holy Land, and that the Jews of Israel will have the opportunity for which they have longed for so many centuries—the opportunity to build their homeland on an ancient and beloved soil.

It is in that spirit that I desire to greet my dear friend SOL BLOOM, in the spirit of the rejuvenation of his people. It is through him that I desire tonight to send my greetings to the valiant defenders of Israel and to assure them that our hearts and our thoughts are with them in their hour of crisis.

I am told that the proceeds of tonight's dinner will go for a great charitable institution in Jerusalem, a hospital which caters to the poor, and that this hospital has decided to name one of its new wings in honor of SOL BLOOM. This is indeed a great honor, and we are all proud that such honor has come to an American citizen. I hope and trust that the many friends and admirers of SOL BLOOM will make possible the erection of that wing in the very near future.

I am happy to join this illustrious gathering in paying public tribute to SOL BLOOM for his numerous accomplishments, and in recognition accorded him this evening for his capabilities as a statesman, which he has proved himself to be on many occasions during the past 25 years.

I consider SOL BLOOM one of the greatest and noblest persons I have ever met. I value and prize his friendship.

ADDRESS BY TOM C. CLARK, ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES

It is really heart warming to participate in this gathering. This is truly a love feast. The world needs more events of this nature. This is a testimonial to a friend of man who has become distinguished. I wish that there were more SOL BLOOMS on this earth—then there would be less pain.

You, his neighbors, know him—know him far better than my feeble words can express.

Our presence on this occasion demonstrates our affection and admiration for this noted statesman and humanitarian. He symbolizes America and he is a living example of the workings of our glorious democracy. His 25 years of service in the Halls of Congress, fearlessly devoted to the public good, has gained for him fame and honor here and throughout the world.

Stemming from a race of people as old as time itself, as chairman of the House of Representatives Foreign Affairs Committee, he has won the respect and esteem of all races and creeds.

I wish that a picture of this happy assembly could be televised to every home all over the world. If that could be done, understanding and brotherhood would supplant the bigotry and hate that are keeping lands in turmoil and the world quivering. Yes, the world needs more testimonial dinners—dinners inspired by men like the one to whom we are paying tribute here tonight. His personal glories are too voluminous to recount at this time. But there is one that he, himself, loves to boast about, and that is that he is George Washington's press agent.

His wide knowledge of American history, together with a patriot's zeal and a humane heart, drove him into the thick of every legislative fight that involved human happiness. Walking with the mighty, understanding the needs of the lowly, he dreams of a happier and better world for all peoples.

The crowning glory of his full life is his effort to help in reshaping and in rebuilding the world for future generations.

He has followed the ideal that man by nature is good, that his inborn instincts point in the direction of justice, liberty, and cooperation.

It is a most fitting recognition that the 100-year-old hospital in Palestine should construct a special wing and name it in honor of this benefactor of mankind. As in the noble Hebraic tradition, this institution of healing, as well as other Jewish hospitals in the State of Israel, will render service, as always, to men, women, and children, regardless of race, color, or creed.

Yes, faith, hope, and charity nestle in the tender heart of him whom we toast tonight. His broad sympathy and deep compassion, his comprehension, and insight, have made him sensitive to the longings of peoples everywhere. Hate finds no lodging in the soul of his race.

A long time ago he learned that men do not gather "grapes of thorns," nor "figs of thistles"—that a civilization of peace and happiness must be built out of peace and happiness in the minds and hearts of men.

He realizes the great need to spread broadly a deep regard for the dignity of man. And that is exactly what they are doing in Palestine—recognizing the dignity of man—in between the falling of bombs and the rain of machine-gun bullets, a woe-beset people are building an addition to a hospital. That's man in the image of God—man's innermost desire to save, not to kill—to build, not to destroy. Let us and peoples everywhere take heart from this noble deed of a brave people.

May the day soon come when the world will turn to the erection of such missions of mercy rather than digging graves of sorrow for fallen warriors.

Yes, the time has come to follow the example of the Blooms and carry out the gospel of love, of botherhood, and of self-sacrifice. We must help to give rebirth to hope in the human heart.

Searching questions are found in the opening chapter of Genesis.

"Cain, where art thou?"

"Where is Abel, thy brother?"

All must answer these questions: "Where are you? What are you doing for your country and the world?"

"Where is your brother? What are you doing for him?"

And it matters not whether our brother belongs to our Nation or another nation. We are all brothers under God. He intended it to be so.

Ours is the task to help build a world in which people may live free from fear and terror, where children may grow up unafraid; where justice reigns for all men, and where the spirit of brotherhood extends across and beyond all barriers of faith and race. Why can't it be so?

An enduring temple of peace must rest upon a foundation of good will—respect for the rights of others, willingness to understand their viewpoints and to sacrifice one's own interests for the good of all.

There is a common ground upon which all men may meet—liberty, justice, equal opportunity for all.

As we understand more fully the world problems and relationship of our country to them, we can exert a definite influence for peace.

We must all be citizens of the great republic of humanity. Just because we may think internationally, it does not mean that we are less national.

One of the founding fathers said, "Our wisest policy is peace and friendship with all mankind." He was no less American because he was world-minded.

We must have a deep concern for the well-being of all humanity, and strive to bring about liberty and justice for all.

We must wage the peace as we waged the war.

We must be strong to protect that which we have from those nations who recognize only force; but we must also strive through education to bring about peace and understanding among peoples everywhere.

As has been truly said, "If civilization cannot destroy armaments, armaments will destroy civilization."

The task that lies before us individually and collectively is almost heaven inspired.

Our beloved President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, stated the position of our Nation in these words:

"Our Nation has held forth for its own guidance and for the guidance of other nations, this great torch of liberty of human thought, liberty of human conscience. We will never lower it."

And that noble American woman, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, is helping to keep alive the flame to light the way and guide humanity to freedom and happiness. As Chairman of the Commission on Human Rights, she is tirelessly and continuously at work on a world bill of rights.

The torch of the Jewish people for a homeland of their own has burned for thousands of years. Today the torch has lighted the way to the new nation of Israel. Webster's dictionary does not contain the word "despair" for such a courageous people. Thousands of years of exile, dispersion, blood, and tears has proved that to a world that is now ready to applaud.

Our Government will do everything within its power to help all the people—both Arab and Jew—in the new nation of Israel and other parts of Palestine. Its people shall find new life in their own homes and build gardens where desert sands have covered God's good earth.

I am proud—yes, so proud—that our country, through the action of our great President, Harry S. Truman, was the first in the world to recognize the new nation of Israel. It has been brought into the family of nations—in the spirit of peace. May it be developed in peace.

More blood spilt upon the soil of Palestine will not serve God. A united effort must be put forth by all the nations of the world to find a way to help both peoples live in friendship.

As I stand before you here tonight, let us hope and pray that the blessed ray of light which yesterday broke through the terrible storm, bringing a long-awaited truce, may widen and widen until it dissipates all the dark and heavy clouds of war and suffering that envelop the beloved Holy Land.

And when the morrow dawns, may all the voices in that stricken land ring out, echoing and reechoing over the universe: "Peace on earth, good will to men." May the joyous shouts rise—not for 30 days, not even for 30 years, but for evermore.

It is noteworthy and gratifying that in the declaration of independence of the Republic of Israel, the new government extended the hand of friendship to the Arab citizens of the Republic and a guaranty of full democratic, economic, political, and social freedom for all of the people of that land. This is in the great American tradition.

The peace of the world is bound up with the freedom and happiness of the people of the Near East. Unless civilization can be restored in the areas where it has been badly damaged, sooner or later those spots will threaten our own existence. Science has so shrunk time and space—so diminished the size of the earth and drawn closely together peoples everywhere—that we cannot, even if we wished, isolate the weak sectors of civilization.

To keep civilization strong, it must be restored where it is weak. History tells us that.

The fall of Rome had its beginning in the decadence of the far-away places of the Roman Empire. What happens in the far-away places can cause our downfall also.

The smoking ruins in war-torn lands left more than physical destruction—they left an appalling spiritual devastation. The destruction of war is always spiritual as well as material.

Stripped of security, a world of broken ideals behind them, values of life trampled upon, faith in themselves and faith in mankind blasted, and the lamp of hope gone out, the desperate victims of the recent holocaust look to see if the stars of America are shining.

And the stars of America must continue to shine.

Through the ages, men have dreamed of, struggled toward, fought for, and died for the concept that nothing on earth is more sacred than human personality—that there is in the human soul a place inviolate, where no government or men may enter. Thousands of wars have been fought, countless millions have died that this ideal might one day become a living reality for all men everywhere. Through democracy's path we are headed toward that goal.

We Americans cannot forget our brothers across the seas.

We have tried the hermit's game—and with what tragic results. They are still fresh in our memory.

This time there can be no retreat into isolationism.

Humanity is indivisible.

Freedom is indivisible.

Justice is indivisible.

In our present practice of the eternal mandate to do good—to heal the sick, give relief to the suffering—lies our greatest strength, our greatest protection.

Yet there are some who in this critical hour would deliberately wreck the Marshall plan. They would wilfully break our country's solemn pledge to liberty-loving peoples as they struggle to recover their freedom and escape the grasping clutches of ruthless dictators.

For not in frowning battlements, not in huge armies, not in two-ocean navies, not in mighty air armadas lies our future.

Oh, yes; these are all essential—vitally essential—in a world of power-mad men. However, in the final analysis the hope of the world rests in people who cherish in their hearts the love of liberty which the Divine planted there. Freedom and all the happiness that goes with it must become the heritage of all men all over the world.

If the vision of freemen is to be realized, human resources must be conserved and developed and human beings must be equipped spiritually, mentally, and physically. The SOL BLOOM wing of the Bicur Cholim Hospital is truly a fitting tribute to a man who has spent his life in furthering this cause.

With faith in God, we will meet the challenge of our age. We will surmount its difficulties.

We shall fight for the right that needs assistance, against the wrong that lacks resistance, for the future in the distance, and the good that we can do.

ADDRESS DELIVERED BY MRS. ELEANOR ROOSEVELT

Mr. Chairman, Mr. BLOOM, the Attorney General, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, I am sorry that I had to arrive late, but these days I am spending a great deal of time out at Lake Success, and it does not leave one very much time to do anything else. But I am very glad that I could get here to be with you and take part in this tribute to a very grand person, a man who has served with such distinction in Congress and who has helped many other people through his congressional career, but who has also always had a great interest in things which were philanthropic and which helped his fellow men.

I am sure that he is happy tonight that his name will be part of a hospital in Palestine.

I want very much to add just one word of deep appreciation for the very many things which I happen to know that Mr. BLOOM has done for individuals, things which brought him no return.

Many of us know of things that are done which bring a return at least in appreciation by many people, but the things which are done for individuals may take a great deal of time and bring one very little in the way of recognition, and so I would like to speak of the personal things to which I know that Congressman BLOOM has given a great deal of his time.

I know of a refugee, for instance, who would never have gained citizenship if it had not been for the untiring efforts of this kind gentleman. She came to see me and her story was one of the most moving stories. I could think of no one who could help her except Congressman BLOOM. I found she had already been to him, so his reputation had already spread abroad for kindness and willingness to help other people.

I come across things all the time, and I am always discovering new things. I didn't know until I got word about this dinner that he had connections with a particular hospital. Constantly, I am finding new things that he had done. So I am very glad to be able to come and be with you.

Now I am going to tell about one of the things which he did for me which he has probably forgotten but which I think will amuse you.

It happens that I am a very impatient person about things that don't seem to me very important, and some time ago, when you (turning to Representative SOL BLOOM) and I were once in London, I complained rather bitterly that it seemed to me the gentlemen—particularly the gentlemen in Congress—could grow very passionate about points of procedure and take a great deal of time. You looked at me very sternly and you said, "You had better learn they are very important. If your procedure isn't properly laid down you will find yourself in a great deal of trouble."

Well, I watched and listened and I learned. But I have to tell you, sir, that with all your teaching I still get into a great deal of trouble on procedure.

I now preside over the Human Rights Commission, and I spend hours there. I leave home at 9:30 in the morning and I don't get home until 6:30 or 7 at night, and during the day my life was made miserable by two things: One thing—the impossibility of getting the legal points of view of the countries that are under Napoleonic Code and the countries that function under the common law of Great Britain and the United States to come together and find that they can work together. Then, when you do find that you think you have got the legal aspects all right, then you find that in Russian it means one thing and in Spanish it means another and in French still another and in English still another; and how are you going to get all those things to mean the same thing in all the different languages?

By the time you have discussed first what the meaning is in all those languages and then whether the legal phraseology is correct, then you get one amendment after another and you can't keep straight which amendment is furthest away, and you end the day having worked all day and having not yet decided what shall be the purpose of education.

That is what we did today.

All my loyal friends are very much amused because they always thought that I was very impatient about these legal points, but now I have to be patient no matter what happens; I have to sit and listen and I have to hear all the different points of view.

Seriously, I can't think of Congressman BLOOM without thinking that he probably is one of the people who stands most stanchly for the things that we hope to achieve, even though we laugh at the difficulties we have. I think he would agree with me that fundamental rights for the people of the world are very important gains toward achieving peace, and I think that probably the life and the work and the service of Congressman BLOOM exemplify efforts to achieve fundamental rights and freedoms of people here in his own country, and efforts to make it possible for other people the world over to work to achieve these same ends.

So I wish you long life and added service. May we be here to thank you many years in the future. [Applause.]

ADDRESS DELIVERED BY HON. JAMES W. GERARD

Our beloved SOL BLOOM, the Attorney General, the other distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, it is a privilege to be allowed to preside over this dinner tendered in recognition of his splendid work for his country—the Representative SOL BLOOM.

For 26 years he has served us in the House of Representatives, 10 or 12 of those years as chairman and always member of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs.

A French author once said that the fourteenth century was the "century of fury," on account of its wars and disturbances. I think we can apply that term to our own century, and during the recent wars and disturbances in this country and in the world, SOL BLOOM has carried on successfully his splendid work.

I wish that he had always succeeded in having a hand in the foreign policy of these United States. I am sure that, after having decreed the partition of Palestine, he would never have consented to take back suddenly that gift.

Nicholas Murray Butler, president at Columbia University, and preeminent in his knowledge of foreign affairs, told me that he often consulted with SOL BLOOM.

And so it is, in the evening of his days, at the peak of his career, we, his friends in this city, delight to honor this quiet, tactful, efficient, loyal, good American, SOL BLOOM.

You know that this dinner has another object; that is, to raise funds for this hospital wing in Jerusalem to be named for him.

Eighteen hundred and seventy-eight years ago, Titus, the son of the emperor Vespasian, captured Jerusalem after a siege in which the Jews defended themselves with unexampled valor. But they could not prevail against the legions abroad. Jerusalem was destroyed and the people killed or sold into slavery or scattered over the face of the earth.

Now, after all those years, owing to the patriotism, the devotion of the Jewish people, the Jewish state once more appears.

And how those Jews can fight. If we only give them arms—they need them—we need have no fear of the five surrounding nations that now attack them.

ADDRESS DELIVERED BY DR. FRANK KINGDON

Mr. Ambassador, Mr. Attorney General, Congressman BLOOM, ladies, and gentlemen, I am delighted to find myself on a platform with a Member of the present Congress that I can praise.

It is an honor, in our national House of Representatives, to have a man of distinction, conscience, and ability like SOL BLOOM. I am very glad to be able to have a part in honoring him.

This is the year 1948. It isn't 1947 and it isn't 1946; it is 1948. It is one of those years that will go down in the history of the world as long as any history of mankind is told or songs of heroism are sung. It is the year when Israel has come to birth.

There have been peoples in previous generations who have lived through their time and historians have said that those times were historic times, but the generations themselves did not realize how historic their epochs were.

We are in a more fortunate position. We know that this is an historic year. We know that this is one of the dates that will always be remembered as long as people talk about those who have made the world a better place in which to live.

Not only has Israel been born; Israel is going to stay alive and independent, even though the great empires of the world use every bit of their resources to crush it, because there is something that lives in Israel that no empire and no great power can kill, and that is the dual love of the soil and of independence which is making the people of Israel a strong, a determined and a permanent people.

You see, the trouble with these foreign offices, whether they happen to be in London or Washington is that they have experts on the Near East. Now, every expert on the Near East knows that every government in the Near East is for sale, and any good expert in any of our foreign offices has the table of the prices at which you purchase the princes and the generals of the Near East.

When they think about the Middle East, even now, they think they are dealing with that which was true yesterday, and they still think that everybody in the Middle East has his price.

But something new has happened in the Middle East. A nation has been born for which there is no price, led by men who cannot be bribed or corrupted or made the vassals of any greater state. That is the new fact with which these foreign governments do not seem able to come to terms.

Certainly, you can buy a mercenary; certainly you can buy an Arab. It has been part of the business of the Middle East to buy and sell men, because men have been cheaper than oil. But something has happened which takes that whole bargaining for money out of the world of the Middle East, and it is only as the great powers understand that that they will be able to deal with this new and vigorous youthful country, which is not only going to be something new but to create something new in the Middle East—a new democracy, a new lamp of liberty that will shine where that light has never been seen.

As an American citizen, proud of the fact that men who loved their soil and loved independence took up their independence and beat down an empire that sought to enslave them generations ago, my hope is that my country will not hesitate to stand with all it has behind those who have the spirit of freedom that made our own country come to birth and grow in power.

This is not something strange to us that is happening in that ancient land; this is something that we know, something that is flesh and blood of our blood as Americans.

Oh, yes, you hear them say, "Aren't they a little overzealous? Wouldn't it be better if they were just a little more tactful? Perhaps they ought not to be so extreme in their actions."

That is what they used to say about Washington. The boys met in the First Congress and they said, "This man Washington, if only he would be just a little more reasonable. After all, you don't have to have an army watching all the time. You can be a little more careful about things." And George Washington, the man who, unfornately, has been so caricatured by Gilbert Stuart that he looks like somebody who knew nothing but a monumental calm, was the passionate extremist of his day, who said that freemen should never, never, never accept the tyranny of any empire over their own country. It is that spirit which marches tonight in Palestine.

Those men and women of Israel are going to fight. I don't know what this truce is going to amount to. Perhaps it really means that we are going to take four weeks to settle the issue of Palestine. We can settle it if we have any interest in justice. If we put the value of peace above the value of commercial advantage, we can settle it in the 4 weeks; there is no doubt about that.

When I say "we" I mean the western democracies, with our own country playing a great part.

Not an Arab is going to march unless he gets the O. K. of Britain; not a bullet is going to be fired by any of those Arabs unless they have the consent of London. How can they? These men are the vassals and the puppets of the British Empire and British money. If Britain has any intention of finding a just solution, the Arab armies who were stopped for the truce will be stopped permanently.

We can take the lead because Israel will listen to us. It will never bow to us, but it will listen to us.

The United States and Britain in the next 4 weeks can settle this matter permanently, unless utter selfish stupidity governs one or the other or both. But this I say to Britain, and this I would echo in the rooms of our State Department: If there is treachery in this truce and if these are 4 weeks stolen to give the Arabs time to arm and to mobilize their forces, that treachery will not stop the people of Israel from fighting; they will fight until the last drop of their blood has been shed, and the responsibility for the shedding of that blood will be upon the masters of empire who have cheated the people out of their claim to independence.

Let it further be said that American public opinion will rally behind the cause of Israel as it has not rallied in recent years behind any cause presented to us.

The year 1948—and it is now not Israel that is on trial; it is now not the dream of the Jews that is on trial—it is now the great democratic governments that are on trial. For these 4 weeks are going to test whether we mean what we say when we talk about liberty, when we talk about justice, or whether we are using them merely as empty words. For in these weeks the world will learn and know whether the great democracies stand for humanity, for the stabilization of the world, or whether they stand only for selfish interest and for national greed.

We are talking tonight about a great institution that is dedicated to the healing of the bodies of those who suffer. To that institution, with all fitness, we are proposing to add a new wing to be named for a man who, in American public life, has never hesitated to stand for liberty and for justice.

I honor SOL BLOOM. I hope that we shall be generous in our later gifts for the memorial to him.

More than the man, I honor the principle which has made this country great, because in terms of that kind of national greatness we can enjoy the greatness and the service of a citizen who knows what freedom is, and under its bright sun can grow in strength and in power.

America, the leader of liberty, now stands in the position to take that liberty and make it manifest in the Middle East, in the strength and the fulfillment of the life of the people of Israel, who will give to liberty their loyalty and to mankind such treasures as only a great, free people can give. [Applause.]

TEXT OF ADDRESS BY THE HONORABLE SOL BLOOM

I am very happy to see so many of my good friends here tonight. In the days and months ahead I shall remember the kind words that have been said about me this evening, but most of all I shall remember the faces of my friends who came to share in my joy.

Although the honor given me tonight is most pleasant and exciting, I must warn you that I shall not allow myself the luxury of being swept off my feet. I am far too level-headed for that—certainly at this day and age, and in these critical times which we are experiencing.

While in my heart there is a feeling of deep gratitude to each and every one of you for your presence here this evening and for your kind words, I know that I am not disclosing any great secrets when I tell you that we are here also for another purpose.

Let me make a few brief observations first about the recent developments in connection with Palestine, before I proceed to tell you about our other purpose. The creation and rebirth of a Jewish state in Palestine is of such great historic significance that we, who live in this period and have witnessed the birth-pangs of this new state, do not as yet grasp the full meaning and the value of this historic event.

The rebirth of the new Jewish state Israel symbolizes far more than the realization of the dream which our fathers and forefathers have dreamed and the prayers which they said in their synagogues for nearly 2,000 years. The fact that a Jewish state is today a reality has given new meaning to Jewish life, it has aroused a new spirit and a new hope that Israel will once again be an equal member in the family of nations, and it has resulted in a new determination and a new sense of unity among Jews everywhere to contribute to the welfare and civilization of the world by making Israel a model state.

Never in their long history have Jews been so united on a problem as they are today on the question of Palestine and the new Jewish state in Palestine. But not only to Jews does the creation of the Jewish state have concrete and definite meaning. To the nations of the world, particularly the democratic and liberty-loving nations, the Jewish state of Israel is today a beacon of light which casts its rays in two distinct directions, both of which hold great promise of realization in our own day:

First, there is the hope and the promising possibility that in the near future Israel will absorb several hundred thousand Jews who are now languishing in DP camps or are in utter despair in the countries of central and eastern Europe where their present is insecure and their future is hopeless. Their dream is resettlement in Palestine, and to these destitute and homeless survivors Israel will be more than a mere haven of refuge—it will be home itself, it will be a final return to the Promised Land. In this way, Israel should render invaluable help in solving the DP problem, which the nations of the world have not been able to cope with too successfully.

Second, the state of Israel is to be a bulwark and an outpost of true democracy in a region of the world which as yet does not know the meaning of democracy as we know it in the United States. Through its political, social, and economic achievements, Israel should become an inspiration for its neighbors in the Middle East who live under a system of political and social oppression and economic exploitation.

President Truman's recognition of Israel is consistent with the best and noblest of American tradition. The courageous people of Israel are still in the midst of a struggle to safeguard their independence and defend the borders of their state. We in this country, who experienced our great struggle for independence more than a century and a half ago, must now aid this new state in every conceivable way—morally, politically, financially.

I should like to see this country implement at this time President Truman's offer of 2 years ago to assist in transporting the Jewish DP's from the camps in Europe to the shores of Israel. I should like to see this country grant a loan of $100,000,000 to Israel, as requested recently in Washington by Dr. Chaim Weizmann, for the purposes of reconstruction and upbuilding of Israel when the war in Palestine is brought to an end, as it should be immediately. I should also like to see a great movement in this country of American friends of the Jewish state of Israel to help that state during its difficult and formative years.

I spoke a moment ago of reconstruction and upbuilding. Of primary importance, perhaps, will be the need for restitution of health to a weary and war-shattered people. Some of the hospitals in the Holy Land have been destroyed in the fighting there in recent weeks. Existing hospitals are not able to cope with the great demand on their services at this time and will have to be enlarged and expanded.

This is where we come in this evening. For many years I have taken an active interest in the Bicur Cholim Hospital in Jerusalem, a great charitable institution which caters to, and cares almost exclusively for, the poor, who would otherwise not be in any position to receive medical attention. The destruction resulting from the recent fighting in Jerusalem; the dire need of the Jewish masses there who for many weeks have gone without sufficient food and medical supplies; and also the expected large Jewish immigration to Palestine in the months and years ahead—all of these factors make it most urgent to undertake immediate expansion of this hospital.

We shall be supporting a just, a worthy, an honorable cause. And so, if I give you my assurance that I shall remember your kind words this evening, I want to give you my double assurance that most of all I shall remember your deeds and your response tonight. To struggle for a good and just cause is difficult, but when we attain our goal, when we realize the good it is doing for humanity, we know that the effort and heartache were not in vain.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I desire to place in the RECORD the text of a telegram by President Truman addressed to the Honorable SOL BLOOM at the testimonial dinner given to our colleague on June 10 in honor of a quarter of a century of service in Congress. I might add that the dinner was sponsored by the friends in America of the Bicur Cholim Hospital in Jerusalem, which will build an additional wing to be called the Sol Bloom Wing.

From the large batch of congratulatory letters and telegrams to SOL BLOOM, I have chosen a few which I am inserting in the RECORD, including that of the late Secretary of Labor Lewis B. Schwellenbach, who wrote his letter just a few days before he died; a letter by Mayor O'Dwyer, of New York; a telegram by Philip B. Perlman, Solicitor General of the Department of Justice; and several other telegrams.

They are as follows:

Hon. SOL BLOOM,
Hotel Commodore:

Congratulations on your twenty-fifth anniversary. May the Almighty give you strength to continue noble deed you have done for mankind.

Grand Rabbi BERL SHAPIRO.

Mr. Speaker, I now wish to insert into the RECORD two brief letters by two of the most distinguished leaders in the world today. Before I do so, however, I should like to explain the origin of these letters. One letter is by President Truman and is dated May 15, 1948; the other is by Dr. Chaim Weizmann, the President of Israel, and is dated 1 day later, May 16, 1948. There is a story to these letters.

One of the most ardent friends of the Jewish cause in Palestine, one of the most consistent fighters for an independent Jewish state in Palestine since the days of the Balfour Declaration, and one who has for many decades been a supporter of Jewish charitable and religious institutions in the Holy City of Jerusalem is the Honorable SOL BLOOM. During the past few years, in particular, he has been very helpful in advancing the cause for the establishment of a Jewish national home. He applied his influence, his prestige, and his wise counsel in that direction in the Congress of the United States, at international conferences of the United Nations in San Francisco, London, and New York, and on numerous other occasions.

More recently he has been active in gaining support for United Nations recognition of the partition of Palestine and the establishment of a Jewish state, for United States support of the implementation of the partition decision of the United Nations, and finally for the recognition of the state of Israel by the United States.

The state of Israel, as is known, came into being on May 15, 1948. Two days earlier, when it had been definitely ascertained that a new Jewish state was to be proclaimed on May 15, Representative SOL BLOOM sent a lengthy telegram to President Truman strongly urging him to extend immediate recognition to Israel, thereby making the United States the first country in the world to recognize the Jewish state.

As we all well know by now, President Truman acted promptly and wisely, recognizing Israel when it was only a few minutes old. But what is not widely known, however, is the fact that on that same day, May 15, he openly acknowledged and expressed his appreciation to SOL BLOOM for his wise and statesmanlike counsel to take that step. Mr. Speaker, at this point I should like to place in the RECORD the brief letter of President Truman, which speaks for itself:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, May 15, 1948.

Hon. SOL BLOOM,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SOL: I appreciated your telegram of the 13th very much. I hope things worked out to your satisfaction.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

One day later, Dr. Chaim Weizmann took time out from his busy schedule in New York to write a letter to the gentleman from New York, SOL BLOOM, acknowledging his valuable assistance in furthering the Jewish cause in Palestine. The letter from the President of Israel, likewise, speaks for itself:

THE WALDORF-ASTORIA,
New York, May 16, 1948.

Congressman SOL BLOOM,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BLOOM: Before my departure from this country, I would like to take the opportunity of sending you my heartfelt wishes and thanks for all the valuable assistance which you have rendered to the cause of the Jewish national revival throughout this difficult period. I think the consummation of our hopes which has now taken place ought to constitute by itself the richest reward, and any words of mine are really superfluous.

I hope you will be given many years to continue your good work and that we shall be able to count upon your help and advice to meet the difficulties which, I fear, we may still have to overcome in the near future.

With warmest regards,

Yours very sincerely,

CHAIM WEIZMANN.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I am placing in the RECORD several news stories and editorials about the gentleman from New York, SOL BLOOM, in conjunction with the dinner given in his honor. These are as follows: Clark Asks Action for Lasting Peace, New York Times, June 11; Palestine Accord Urged by Clark at Sol Bloom Dinner, New York World-Telegram, June 11; BLOOM Honored at a Dinner Here, New York Sun, June 11; Honor Congressman BLOOM at Dinner, New York Daily Mirror, June 11; editorial entitled "The Dinner for SOL BLOOM," translated from the Jewish Morning Journal, of New York, June 10; news report entitled "United States Will Help Bring Peace to Israel, Says Attorney General," translated from the Jewish Morning Journal, of New York, June 11; news report entitled "Attorney General Clark at Banquet for SOL BLOOM," translated from the Jewish Day, of New York, June 10; news report entitled "National Leaders Join in Paying Tribute to Congressman SOL BLOOM," from the Jewish Advocate, of Boston, Mass., June 17; and a brief item from Drew Pearson's column in the New York Sunday Mirror, May 23, entitled "Recognizing Israel"; and a telegram from Rabbi Alexander S. Teitelbaum, of the Bronx, N. Y., May 16:

CLARK ASKS ACTION FOR LASTING PEACE—CALLS ON ALL NATIONS TO JOIN IN ENDING NEAR EAST WAR—SOL BLOOM HONORED

Tom Clark, United States Attorney General, called last night for joint action by all nations to bring about a speedy and lasting peace between the Arabs and Jews in the Near East.

Mr. Clark spoke at a dinner at the Commodore Hotel honoring Representative SOL BLOOM on his completion of 25 years of service in Congress. Mr. Clark paid tribute to Mr. BLOOM as a statesman and humanitarian.

President Truman also praised Mr. BLOOM. In a telegram read at the dinner, which was attended by 500 persons, the President said:

"It is a pleasure to send hearty felicitations and warmest personal greetings to all who are honoring you for long and faithful service to your country and oppressed people everywhere. It is particularly fitting that an addition to Bicur Cholim Hospital in Jerusalem should bear your honored name. Hearty congratulations and every good wish."

Proceeds of the dinner will be used to establish the SOL BLOOM wing of the Bicur Cholim Hospital, which Mr. BLOOM has been active in helping.

In his plea for peace in the Near East, Mr. Clark said:

"Our Government will do everything in its power to help all the people, both Arab and Jew, in the new nation of Israel and other parts of Palestine.

"More blood spilt upon the soil of Palestine will not serve God. A united effort must be put forth by all the nations of the world to find a way to help both peoples live in friendship."

Mr. Clark said that Mr. BLOOM symbolized America and that his 25 years of service in Congress "fearlessly devoted to the public good has gained for him fame and honor here and throughout the world."

Representative JOHN W. MCCORMACK of Massachusetts, minority leader of the House, sent a message praising Mr. BLOOM and declaring that the recognition of Israel by this Government was a reasonable and natural step.

"When President Truman announced our recognition of Israel, I felt that he had acted wisely and judiciously, that the course he had chosen was in the spirit of our own Declaration of Independence," he said.

Mr. BLOOM said the fact that the state of Israel was today a reality had given new meaning to Jewish life. He declared that never in their history had the Jews been so united on a problem as they were on the question of Palestine, and that the state of Israel was a beacon of light to the nations of the world. He expressed the hope that a loan of $100,000,000 would be granted to Israel by the United States.

Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt praised Mr. BLOOM for his services to individuals who needed help here and abroad. She described him as a distinguished statesman who always had evidenced great interest in humanitarian affairs.

James W. Gerard, former Ambassador to Germany and chairman of the dinner committee, introduced Mrs. Roosevelt and Attorney General Clark.

PALESTINE ACCORD URGED BY CLARK AT SOL BLOOM DINNER—NOTABLES HONOR CONGRESSMAN 25 YEARS IN CAPITOL

A world-wide effort to bring about lasting peace between the Israelis and Arabs in Palestine was urged last night by Attorney General Tom Clark.

Mr. Clark made his appeal at a dinner honoring Representative SOL BLOOM (Democrat, New York) for his completion of 25 years of service in Congress at the Hotel Commodore. Other speakers were Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt and James W. Gerard, former Ambassador to Germany.

"What this world needs is more SOL BLOOMS," Mr. Clark continued. "He is a living example of the workings of our glorious democracy. His 25 years of service in the Halls of Congress, fearlessly devoted to the public good, has gained for him fame and honor here and throughout the world."

URGES ARAB-JEW ACCORD

In discussing Palestine, Mr. Clark declared:

"Our Government will do everything within its power to help all the people—both Arab and Jew—in the new nation of Israel and other parts of Palestine.

"More blood spilt upon the soil of Palestine will not serve God. A united effort must be put forth by all the nations of the world to find a way to help both peoples live in friendship."

MESSAGE FROM TRUMAN

A message from President Truman was read at the dinner, attended by more than 500 persons. It said:

"It is a pleasure to send hearty felicitations and warmest personal greetings to all who are honoring you for long and faithful service to your country and oppressed peoples everywhere.

"It is particularly fitting that an addition to Bicur Cholim Hospital in Jerusalem should bear your honored name. Hearty congratulations and every good wish."

BLOOM HONORED AT A DINNER HERE

A united effort by all the nations of the world to bring lasting peace in Palestine was urged by Attorney General Clark last night at the Hotel Commodore, at a dinner honoring Representative SOL BLOOM, Democrat, of New York, on his completion of 25 years of service in Congress. Proceeds from the dinner will be used for the Sol Bloom wing of the Bicur Cholim Hospital in Jerusalem.

"Our Government will do everything in its power to help all the people, both Arab and Jew, in the new nation of Israel and other parts of Palestine," Clark said. "More blood spilt upon the soil of Palestine will not serve God. A united effort must be put forth by all the nations of the world to find a way to help both peoples live in friendship."

In his speech, BLOOM expressed the hope that the United States will grant a loan of $100,000,000 to Israel.

Some of the program, including a speech by Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, was broadcast over Station WMCA from 10 to 10:30 p. m. Messages also were read from President Truman, who praised BLOOM for "long and faithful service to your country and oppressed people everywhere," and from Representative JOHN W. MCCORMACK, Democrat, of Massachusetts, minority leader of the House. James W. Gerard, former Ambassador to Germany, introduced the speakers.

HONOR CONGRESSMAN BLOOM AT DINNER

Representative SOL BLOOM, veteran New York Congressman, was honored last night, for more than a quarter of a century of humanitarian service, at a dinner at the Hotel Commodore, attended by 600 local, State, and national figures.

Highlight of the event was presentation to BLOOM of a silver medal for his long years of assistance to the Bicur Cholim Hospital in Jerusalem. The medal was presented by Rabbi Meyer Shapiro.

Attorney General Tom Clark, one of the speakers, acclaimed the 78-year-old Congressman for his long service in the House. Similar praise was spoken by Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt.

Among the guests was Babe Ruth, an old friend of BLOOM's. Master of ceremonies was Harry Hershfield, noted humorist, after-dinner speaker, and Mirror columnist.

THE DINNER FOR SOL BLOOM

Congressman SOL BLOOM, who recently reached the age of 78, has surely earned the honor being given him by Jews and non-Jews alike. The dinner tonight at the Commodore Hotel in his honor, however, goes beyond merely extending recognition to Congressman BLOOM. It is also dedicated to a worthy institution in Jerusalem—the Bicur Cholim Hospital in the Holy City.

The Bicur Cholim Hospital, one of the oldest institutions of the old Jewish community, has always occupied an important place in the Holy City. In the current tragic moment, when Jerusalem has experienced and will probably continue to experience a difficult period, this hospital assumes even greater importance.

It is a well-known fact that the Bicur Cholim Hospital is now overcrowded with the wounded—wounded fighters for Israel who were injured by Arab bullets. Even the corridors are crammed beyond capacity. Much of this overcrowded condition is due to the fact that the Hadassah Hospital was almost totally destroyed and it further entails some risk to reach it because it is too remote, whereas the Bicur Cholim Hospital is in the very center of Jerusalem.

The purpose of tonight's dinner in honor of SOL BLOOM is to create a fund for the construction of a wing to the Bicur Cholim Hospital which will be named for Congressman BLOOM. It is a purpose which will surely find a warm response in Jewish hearts and which deserves the full support of the Jewish public.

UNITED STATES WILL HELP BRING PEACE TO ISRAEL, SAYS ATTORNEY GENERAL

"The United States will do everything in its power to help all the people, both Arab and Jew, in the new nation of Israel and other parts of Palestine. I am proud that our country was the first in the world to recognize the new nation of Israel." These statements were expressed by Attorney General Tom C. Clark at a dinner last night sponsored by the Bicur Cholim Hospital of Jerusalem in honor of Congressman SOL BLOOM, who has completed a quarter of a century of service in the United States Congress.

About 600 of the most prominent Jewish and non-Jewish leaders, Government dignitaries and leaders of industry and labor were present to express their recognition to the veteran Congressman as a Jew and an American patriot.

President Truman, in a telegram read by the toastmaster, Harry Hershfield, sent greetings to Congressman BLOOM for his long and devoted service to the United States and to all oppressed peoples of the world.

Attorney General Clark, principal speaker at the banquet, emphasized that it is of utmost importance that "in the declaration of independence of the Republic of Israel, the new government extended the hand of friendship to the Arab citizens of the republic and a guarantee of full democratic, economic, political, and social freedom for all of the people of that land. This is in the great American tradition," Clark said.

JOHN W. MCCORMACK, minority whip of the House of Representatives, stated that Palestine is today not only the overshadowing problem for Jews, but also for the whole world.

"Despite their sufferings," he said, "Jews have never despaired of fighting for justice and righteousness, for liberty and democracy. By their own strength and superhuman effort, the Jewish people have within the space of a single generation succeeded in revitalizing the state of Israel. I am happy in the knowledge that the new Jewish state will be a republic, very much in the image of our own republic of the United States."

The other speakers, too, praised the valuable service rendered by Congressman BLOOM and they stressed the fact that the anniversary of his 25 years of service in Congress coincides with the occasion when the Jewish state became a reality.

A glance at the dais where the distinguished guests were seated was sufficient to show how renowned and beloved the Jewish Congressman is. Not only the dais, at whose head sat the guest of honor, but also the entire hall was full of many outstanding personalities of the country and foreign dignitaries.

A very moving scene occurred when Attorney General Clark left the head table to greet one of the guests, the most famous figure in the American sports world—Babe Ruth.

Moving was also the responding address by Congressman BLOOM, whose eyes were at times filled with tears because of the great honor bestowed upon him. BLOOM, in his address, spoke of the rebirth of the Jewish state Israel "which symbolizes the realization of the dream which our fathers and forefathers have dreamed and the prayers which they said in their synagogues for nearly 2,000 years."

Congressman BLOOM also voiced the hope that the United States would assist in transporting the Jewish displaced persons from the European camps to Israel. He urged this country to extend a loan of $100,000,000 to Israel, as requested by Dr. Chaim Weizmann during his recent visit to Washington.

BLOOM closed with the reminder that support of such an institution as the Bicur Cholim Hospital in Jerusalem by the Jews of America will be of great service to the health and welfare of the inhabitants of the Jewish state.

ATTORNEY GENERAL CLARK AT BANQUET FOR SOL BLOOM

Attorney General Tom Clark will be the principal speaker at the Commodore Hotel tonight at a dinner honoring Congressman SOL BLOOM. The dinner is sponsored by the Bicur Cholim Hospital of Jerusalem in recognition of Congressman BLOOM's activities as a member of the board of directors of the hospital for the past 10 years. It is expected that Attorney General Clark, as a member of President Truman's Cabinet, may make an important statement in connection with the state of Israel.

For the period that he is a member of the administration, Attorney General Clark has undertaken various efforts to combat intolerance. He is known as a foe of the Ku Klux Klan. Mr. Clark is a close friend of Congressman BLOOM and he is coming tonight to express his appreciation of the Congressman.

A number of Senators, Congressmen, diplomats, judges, prominent lawyers, businessmen, and others are expected to attend the dinner. It will also be dedicated to the support of Israel, and particularly to the Bicur Cholim Hospital in Jerusalem whose doctors and nurses are now working with so much self-sacrifice to save the wounded and ailing Jewish fighters who are defending Jerusalem from Arab attacks.

The Bicur Cholim is the oldest and largest Jewish hospital in Palestine. It was founded about a hundred years ago by the philanthropist Sir Moses Montefiore and had a prominent role in the improvement of health conditions in the old and new Jewish communities of Palestine. The proceeds of the dinner have been designated for the construction of a hospital wing to be named in honor of Congressman BLOOM.

The dinner committee reads like a Who's Who in America. Mayor O'Dwyer is honorary chairman; Ambassador James W. Gerard is chairman. Cochairmen are: Morris Weinberg, publisher of the Jewish Day; former Gov. Charles Poletti, Postmaster Albert Goldman, and film-magnate Spyros Skouras. The committee is comprised of a long list of the most prominent personalities in the country.

NATIONAL LEADERS JOIN IN PAYING TRIBUTE TO CONGRESSMAN SOL BLOOM

President Truman, Attorney General Tom Clark and other prominent leaders at a dinner last Thursday paid tribute to Congressman SOL BLOOM upon the completion of the Congressman's twenty-fifth year of service in Congress. At the dinner held at the Hotel Commodore and attended by 500 persons, Mr. Clark praised Mr. BLOOM as a statesman and humanitarian.

In a telegram President Truman said:

"It is a pleasure to send hearty felicitations and warmest personal greeting to all who are honoring you for long and faithful service to your country and oppressed people everywhere. It is particularly fitting that an addition to Bicur Cholim Hospital in Jerusalem should bear your honored name. Hearty congratulations and every good wish."

Proceeds of the dinner will be used to establish the Sol Bloom Wing of the Bicur Cholim Hospital, which Mr. BLOOM has been active in helping.

In his plea for peace in the Near East Mr. Clark said:

"Our Government will do everything in its power to help all the people, both Arab and Jew, in the new nation of Israel and other parts of Palestine.

"More blood spilt upon the soil of Palestine will not serve God. A united effort must be put forth by all the nations of the world to find a way to help both peoples live in friendship."

Mr. Clark said that Mr. BLOOM symbolized America and that his 25 years of service in Congress "fearlessly devoted to the public good has gained for him fame and honor here and throughout the world."

Representative JOHN W. MCCORMACK of Massachussets, minority leader of the House, sent a message praising Mr. BLOOM and declaring that the recognition of Israel by this Government was a reasonable and natural step.

"When President Truman announced our recognition of Israel, I felt that he had acted wisely and judiciously, that the course he had chosen was in the spirit of our own Declaration of Independence," he said. "That forthright action of the President has received the warm support of the overwhelming majority of the American people."

Mr. BLOOM said the fact that the State of Israel was today a reality had given new meaning to Jewish life. He declared that never in their history had the Jews been so united on a problem as they were on the question of Palestine and that the State of Israel was a beacon of light to the nations of the world. WASHINGTON MERRY-GO-ROUND

(By Drew Pearson)

RECOGNIZING ISRAEL

Various people played important backstage roles in switching President Truman away from his earlier position against Palestine. One was Eddie Jacobson, Truman's old haberdashery partner in Kansas City, who was brought to Washington by Frank Goldman, of Lowell, Mass., head of B'nai B'rith. Together with Maurice Bisgyer of the same organization, they had several talks with Truman.

Another who talked with the President just 1 day before he recognized Israel was venerable Representative SOL BLOOM, New York Democrat, who advised:

"Jump in fast with recognition, Mr. President. Don't wait for Russia and her satellite states to recognize. They are sure to do it, but don't let them do it first."

Next day Truman acted. In fact, he acted so fast that he had to tip off the Jewish Agency to send him a request for recognition so he could act on it. They hadn't even had time to make a formal request.

NEW YORK, N. Y., May 16, 1948.

Congressman SOL BLOOM,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Mazel tov, heartiest felicitations. The glorious moment that Israel has yearned for 2,000 years has come. Your masterful and wise counsel, your tremendous but modest influence, your genuine love for your brethren has borne fruits. Your wonderful words at the rabbinical reception tendered in your honor recently still ring in my ears now. I observe fully their complete import and impact. May the Almighty spare you many more healthful years replete with noble deeds for your people and your country. Fondest regards.

Rabbi ALEXANDER S. TEITELBAUM.

Why Cannot Arizona and California Compromise Their Water Dispute?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 16, 1948

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, there has been so much contention over legislation involving this water dispute between Arizona and California and such an intense struggle to shape legislation regarding it that many Members of Congress have asked why it is not a matter of compromise and why it has not been compromised. In fact, these are the questions most frequently asked me concerning it. They are logical questions and ones which might very well be asked. Both sides have said repeatedly that they have been willing, during the past quarter century, to compromise the dispute and that they have made many efforts through the years to do so. Well then, to what extent has it been compromised, and how? What is the likelihood of a final and complete settlement by further compromise?

As a political-science instructor years ago in Arizona, I was asked somewhat facetiously by an inquiring student, "What is a compromise?" Knowing that the young fellow knew the meaning of the term which had been used so frequently in that course, I replied that there are various kinds of compromises and I would illustrate one kind for him. Then I used this illustration: "One spring, Mrs. Murdock and I were window-shopping on the streets of Phoenix before the windows of the largest department store there, and we were attracted by a large assortment of woolen blankets on display, marked down to a more reasonable price at the beginning of summer in this warm valley. Knowing that we should soon leave Phoenix for Flagstaff, where I would be an instructor in the summer session of the college up in that cool resort, I said to Mrs. Murdock that we ought to buy a pair of those nice white blankets. She explained that we were planning to live in a cabin among the pines, and that those white blankets would not stay white very long, and she insisted that we buy a pair of brown blankets. Now, I compromised with her, and we took a pair of brown blankets." Years later that fellow remembered my illustration and was still smiling about my compromise. No doubt a similar kind of compromise could be arranged with California over the Colorado River more in the nature of a capitulation than a compromise. But let us examine the elements of the dispute from near the beginning and see wherein a compromise of a sort has already been effected and what might further be effected.

Let us go back nearly to taws and see what the situation was prior to 1922. At that time only relatively little physical development down near the Mexican border had taken place on the main stream of the Colorado River. Some diversions of the natural flow had been made from the Colorado into California at Blythe for the Palo Verde reclamation district, and some near Yuma for the Imperial Valley and for the Yuma irrigation districts. Earliest of all, some had been taken for Arizona Indians at Parker. Of course, full diversions had been made in Arizona from the Gila River and its tributaries before the Santa Fe Compact of 1922, and it was universally considered without question that all of that in the Gila Basin, aside from a little in New Mexico, belonged to Arizona. Therefore, the Gila should be left out of the picture as an element of negotiation. This was the first step of compromise on November 24, 1922, when Arizona, with California, signed the compact. And it should be noted that in 1922 somewhat more Colorado River water was being diverted into California than into Arizona from the main stream.

Going back, then, to that convenient date, 1922, as a beginning, and regarding the two States as being previously about equal in this race for water, let us indicate the extreme demands of each State as a basis of negotiation. Naturally, from the start both Arizona and California hoped to get all of the possible benefits of the river as their extreme demand, and, if not all throughout the entire length of the river, then all possible benefits both in water and power from the lower part of the river below the State line dividing Arizona from Utah. That lower portion or basin is usually designated as that part below Lees Ferry. It is no exaggeration to say that both Arizona and California wanted and strove for all the benefits of the lower portion of the Colorado River. While such a demand on the part of each State may be fantastic and unreasonable, we must consider it human nature to strive for it as each did.

WHAT JUSTIFICATION HAD EACH STATE FOR ITS LARGEST CLAIM?

Let us ask what basis of claim either Arizona or California prior to 1922 could have for such a hope and claim. Arizona felt that it ought to be "her river," because it flows 300 miles through the State of Arizona and about the same distance along her western border. Ninety percent of the entire area of Arizona is within the Colorado Basin, and Arizona contributes 17 percent of the total flow of the Colorado River. Arizona contains far more irrigable land within the Colorado Basin than any other State, and has a 12-month growing season, or ideal climate, for the fullest utilization of the water. On the other hand, California has only a very limited fraction of her area within the Colorado Basin—perhaps less than 2 percent—as compared with Arizona's 90 percent within the basin. Unless she takes water entirely outside the Colorado Basin, California has less than 200,000 acres of land that may be irrigated within the basin. This compares with Arizona's at least 5,000,000 acres of land capable of irrigation within the basin. Thus we see that California has only about 4 percent as much irrigable land within the Colorado River Basin as has Arizona. California has no tributaries to the Colorado River and furnishes less than one-tenth of 1 percent to the total flow of the stream. Therefore, California's use of the river requires exporting water and power hundreds of miles from the river in a transmountain diversion. It is easily seen then that any semblance of merit of California's extreme claim to all of the river depends upon an anticipated growth of her seaport cities and interior communities several hundred miles from the river. This, I think, is a fair contrast of the rival claims in and prior to the year 1922. What has happened since November 22, 1922, by way of a compromise between these contenders?

Of course, I am looking at this from the standpoint of Arizona. Many in Arizona think that there has already been too much compromising and giving away, and that any further compromising now would be capitulation. Furthermore, I think that the combined intent of the Boulder Canyon Project Act of 1928, and the California Limitation Act of her legislature in 1929, amounts to a liberal concession to California and that no further compromise is justified. Therefore, to speak of compromising the problem further since the compromises of 1922 and 1929, as the present-day question implies, would, in my judgment, mean a further reduction amounting to an injustice and irreparable injury to Arizona.

COMPROMISE POSSIBLE IN DIVIDING BOTH WATER AND POWER

By going back to the writing of the Santa Fe Compact in 1922 as the convenient starting point in this two-State controversy and considering that Arizona, as also California, would like to have all the benefits of the lower river below Lees Ferry, we can see what has already been done, what kind of a compromise has already been effected, and what might or ought yet be done. How much water and how much power is there to be divided and allotted to Arizona and to California below Lees Ferry? So far as the amount of water is concerned, I think we may, within the meaning of the compact, safely say that there are in firm supply the seven and a half million acre-feet allotted in (a) of article III, but this does not take into consideration any other water. Naturally, there will be more than the seven and a half million acre-feet available when the river is fully developed. Nevada's relatively small part of water and power may be omitted from this discussion as agreed upon.

So far as the power to be divided is concerned, no accurate figure can be given now, but of course, it will be practically all the power capable of being developed at the existing dams, such as Hoover, Parker, Davis, and Headgate Rock, together with any from proposed dams, such as Bridge Canyon and Glen Canyon. Since there is a power shortage with an increasing demand in both Arizona and California, and the last two dams mentioned have not been built, we can only surmise how much power there will be and how the power will later be divided. Looking at it from the power angle, it is also one of those unusual compromises, because today California is getting virtually all of the power, and Arizona is getting none of the power except the power for the Gila irrigation project below Parker, plus the power which Arizona users are buying from the California power companies, at a good stiff price. Does that look like a compromise between the two States on power? The plain fact is that California is now getting practically all of the hydroelectric power produced on the lower Colorado River. She wants to get more and to give up none, which is stating our power situation mildly.

DIVISION OF WATER REGARDED MORE IMPORTANT THAN POWER

How about the water? How has it been divided? How much firm water is there to divide? An eminent water authority in southern California says there are ten and a half million acre-feet annually to be divided. But he does not imply that it is all firm water. This is in strange contrast to the contention of another eminent authority from southern California that the river is dry and already far overdrawn. My own conservative view is that under the compact and from the physical and the engineering facts of the river, we may safely count on article III (a), water, seven and a half million acre-feet annually as a minimum, in firm supply and in perpetuity, for the lower basin. Nevada claims 300,000 acre-feet.

The first beginning of compromise by Arizona and California on this water problem, which meant the withdrawal of each State from its original extreme demand for all the benefits of the river, was their signing of the Santa Fe Compact along with the other five Basin States on November 24, 1922. By this compact, which both Arizona and California agreed to, the waters of the Colorado River were roughly divided, and seven and a half million acre-feet of the total flow was allotted to the upper basin above Lees Ferry. Therefore, this action thus limited, to the extent of the foregoing amount, the water available for division between Arizona and California, but this same compact did also guarantee a delivery of a minimum of seven and a half million acre-feet on an average annually to the lower basin. Let it be remembered that this is the minimum amount required by the compact to pass Lees Ferry, and it is based on the assumption that there will be storage on the river above Lees Ferry so that an average of seven and a half million acre-feet annually, in firm supply, can always be available to be let down to the lower basin. Of course, there is bound to be surplus water—and there will always be when the river is fully developed—more than seven and a half million acre-feet of water passing Lees Ferry each year. The upper basin States agree to let an average of seven and a half million acre-feet pass Lees Ferry annually, and that can be safely counted on when storage is provided. It is this minimum of firm supply I am considering here, and to be sure to count all drafts, I am including one which does not belong there, namely, any part of Mexico's water.

THIS COMPUTATION DEALS ONLY WITH FIRM WATER

Mexico's water is not to come out of the seven and a half million acre-feet allocated to the lower basin, but to demonstrate there is enough water for central Arizona we may, from the seven and a half million acre-feet of firm water, which is the safe basis of our computation, for illustration subtract 1,000,000 acre-feet, or less, out of storage for Mexico—discussed further on—and 300,000 acre-feet for Nevada, leaving 6,200,000 acre-feet on which to work a compromise between Arizona and California. Of that amount California by law is destined to get 4,400,000 acre-feet under her act of limitation of 1929. Arizona recognizes that that is legally California's water. Subtracting that 4,400,000 acre-feet from the 6,200,000 acre-feet of firm water, we have left 1,800,000 acre-feet of somebody's water, even after assuming one million for Mexico which neither the compact or act of 1928 intended. California did grudingly consent that Arizona might have a right to 600,000 acre-feet by permitting the Gila reauthorization bill to pass Congress in 1947, and subtracting that would leave 1,200,000 acre-feet of somebody's water. Arizona claims it rightfully but California is unwilling that Arizona shall have about a million acre-feet of water for the proposed central Arizona project, and has the effrontery to suggest another compromise. In thus dealing only with the unquestioned minimum firm supply, and with the assurance there is enough water to take care of other items, we see Arizona rightfully claims what she is asking for.

It may easily be seen from the nature of "the compromises" thus far effected that California already has the lion's share. How would another "compromise" probably leave it? There remains 1,200,000 acre-feet of assured water, and Arizona needs it and rightfully claims it, but California has suggested a further "compromise." Of course, she would not be satisfied with less than half of it, and if California did get 600,000 acre-feet or more of it to add to her 4,400,000 acre-feet, it would mean that such final "compromise" would yield California a total of 5,000,000 acre-feet as compared with Arizona's 1,000,000 acre-feet, as already provided by acts of Congress or prospective acts of Congress, all under the compact of 1922. What kind of compromise would that be?

PART OF MEXICAN TREATY WATER SHOULD BE SECOND-HAND

Although I do not admit that Mexico has any claim on the 7½ million acre-feet allotted, when I said earlier that we may subtract 1,000,000 acre-feet or less from our firm supply of stored water for Mexico, for sake of argument, although Mexico's part was to come out of surplus, I could almost hear the opposition triumphantly shout that this was a bald-faced error, and that the treaty with Mexico provides that the Republic of Mexico is to receive one and a half million acre-feet, if not more, of water annually. No, it is not an error as to the amount for Mexico out of storage. However, California witnesses have been exerting their utmost to exaggerate the amount of this treaty burden and to insist, for the sake of their argument, that the amount which we are to hold ourselves in readiness to furnish Mexico direct from storage is nearer 2,000,000 acre-feet than the amount specified in the treaty. Not that the California witnesses want to give Mexico as much as 2,000,000 acre-feet, but it is evident they want to figure it in such a way as to make that amount of water available for some purpose other than for use in any of the six States of the Colorado River Basin, not including California. They also figure in the Mexican water as a part of our firm supply, although it should and must ultimately come out of surplus.

As to the stipulated amount it is true that the treaty calls for a million and a half acre-feet of water for Mexico, and I insist that the treaty be fully observed and not breached. However, not all of that treaty water needs to come from storage, and I insist that it is nothing short of folly and akin to treason for us not to use at least a third of the water ultimately intended for Mexico in irrigation within the United States before it goes to Mexico. To do so is easily an engineering possibility and is, to a considerable extent, being done at this very moment. Last year Mexico was furnished about 200,000 acre-feet of second-hand water which had already been used to irrigate land in Yuma County, Ariz. This amount thus used can be soon trebled as a fuller utilization and as the development of the river occurs. Suspect any man who at first opposed the treaty with Mexico and who now declares that we must hold in storage approximately 2,000,000 acre-feet of water to carry out the Mexican Water Treaty.

HOW WOULD ARIZONA FARE IN ANOTHER COMPROMISE?

The above contrast of compromises resulting since 1922 affecting Arizona and California is almost unbelievable in the light of what took place between November 22 and November 24, 1922, as there has already been assigned by effective congressional acts seven times as much water to California, in firm supply and in perpetuity, as has been assigned to Arizona. What kind of a compromise is this? While there is more firm water to be divided, and also an indefinite amount of surplus water to be divided in the year 1963, at the moment we could only compromise further in the division of the firm water. I am convinced that California will not agree on dividing the remainder, but even assuming she would agree on the best possible 50–50 division, it could only result in assigning to California five times as much water in perpetuity as would be assigned to Arizona. That is why I stated earlier that Arizona feels that already too much has been conceded and that any further concessions would be to Arizona's irreparable injury. My own view is that Congress, having already passed more than 35 acts on this matter, should settle it still further by law on its merits and in furtherance of the basic act of 1928.

President Truman Appears More Interested in Politics Than in a Constructive Agricultural Approach

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. REID F. MURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, it is to be regretted that President Truman has selected this hour to make political agricultural speeches while on his nonpolitical tour. We have been trying for months in the Congress to piece together the information obtained by the chairman of the Agriculture Committee, CLIFFORD HOPE, and the Senate Agriculture Committee. Hearings have been held in various parts of the country. These hearings have been nonpartisan and have been held in the North, South, East, and West.

However, President Truman's cheap political approach to the problem of providing sufficient food for an ever-increasing population is deserving of consideration.

In the first place, the New Deal Party has been in control of Congress and the White House for 14 years and they had ample time to bring out a long-range agricultural program if they had spent less time on politics and more on agriculture. American agriculture, a $30,000,000,000 business in 1947, is a big business. Many groups are involved. Many crops and products are involved, especially when one realizes our country is practically self-sufficient so far as varieties of foods and fibers are concerned. Chairman HOPE and the committee have made an earnest and sincere attempt to obtain all the facts involved in a long-range agriculture program. Congressman HOPE, with his many years of legislative experience, has seen the creation and dismantling of the Federal Farm Board. This was the first attempt to support farm prices by the Federal Government. This was in the 1920's. Of the $500,000,000 appropriated, about one-half was never returned to the United States Treasury. The wheat farmers, however, received a large percentage of the loss encountered by the United States Treasury. Then the New Deal came along and set up controls and supports for the so-called basic crops of wheat, cotton, corn, peanuts, rice, and tobacco. Three hundred million dollars or more per year were pumped into this program. Millions were spent for not growing crops in the United States when we were importing more agricultural products than were being exported. By 1939, the seventh year of the "more abundant life," we found the whole program bogged down. Farmers in August 1939 received 54 cents per bushel for wheat, 5 cents-plus for hogs, 8 cents-plus for cotton even after the millions had been expended for not growing the crops, and other millions because what was grown did not bring enough in the market place. One weakness of this set-up was the same weakness apparent in the Federal Farm Board. A very large percentage of American agriculture was not included in the support program. Export subsidies were resorted to. Many schemes, not in keeping with a good-neighbor policy, were resorted to. These included embargos and quotas that the New Deal substituted for tariffs.

The war years then followed. Large employment rolls resulted from the war. The patriotic desire to produce was apparent. To meet the challenge in an attempt to first obtain an increased food production and second to give producers assurance they would not lose "their all" by resulting low prices if they stepped up production, the Congress passed the Steagall amendment to the Price Control Act. This was most assuredly a bipartisan approach. Not only Mr. Steagall, but other Democrats like the Honorable PAUL BROWN of Georgia, the Honorable ALBERT GORE, of Texas, and Republicans like the Honorable JESSE WOLCOTT, the Honorable FRED CRAWFORD, of Michigan, the Honorable HENRY TALLE, of Iowa, and the Honorable MERLIN HULL, of Wisconsin worked together harmoniously to pass this legislation. The results obtained by the Steagall amendment have led many to believe that it was and is one of the most important and successful pieces of agricultural legislation ever passed by the Congress. The Steagall amendment proved its value in war and can be easily adjusted to peacetime. The original amendment provided 90 percent of parity floor price and a 110 percent parity ceiling price. The late President Roosevelt listened to the wrong people at the wrong time and the 110-percent ceiling was removed because someone thought the producers were obtaining a legislative advantage over other groups of our society. I realize that he was under great pressure at the time, but a much more harmonious and satisfactory set-up would have been obtained if this 110-percent parity-price ceiling could have been in operation. Later, of course, even under the OPA some ceiling prices advanced materially above the 110-percent parity. In fact, since the Secretary of Agriculture has even placed a 165-percent parity price as support—for example under flaxseed.

With this legislative background it should be apparent just exactly how involved a long-range program really becomes because this price support is just one angle.

We then have to face the soil-fertility-maintenance problem, and the improvement of the humus content under soil conservation and fertility maintenance. Between $100,000,000 and $200,000,000 worth of soil fertlity will be exported in 1948. We have the drainage problem, the irrigation problem also to be taken into consideration. The above with the plant and animal disease problem, the scientific research approach, the marketing problem, as well as other phases of the $30,000,000,000 1948 business must also be taken into consideration.

The Agricultural Committee and the Banking and Currency Committee have made a nearly perfect record in approaching farm legislation from a bipartisan standpoint. At the higher level, in fact in the top levels of the United States Department of Agriculture, do we find the political agriculturalists carrying on their activities.

However, Mr. President, if you are as interested in agriculture as you are in criticizing Republicans in Congress, there are a few questions that you may wish to answer in order to keep the record straight.

First. In your Omaha speech you profess great sympathy for reciprocity and a good-neighbor agricultural policy. If this be true, then I ask, Why did you use the power under section 22 of the AAA Act to put a quota and a near embargo on cotton imports?

Second. Why do you lend approval to the near embargoes under the same section 22 of the AAA Act?

Third. If you really wish to see a good neighbor agricultural policy, why do you allow the paying of export subsidies on cotton even when cotton is above parity?

Fourth. Why criticize any Republican position on tariffs when you and your party substituted quotas and embargoes for tariffs?

Fifth. Why criticize any Republican position on tariffs as long as your party erected the worst trade barrier; yes, the most vicious, ever erected in the history of our country? It is the embargo on tobacco seed. Why did your party pass the legislation in 1940 and why do you not advocate its repeal if you really mean you are an advocate of reciprocity?

Sixth. Why all the antilivestock attitudes in your Agriculture Department at top levels? Why, for example, have a 1 cent per pound import duty on hogs, 25 cents a bushel on corn, and 3 cents per pound on lard? If it takes 12 bushels of corn to produce a 100-pound hog, it is evident that a 100-pound hog can be imported for $1, but it would necessitate the paying of $3 in duty on the corn to produce the 100-pound hog or three times as much. Why the 1 cent per pound duty on hog imports and 3 cents per pound duty on lard when live hog and lard prices have been practically equal for years? Is the 3 cents per pound duty on lard to keep it in line with the 3 cents per pound import duty on vegetable oils?

Why, Mr. President, does the executive branch of the Government use the section 32 funds, obtained largely by imports of livestock and its products, to subsidize exports of soil-depleting crops like cotton? Did you know that over $400,000 of these section 32 funds have recently been used to even subsidize tobacco exports, and that $9,000,000 were used to grind up federally accumulated tobacco and dispose of it for fertilizer and insecticides? Do you really believe tobacco growing excels sheep growing as a soil-conservation system of farming?

Why, Mr. President, has your party reduced the duty on dairy products all the law will allow you to reduce them, and recently went so far at Geneva as to reduce the duty on skim milk to a fraction of a cent per pound? Why, Mr. President, has your party reduced the sheep numbers of the United States by 37 percent in the past 5 years, the cattle numbers by over 6,000,000, and the hog numbers on January 1, 1944, were 52 percent above what they were on January 1, 1948. I ask in all respect, Mr. President, one additional question at this point. First, if you really believe in soil conservation, why do you keep agricultural leadership in high places that subsidizes soil-depleting crops and at the same time jeopardizes soil-conserving systems of farming?

Seventh. Mr. President, if you are now so alarmed about the future of cooperatives as shown in the Omaha speech, why do not the parts of the United States represented by Democrats have some in their own districts? Wisconsin has over 1,000 of them, and we will take care of the situation without outside assistance that has the earmarks of being more political than helpful.

Eighth. Why did your party allow a program that provided one Mississippi farmer, Oscar Johnson's Pine Bluff farm, a total subsidy of $819,644.22 in a period of 15 years? Why did your party, Mr. President, provide Mr. Tom Campbell, of Montana, $249,603.47 under the guise of soil conservation or some other reason? Did not Tom Campbell call on you at the White House last summer and advise you that he wanted $3.50 per bushel for his wheat? Do you think Tom Campbell should have been provided these thousands of dollars for mining the fertility of his land and do you call that soil conservation?

Mr. President, Chicago is the agricultural food capital of the world. We have altogether too much agricultural political leadership. A dozen States around Chicago have the responsibility of feeding the 145,000,000 Americans. Many of the other States cannot or do not produce enough food to feed themselves.

Special-privilege legislation has been provided for the products south of Mason and Dixon's line. The real food-producing areas have been subjected to unfair legislative treatment. If some of these agricultural legislative wonders are so beneficial, why does not your party get in on it, and try them out south of Mason and Dixon's line. At least give the American people the facts, and do not try to blame the Republicans of the Congress who have made every effort to subscribe to a constructive approach.

Of course, as long as your party takes the position that about one-fourth of American agriculture is basic, as cotton, corn, wheat, tobacco, rice, peanuts, and the other 75 percent of American-produced agriculture products are not, naturally, there will be differences of opinion. A $165,000,000 rice crop, a $213,000,000 peanut crop, and a $1,000,000,000 tobacco crop do not appear very basic when they are compared to a $9,900,000,000 meat crop, a $4,000,000,000 to $5,000,000,000 milk crop, a $2,900,000,000 poultry and egg crop, but the New Deal has led many people to believe more strange things than that.

The trouble, I repeat, with the New Deal agricultural approach is that it is upside down. It subsidizes soil-depleting crops and jeopardizes the soil-conserving crops. Perhaps you can make some people believe otherwise, but can you?

Among the many trade barriers, then, that your party has erected are: (1) the embargo on tobacco seed, (2) the export subsidy on cotton and tobacco even when the market was above parity, (3) the near embargo on wheat imports, (4) the embargo on short-staple-cotton imports, (5) the embargo quota on imports of long-staple cotton put into effect by you. These quotas and embargoes are not in keeping with the propaganda sent out by your State Department these many years.

The New Deal had a long time to put into effect a long-range agricultural program; but instead the New Deal followed a special privilege, a sectional, a favorite-crop program, and one that will continue to ruin the fertility of the soils of our country.

What Pay for Hired Man?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I desire to include therein a short article from Wallaces' Farmer entitled "What Pay for Hired Man?"

WHAT PAY FOR HIRED MAN?

What is a fair wage agreement between farm operator and hired man? It's tough to work out these days.

Here's an agreement—fixed up by a central Iowa farmer—which satisfies both operator and hired man:

The hired man gets $110 per month wages from March 1 this year to March 1 next year. Payday comes twice a month.

Extras include three dozen eggs each week, two quarts of milk a day, a half pint of cream a day, two 225-pound hogs for butchering per year.

The hired man also has a house, a garden, and a potato patch large enough for his own use. His electricity is on a separate meter.

The operator and the hired man chore together every Sunday morning. Chores are done alone every other Sunday evening.

On top of all this is a bonus: Five percent of the egg receipts; 5 percent of cream receipts, 3 percent of butcher hog receipts. Hogs butchered for home use are not counted in the bonus; feed purchased is deducted from the gross sales before figuring out the bonus.

The bonus will be paid March 1 next year if the hired man stays for the full year. If any butcher hogs are not sold until after March 1, 1949, the bonus then will be paid at time of sale. The bonus is guaranteed to average $15 per month until March 1, 1949.

How Public Law 642, Eightieth Congress, Second Session, Restricts Old-Age and Survivors' Insurance Coverage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES B. DEANE
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Speaker, when House Joint Resolution 296 became Public Law 642, despite the veto of the measure by the President, the Eightieth Congress excluded an estimated 750,000 people from social-security coverage. This law recites as its purpose "to maintain the status quo in respect to certain employment taxes and social-security benefits pending action by Congress on extended social-security coverage." However, instead of maintaining the status quo, this statute amends the Social Security Act and the Internal Revenue Code and thereby changes the law as outlined by the Supreme Court in June 1947—U. S. v. Silk (67 S. Ct. 1463), Harrison v. Greyvan Lines, Inc. (67 S. Ct. 1463), and Bartels v. Birmingham (67 S. Ct. 1547). The result is that these 750,000 individuals and their dependents are left without protection under the old-age and survivors' insurance program.

This group is made up of a substantial portion of the persons who work as salesmen, miners, taxicab operators, journeymen tailors, industrial homeworkers and others. In general, persons employed in these occupations need protection against the hazards of old-age, and their dependents need protection against the premature death of the wage earner as much as any group now afforded social security coverage. Yet Public Law 642 will prohibit the payment of benefits and the collection of the old-age and survivors' insurance tax from the employer and the employee for any future employment in these occupations unless the so-called common-law relationship of master and servant is found to exist.

The common-law relationship of master and servant has not been clearly defined by the various courts. Cases arising under a similar set of facts have been decided in favor of the "employee" in some jurisdictions, while in others the person rendering service for an employer has been determined to be an independent contractor and not entitled to social security coverage. The control exercised by the employer over the method and means of performing the services performed by the worker is often the determinative factor in deciding whether the worker is an employee or an independent contractor under the common-law test. Just what constitutes sufficient control to take a worker outside the independent-contractor concept varies. Some courts require that the employer have the right to control the physical performance of the work while others require only general control over the person engaged. Still others have found that under certain circumstances a worker is an employee although no control in a physical sense was exercised by the employer.

The common-law master-servant concept has not afforded the taxpayers, the beneficiaries, or the administrators of the old-age and survivors' insurance program any clear-cut rule. More important, however, is the fact that, in general, the common-law concept is more restrictive than the definition of an "employee" developed by the Treasury Department and the Federal Security Agency in the light of the pronouncement of the Supreme Court in the aforementioned decisions of June 1947. Under this definition an employee is "an individual in a service relationship who is dependent as a matter of economic reality upon the business to which he renders service and not upon his own business as an independent contractor." If Public Law 642 had not been enacted, this rule would also have had the effect of levying the Federal tax for unemployment compensation on employers for wages paid to individuals who are dependent as a matter of economic reality upon the business to which they render service. A majority of the States have adopted tests for determining the employer-employee relationship for unemployment compensation which are broader than the common-law test. The rule, therefore, would have had a more limited effect on coverage for unemployment compensation than for the Federal program of old-age and survivors' insurance.

This definition has been nullified by Public Law 642 and the effect of this nullification in the words of the President is to "overturn the present sound principle that employment relationships under the social-security laws should be determined in the light of realities rather than on the basis of technical legal forms. In so doing, it would make the social-security rights of the employees directly excluded, and many thousands of additional employees depend almost entirely upon the manner in which their employers might choose to cast their employment arrangements. Employers desiring to avoid the payment of taxes which would be the basis for social-security benefits for their employees could do so by the establishment of artificial legal arrangements governing their relationship with their employees. I cannot approve legislation which would permit such employers at their own discretion to avoid the payment of social-security taxes and to deny social-security protection to employees and their families"—veto message from the President on House Joint Resolution 296, House Document No. 711, Eightieth Congress, second session, pages 1–2.

Some of the proponents of Public Law 642 have maintained that it is unimportant if this statute does exclude workers who cannot meet the common-law test for coverage under the Social Security Act. They point to the study of the Social Security Act being conducted by the Advisory Council on Social Security to the Senate Committee on Finance and the recommendation of the Council for extension of coverage to the self-employed. These proponents state that the individuals excluded from coverage by Public Law 642 can be covered as self-employed. Thus under this proposal the employer would not be required to pay his share of the tax for old-age and survivors' insurance but the burden would be shifted to the employee as the recommendations for covering the self-employed propose a higher tax rate for the self-employed than what is paid by other workers.

Moreover, it is an indisputable fact that social-security coverage has been restricted rather than extended. Since the Social Security Act was enacted in 1935, the Congress has not extended coverage to any major group of workers despite the frequent recommendations made for such extension by impartial study groups, President Roosevelt, President Truman, the Federal Security Agency, and others. Today, 13 years after the Social Security Act was passed, only 3 out of 5 jobs are covered by the old-age and survivors' insurance program and more than 20,000 workers are not given the opportunity to earn a right to benefits for themselves and families provided for others under the program. Unless this trend to restrict social-security coverage is stopped and affirmative action is taken to strengthen the social-security system, not only will the 750,000 individuals affected by Public Law 642 continue to be excluded from coverage, but the goal of social insurance protection for all workers will be jeopardized.

Some advocates of Public Law 642 urged its passage because it provided for increased Federal grants-in-aid to the States for State-Federal public assistance programs. This statute does enable the States to increase payments to old-age assistance and aid to the blind recipients $5 per month and aid to dependent children payments $3 per month per child without requiring additional expenditures from State funds. The recipients of public assistance need higher payments in order to meet the increased cost of living. However, increased assistance payments could have been provided by a separate bill instead of attaching this essential legislation to a law which deprives 750,000 individuals and their dependents from the protection afforded by the old-age and survivors' insurance program.

Appreciation Shown to the Signers of Discharge Petition 7

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to permission heretofore granted, I include as part of my remarks the following resolution which was adopted June 5,

1948, at the Eighth National Convention of Townsend Clubs:

Whereas the Townsend program has always been presented and bills sponsored on a nonpartisan basis; and

Whereas we, the delegates assembled in convention representing chartered Townsend clubs of America, realize because of action taken by certain party leaders in the House against signing of petitions, they have shown that they are not willing to have this legislation brought out of committee and discussed and voted upon the floor of the House: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this convention of Townsend delegates render a vote of appreciation to the signers of petition No. 7 and cosponsors of H. R. 16 who have had the courage of their own convictions and who have seen the need of bringing this bill out in the open for discussion and vote on the floor of the House this Eightieth Congress, so that the elderly citizens of our country can be properly cared for, without plunging our Government into further debt.

Review of Principal Events Contributing To Prevent Threat of World Totalitarianism and World War III

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MAX SCHWABE

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. SCHWABE of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the historical background of the Marshall plan is a vitally interesting story. It has been prepared and properly documented by Women Investors Research Institute, Inc., as part of the study that institute prepared on the Marshall plan for a group of Members of the Congress. The Marshall plan historical background follows:

PART II. REVIEW OF PRINCIPAL EVENTS CONTRIBUTING TO PRESENT THREAT OF WORLD TOTALITARIANISM AND WORLD WAR III

It is, of course, impossible to determine whether the Marshall plan—or any similar plan—will achieve the desired objectives without considering the present situation in Europe, and what has created it. A brief review of former events is, therefore, essential.

It is charged that the present European situation has been caused by the programs and propaganda of totalitarian forces seeking to convert Europe into a planned-economy area—that such programs and propaganda are designed to enable minority groups to seize control of the administration of government within the 16 western European countries and to maintain themselves in power by the suppression of individual liberty.

It is recognized that communism, due to its rapid spread throughout Europe and Asia—today is a major threat to individual liberty, not only in Europe, but to the entire world.

Modern communism came to power in Russia with the October 1917 revolution, when a strongly organized minority seized control of the administration of the Russian Government at Petrograd—now Leningrad. This seizure was accomplished with little resistance because the highly trained and exceedingly loyal palace guard had been wiped out in its invasion of East Prussia in 1914.

As German armies speedily approached Paris in the fall of 1914, the influential social and business groups in Petrograd began a propaganda campaign for the use of Russian troops in an effort to divert German armies from Paris. These groups maintained that if Paris fell to the German armies Europe was lost. They believed that Paris was the seat of all culture, business endeavor, and individual liberty on the Continent.

The Russian Defense Minister informed the Czar that troops were not available for any extended campaign such as the pro-French pressure group demanded. The pressure continued and increased as the German armies neared Paris. Finally, the pro-French-Russian group insisted that the palace guard be sent to the East Prussian front. This was done and a workers' guard was recruited from the Petrograd factories to replace the palace guard as a home-defense force.

The palace guard invaded East Prussia as far as Koenigsburg and compelled the German high command to withdraw troops from the Paris advance. Paris and France were saved, but Petrograd and Russia were lost, for when the Lenin-Trotsky horde moved on Petrograd there was no loyal palace guard to defend it. The workers' guard had joined the Bolsheviki forces.

RED FLAG OVER KAISER'S PALACE

Few now recall that communism came to central Europe on November 11, 1918, when the Red flag was raised over the Kaiser's palace in Berlin. Woodrow Wilson, on that day, told the American people: "The armistice was signed this morning. Everything for which America fought has been accomplished. It will now be our fortunate duty to assist by example, by sober friendly counsel, and by material aid in the establishment of a just democracy throughout the world."

Berlin then became the center of the world Communist movement. There followed a period of wild inflation, elimination of private-property rights, and suppression of individual liberty throughout Germany. This liquidated the last vestige of Germanic free enterprise and laid the foundation for Hitler's rise to power in 1933 on a program of driving the Communists out of Germany and central Europe into Russia.

The present march of communism across Central Europe began in 1939 as a result of Hitler's foreign policy, which was supposedly designed to restore Germany's territorial boundaries as they existed prior to the Versailles Treaty.

BIPARTISAN APPEASEMENT

Inspired by the belief that achievement of the above-cited foreign policy objectives would result in building a strong Germany as a bulwark against Soviet central European expansion, the administrations then in charge of the governments of France and Great Britain offered no serious objection to this phase of Hitler's foreign policy. In fact, both administrations joined in what might be termed a bipartisan appeasement of that foreign policy, thereby permitting Hitler to advance more rapidly toward his secret foreign policy objective—domination of all of Europe.

After Hitler had seized the Rhineland, Austria, Sudetenland, Czechoslovakia, and Memel, through a combination of fifth-column activities in those countries, plus indirect assistance through the French-British appeasement policies, the administrations then in control of the governments of France and Great Britain finally realized Hitler's real goal.

They ended their bipartisan appeasement policy and determined to "call a halt" to his advance across Europe. They drew a line in Europe and informed him that, if he crossed it, they would go to war.

Following this declaration of a new foreign policy by the French-British Governments, Hitler began active preparations for war in western Europe.

First, he entered a mutual nonaggression-aid pact with Stalin. Under this pact, signed in the late summer of 1939, Stalin agreed that Russia would remain neutral if Germany went to war with France, Britain, et al.; that Russia would supply Germany with needed raw materials, war material and food to assist her in prosecution of total war against western Europe. Also, that Russia's fifth column in western European countries would assist the advance of Hitler's forces, westward, by internal sabotage and like activities.

In return, Hitler agreed to assist Stalin in regaining control of certain territories lost by Russia under the Brest-Litovsk and Warsaw Treaties.

These, generally, were the publicly-stated objectives of the 1939 Stalin-Hitler pact.

However, in interpreting and evaluating the programs and propaganda of totalitarian forces, due consideration and analysis must be given to the use of certain words and phrases which are interpreted to mean one thing by English-speaking peoples, but are intended to mean the direct opposite when used by followers of totalitarian principles.

While the words and phrases used by Hitler and Stalin in their 1939 pact indicated its purposes as outlined above, later events established that their actual objectives were considerably different.

BIPARTISAN PACTS BRING WAR

Records uncovered since the May 1945 World War II European truce indicate that Hitler's actual objectives in this pact were:

1. To permit him to fight only one-front engagements at a time.
2. Drain Russia's defense potentials.
3. After consolidation of his gains in western Europe, to turn eastward and eliminate Stalin's Communist totalitarianism as a competitor of Hitler's Nazi totalitarianism.

These same records further indicate that Stalin's real objectives in this pact were:

1. To lead Hitler into a war to the death with the western European powers and Great Britain; and
2. Eventually, to move in and take over complete control of at least all of Europe—plus the Near and Middle East—without direct war involvement.

It is believed that each dictator knew full well the unstated objectives of the other—but each believed that—in the final analysis—he would be able to checkmate and eliminate the other.

With his eastern front thus temporarily secured—Hitler was ready for war in the west.

His first step was to close the gap in his eastern line by invading western Poland and the free port of Danzig—the line which the French-British Governments had warned him he must not cross unless he wished war.

Simultaneously—in accordance with terms of the Stalin-Hitler past—Soviet troops seized control of Estonia, Latvia, and east Poland and endeavored to seize control of southeast Finland, but met with stiff resistance.

World War II was then well under way in Europe.

Following invasion of the above areas—both sides rested.

The Hitler-Stalin forces proceeded to consolidate their gains and the western European powers and Great Britain began to prepare their defense against the onslaught they knew would come in the spring of 1940.

Hitler's preparations for the 1940 spring drive were materially aided by the flow of materials from Russia. The Allies turned to the United States for similar assistance—but found themselves temporarily blocked by the arms-embargo clause of the Neutrality Act.

BIPARTISAN APPEASEMENT COMES TO UNITED STATES

When it became evident this clause would prevent supplying the Allies with war materials needed to defend themselves against the impending German onslaught—President Roosevelt asked Congress to repeal that section of the Neutrality Act in the interest of our own national security. This request—backed by an extensive propaganda campaign, plus bipartisan action in the Congress—finally was granted.

Thus was laid the foundation for the bipartisan appeasement program of the Roosevelt foreign policy.

With the spring of 1940 came the German drive across the lowlands and France to the English Channel. Its rapidity startled the world. Its success was attributed entirely to a marvelously trained German war machine, plus secret German weapons.

Again, evidence uncovered following the May 1945 World War II European truce revealed that one of the most effective of the German secret weapons in that campaign was Communist-inspired sabotage behind the defending lines of the Allied armies—principally in France.

Shortly after taking office in 1936 Premier Leon Blum declared "I am going to give France the Roosevelt New Deal." Although France always had been basically nationalistic, he adopted internationalism and continual meddling in other nation's affairs as the principal plank of his foreign policy.

He courted Russia. He gave aid—money, war equipment, and men—to the Spanish Communists. He granted the Communists and left-wing elements of his own country the right to operate openly under government protection. In addition, he gave them government jobs and furthered the Communist doctrines of worker-control of industry, riotous government spending and unbalanced budgets. He allowed the Communists to infiltrate the French trade unions and to gain control of many of the unions in basic defense industries.

When the facts began to leak out—as they always will—relative to the weakening of France's national defense and its economy—Mr. Blum went to the people and declared his new deal was giving the French people the best national defense it ever had in peacetime—particularly in airplanes and tanks.

But in May 1940 Premier Reynaud declared the rapid German invasion of France could only be attributed to his nation's pitiable weakness in air force and tanks.

In addition to sabotaging the French national defense industries, it has since been established that the Soviet "fifth column" in France and the lowland countries also participated in sabotaging rear-area defenses, communications, and transport.

ROOSEVELT'S SINGAPORE PACT—FRENCH "NEW DEAL" BUILT SOVIET FIFTH COLUMN

Blum's policy of permitting Communists and left-wing elements to operate openly—to infiltrate defense industries and even the armed forces—proved to be one of the most valuable secret weapons at Hitler's disposal in his 1940 campaign. The success of Hitler's forces enabled these saboteur forces to strengthen their positions inside the conquered countries.

Coincident with the fall of France, President Roosevelt asked for, and was granted by Congress, authority to order the National Guard and Organized Reserves of the Army of the United States to active duty within the Western Hemisphere. He declared this action was necessary to the national security of the United States, and this contention was ably sustained before various congressional committees by Army Chief of Staff George Marshall.

Next, President Roosevelt demanded, and was granted through continued bipartisan appeasement of his foreign policy, the first peacetime manpower draft in the history of the Republic. Following this, he was elected the first third-term President of this country on an avowed policy to keep out of war. His foreign policy was not subjected to searching debate in the 1940 campaign, principally because of a continuation of the bipartisan appeasement program. It will be remembered that the late Wendell Willkie joined in this program.

Meantime, Hitler sought to consolidate his European gains—and the Stalin-Hitler pact continued in force.

Early in 1941, President Roosevelt announced his program to "take the silly dollar sign out of aid-to-the-Allies" and Congress began debate on Lend-Lease I legislation.

Again backed by an extensive propaganda campaign—and aided by a continuation of the bipartisan appeasement program in Congress—Lend Lease I was enacted by Congress on the guarantee of President Roosevelt and Army Chief of Staff Marshall that it would continue for only 2 years—would cost not more than $7,000,000,000—and would keep the United States out of the European War.

The twenty-fifth annual accounting of Cumulative Lend-Lease Spending Through June 30, 1947, submitted to Congress by President Truman shows that it totaled—as of that date—$50,243,000,000—of which Stalin received $10,900,000,000.

Simultaneously with the enactment of Lend-Lease I, Stalin began to press Hitler for additional territorial concessions. He particularly wanted territory bordering on the Dardanelles and the Mediterranean Sea.

These demands tended clearly to establish that Stalin—among other objectives—wished to make a reality of the old Czarist dream of a Petrograd-Bagdad trade route. Success of such a program would prevent Hitler from effectuating the old Bismarckian plan for a Berlin-Bagdad trade route.

It now is evident that—at that time—Stalin believed Hitler could not refuse to grant his new demands—particularly because of pending United States lend-lease aid to the Allies. But Hitler had another secret weapon with which he believed he could prevent the lend-lease program from becoming effective.

It was a secret military pact with Japan, plus evident knowledge of a secret pact between President Roosevelt, Britain, China, and the Dutch.

Without any knowledge or approval by Congress, President Roosevelt had entered into a secret military pact with Great Britain in 1936—as part of his secret foreign policy. Following the terms of this secret pact—he had entered an additional secret pact with the ABCD Powers—American, Britain, China, and Dutch—at Singapore on April 25, 1941.

Under the Singapore agreement, the ABCD Powers drew a line in the South Pacific and agreed they jointly would go to war against Japan if that country crossed that line.

On June 22, 1941, Hitler broke his pact with Stalin by sending his troops across the Russian-German borders.

President Roosevelt, almost immediately, announced Russia would be included in the Lend-Lease I program, because now, he said, Russia was fighting to protect democracy and individual liberty against aggression.

On August 17, 1941, 113 days after the signing of the Singapore ABCD agreement, President Roosevelt, on returning from his Atlantic Charter conference with Churchill, which conference was attended by General Marshall, informed the Japanese Ambassador at Washington of that agreement and notified him that if Japan crossed the "deadline" it meant war with the United States.

November 28, 1941, the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff notified President Roosevelt that a large Japanese military convoy was steaming toward the South Pacific "deadline." There is no evidence that either the Pearl Harbor or Philippine defense commands had been given any information of the Singapore agreement—or the impending crossing of the "deadline" by Japanese forces.

Records now available prove that the United States had "cracked" the Japanese top-secret code and for nearly a year President Roosevelt and General Marshall had complete advance information of practically all Japanese war plans. The Pearl Harbor and Philippine defense commands were not notified that our Government had possession of this top-secret code.

December 4, 1941, President Roosevelt, at a White House conference, told Senate and House leaders there was no reason for Congress to remain in session, that it could adjourn sine die and its Members go home for the Christmas holidays.

December 6, 1941, the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff notified President Roosevelt that the Japanese convoy, previously reported, had crossed the South Pacific "deadline." There is no evidence that either the Pearl Harbor or Philippine defense commands were notified.

December 7, 1941, 113 days after President Roosevelt's above-cited notification to the Japanese Ambassador at Washington, Japanese forces attacked Pearl Harbor, and the United States was actively in World War II.

WHERE WAS MARSHALL?

General Marshall has yet satisfactorily to explain to the Congress his exact whereabouts on the night of December 6 and the morning of December 7, 1941, while members of his staff sought to inform him that intercepted Japanese messages indicated the United States was about to be attacked.

Hitler's secret weapon failed—due to what history may well term his major tactical error. He declared war on the United States—thereby enabling President Roosevelt to obtain a declaration of war against Germany by Congress. Had this not occurred, it is doubtful President Roosevelt could have continued the Lend-Lease I program of assistance to Europe and Russia. Nor would American forces have been sent to drive Nazi-Fascist forces out of Africa, the Mediterranean, and Europe. Hitler might well have defeated Stalin and consolidated his European empire while the United States was engaged in defeating Japan in the Pacific.

While there have been efforts in Congress to spread on the record complete details of the secret agreements entered into at Yalta and Tehran between President Roosevelt and Stalin—and at Potsdam between President Truman and Stalin—these efforts have been unsuccessful to date because of the continuation of the bipartisan appeasement program of the Roosevelt-Truman foreign policy.

However, sufficient evidence has been brought to light to establish that—at the Yalta-Tehran-Potsdam conferences—President Roosevelt and President Truman, with Army Chief of Staff Marshall acting as a principal adviser, agreed to give Stalin practically all the territory which Hitler refused to cede to him. In fact, it now appears evident that the agreements secretly reached at these conferences gave Stalin more territory than he demanded from Hitler.

It is claimed these concessions were necessary to keep Stalin at war with Germany and induce him to enter the war with Japan. It would appear that Stalin threatened to withdraw from the European war unless his Yalta-Tehran demands were granted—and no one, at those conferences, apparently thought to ask "What can Stalin expect from Hitler—other than liquidation—if he quits fighting now?"

The Yalta-Tehran-Potsdam agreements evidently ceded to Stalin Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, east Poland, Bessarabia, East Prussia (Koenigsberg and Carpathia Russia) thereby extending the Soviet western Europe frontier from the Baltic Sea to the Black Sea. They also allowed Stalin to move his troops into the eastern sections of Germany and Austria; to take control of all of Poland, Rumania, Hungary, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, and Albania. They further gave him the Petsamo area in north Finland—the only nonfreezing Arctic port and rich in nickel and cobalt deposits. This area also serves as a dagger in the back of Norway and Sweden.

Stalin, under these agreements, also was given the Karelia area in south Finland—the area which the Red Army unsuccessfully attempted to seize in 1939. This is within a few miles of Helsinki and gave the Soviet complete control of the Bay of Finland.

These agreements also granted Stalin a 99-year trusteeship over the Allan Islands—which control the entrance to the Bay of Finland from the Baltic Sea and serve as a dagger in the sides of Sweden and Finland.

The granting of all of the above-mentioned territory to Stalin left Czechoslovakia surrounded on three sides by Soviet-controlled or dominated countries. It should have been recognized, by those attending the conferences, that Stalin could not permit this country long to remain outside the Soviet area of influence. Czechoslovakia's huge industrial plant—an immense war potential—in itself would have been too great a threat to Stalin's continued domination of central Europe.

Further, a glance at the map establishes that once the above-mentioned territories had been taken over by Stalin, Czechoslovakia—if it remained outside the Soviet orbit—became a corridor running from west to east through the Carpathian Mountains, through which an attacking force could pour from the Bavarian plains to the Ukrainian "bread basket of the Soviet," thereby cutting Russia off from her all-important Balkan oil supply and the Mediterranean Sea.

BIPARTISAN APPEASEMENT APPROVES GIFTS TO STALIN

It would, therefore, appear that the Yalta-Tehran-Potsdam agreements—effectuated as part of the bipartisan-appeased, General Marshall-approved Roosevelt-Truman foreign policy—either granted Stalin outright or enabled him to gain—control of the foregoing territories and contributed materially to creating the present European situation.

In addition, the record further establishes that, as the price paid Stalin for his agreement to take active part in the war with Japan (which he did not do until it was almost ended), these same agreements also gave him control of Manchuria, North Korea, and the Kuril Islands in the northwest Pacific. This territory serves as an additional protection to the new defense plant Stalin is building in Siberia, east of the Ural Mountains. It also serves as a well-protected base from which he may launch an attack on Alaska and the west coast of the United States in event we become involved in another European war.

Shortly after the end of the Japanese war the Soviet press began, and has continued, a campaign to prepare the Russian people to support a Soviet demand for the return of Alaska to Russia. This campaign is based on the claim that all Russian territory belonged to the Russian people, and therefore the sale of Alaska to the United States by the Czar was illegal.

It is recognized that the bipartisan appeasement group in Congress can maintain they had no knowledge of these agreements. The same cannot be held for General Marshall. He was present as a key adviser at all these conferences. He saw Stalin make use of territorial grants to move members of his fifth column into adjacent territory for the purpose of taking over the governments of such territories by forcing their way into cabinet positions in such governments.

Yet, as President Truman's special ambassador to China, he induced Chiang Kai-shek to "broaden his government policy" so as to include Communists in the Chinese Cabinet. It is reported that this was part of General Marshall's "United States aid to China" program.

At the end of 1946 Stalin and his satellite countries controlled practically all of the European oil production.

Early in 1947 he started his move to gain control of the Middle East oil supply.

He insisted that control of the Dardanelles be changed from its present one-power control by Turkey to a four-power control by Turkey, Russia, and the Russian satellites, Rumania and Bulgaria.

He further demanded that Russia be given a trusteeship over the former Italian Province of Cirenaica in Libyan Africa.

Bulgaria demanded she be given the Grecian Province of Thermopolae controlling the Aegean Sea outlet of the Dardanelles.

Aided by the Soviet satellite administrations of Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, and Albania—evidently operating under orders from Moscow—Grecian Communists demanded key positions in the Greek Cabinet.

If these demands were granted, Stalin not only would have gained control of European oil supplies, but also of Middle East oil outlets into the Mediterranean to Europe and the world.

He then could have forced all of Europe, the Middle and Near East, into the Soviet Empire.

THE PALESTINE BLUNDER

Finally recognizing this danger, the Truman administration changed its attitude toward Russia—at least insofar as the Mediterranean area was concerned. Evidence reveals, however, that—despite extension of export control powers granted by Congress—President Truman did not halt the flow of potential war material from the United States to Russia.

President Truman met the above-mentioned Stalin demands with a request to Congress for special emergency aid to Greece and Turkey—including military supplies, as well as dollars—in order to bolster the administrations of those Governments against Stalin's demands.

The unquestioned objective of the aid to Turkey and Greece program was to prevent Stalin from obtaining control of the Mediterranean outlets of Middle East oil.

Yet—shortly after he had appeared before congressional committees to urge speedy adoption of the above program—Secretary of State Marshall played a leading role in pressuring the Palestine partition agreement through the United Nations Assembly.

Oil from the Middle East reaches the Mediterranean through Palestine.

It was generally recognized by almost everyone—except possibly President Truman and Secretary Marshall—that the United Nations Assembly Palestine partition program could not be made effective without implementation.

Implementation—in present-day diplomatic language—means troops.

It further was generally recognized by almost everyone—except possibly President Truman and Secretary Marshall—that troops for implementing this partition agreement could only be supplied by the United States—and Russia.

Therefore, while the Congress was being asked by President Truman and Secretary Marshall, on the one hand, to supply the funds to keep Stalin out of Turkey and Greece, to keep him from gaining control of the Mediterranean outlets for Middle East oil, on the other hand they were insisting that the United Nations adopt a program that would put Russian troops in Palestine, through which Middle East oil must flow before it reaches the Mediterranean.

It is not surprising that President Truman and Secretary Marshall were forced to reverse at least that phase of their foreign policy within the last few days.

In closing this brief review, it is believed unnecessary to cite details of the march of events—relative to the progress of the Roosevelt-Truman-Marshall foreign policy—during the period June 1-December 31, 1947. Those received wide publicity and should be fresh in the memory of all.

WORLD WAR III TIME TABLE?

However, it is advisable to mention certain events that have occurred since January 1, 1948—which might have escaped general attention but which are reminiscent of certain events of the 1940-41 period.

January 30, 1948, Washington press reports announced that the United States National Defense Staff has signed a secret offensive alliance with Great Britain continuing in effect the 1936 secret offensive alliance signed with Britain by President Roosevelt.

March 6, 1948, the London Economist, in its lead article, stated that Marshall plan economic aid alone could not be expected to bolster the administrations in power in the 16 western European countries which are to be beneficiaries of that plan. This article stated frankly that, if there is to be any hope of success for the Marshall plan, it must be implemented for at least 2 years, with some form of lend-lease of military equipment in order to equip the armies of these countries. It further stated there is a serious manpower shortage in these countries, that they could not be expected to supply manpower to handle this lend-leased military equipment, and therefore the United States must meet that shortage by sending troops to Europe.

March 13, 1948, Washington press reports announced that President Truman had drawn "a line in Europe and intimated that, if Stalin crossed that line, it will mean war."

March 17, 1948, President Truman, in a special message delivered before a joint session of the Congress, asked for enactment of the second peacetime draft in our history.

March 18, 1948, Paris press reports announced that the United States is expected to sign a military pact with western Europe within the next 3 months.

In view of the foregoing brief review of events which contributed to creating the present situation in Europe it is exceedingly doubtful that the Marshall plan—or any plan designed to subsidize the continuation of the Roosevelt-Truman-Marshall foreign policy—can hope, unless implemented by total war, to halt communism in Europe.

This review also supports the finding that any such plan—predicated upon a continuation of the Roosevelt-Truman-Marshall foreign policy—cannot, even with implementation, restore normal trade and commerce throughout the world, maintain true freedom of the individual, and establish a durable peace.

1948 Is the Year To Vote American

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 19, 1948

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, so runs the caption of the editorial in the June 5, 1948, issue of Collier's. Over the years, Collier's has been a vigorous, consistent advocate of the New Deal philosophy and has ardently supported an international policy which would unload upon America the burden of rehabilitating the whole world and then policing it.

The objective of making all the people of the world happy and prosperous, all nations live in peace, is an extremely worthy one. It is a version of "on earth peace, good will toward men." Toward it we should continue to strive.

But while striving toward that objective which is akin to Christianity's goal, we must not forget that we were also admonished to cast out the beam in our own eye before searching for the mote in our brother's eye, that he who would help others must first make himself strong, and that the Lord helps those who first help themselves.

As Collier's states:

> Of course, no Presidential year is a year to vote against America.

Wisely, but a little late in its editorial policy, Collier's adds:

> But in 1948 we are on an unusually hot spot.

May I add, we sure are, and may I for once agree with Collier's that—

> In such a position, we cannot afford to take chances on having a lightweight in the White House, for the term 1949–53.

And let me most emphatically add that we cannot afford to take chances on becoming a lightweight nation. Our youth licked Hitler, but our politicians built up Stalin. He and communism are one present danger.

Some months ago Herbert Hoover, than whom none has had a wider international experience, warned us that we must take stock of our national resources, guard against excessive giving which would imperil our ability to help others and to defend ourselves. More recently, he has reemphasized the point that we can and may, if we do not watch our step, destroy our ability to help others, imperil our own future existence by wasteful, unwise, or exhaustive giving.

On June 12 last, John Foster Dulles, Republican foreign policy adviser of Senator VANDENBERG and Governor Dewey, answering the question, Can we guarantee a free Europe? wrote:

> The United States cannot and should not go on indefinitely bolstering up peoples who have the possibility of standing independently on their own feet. I am confident they can stand alone. If so, we will have helped to create a great sister federation. * * * That transformation in Europe would bring to an end the present considerable risk of war.

The President and the Congress having committed this Government to the Marshall plan, to conscription of our youth in peacetime, the people should in this crucial year vote American, insist our efforts produce results.
